The graduates of our high school were collected in one of the churches and preached at as one of the graduation ceremonies, the preacher using the text, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and all these things shall be added unto you." The reverend gentleman exhorted the boys and girls to take his dope and then go forth to do and conquer. He called their attention to certain things waiting to be done here on earth while they are waiting for a call up yonder—the world to be won for Christ, justice to be wrought on earth, etc. And my friend Heine, Freethinker and ardent Socialist, was so charmed with the preacher's mention of existing social and economic iniquities that he tells me he wrote the clergyman a letter expressing his appreciation of the sermon. Says Heine to me: "Of course the man put in a lot of other-world foolishness. He had to, to satisfy his flock. But he is evidently at heart a Socialist and a Rationalist."

But I am inclined to think that Heine is self-deceived, that in his case the wish is father to the thought.

Heine is a bright fellow, a good talker. His great aim is the success of Socialism, and he makes all subservient to his efforts in that direction. He opposes forming a Rationalist organization, lest it distract interest and attention from the Socialist political movement. When he talks with me he seems to be quite as Atheistic as am I, but he says, "I talk thus to you; but when I talk with others who are believers in God and immortality, I take the deist position, for I must not excite the opposition of such as cling to the ideas of God and immortality. That would hurt the Cause."

So evidently Heine blows hot or blows cold as in any particular case he may deem it good policy. And he thinks the preacher is fooling the mossback orthodox, but he may instead be fooling the Socialists. And is Heine fooling the other fellow or is he fooling me? Quien sabe?

It seems that as regards some of our Socialists, who are somewhat Rationalistic, their opposition to the church is caused not by any firmly grounded objection to supernaturalism but by the church's opposition to Socialism. And it is probable that should the Socialist movement ever become so strong that the church must compromise with it and become its alma mater, such Socialists would be ready to fall into its arms.

ROBINSON CRUSOE.

The Jew still prays: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God! King of the Universe, who hast not made me a woman." How does he know this is anything to be thankful for?

"Give me chastity and continence, but not now," prayed St. Augustine (Confessions 8:7-17). There are many clergymen who can repeat that prayer and find it answered.

There is no God for the poor. Poverty kills religion.

Nature gives every man a brain and a voice, but Nature gives no man a religion.

Prosperity can worship. It can give thanks. But what have misery and suffering, hunger and want to be thankful for?

The one dominant question which confronts the individual is not What shall I make of my business? but What shall I make of myself? Every man is intimate with only one person, himself. Every man must live all of his life, in closest relations with himself. It is most important that every man make as clean, as healthy, as true a man of himself as possible in order to assure a clean, healthy and true life to enjoy.

If Americans or lovers of American institutions wish to save this nation from the curse of Romanism, let them at once demand that all church or ecclesiastical property be taxed and that the parochial school be abolished. In doing these two things Roman Catholics as well as Protestants and nonsectarians of all kinds will be greatly benefited. You can do no person a greater good than to free him from the power of the Romish priest—the worst slavedriver on earth.

What sense is there in putting the motto "In God we trust" on our coins, when the word "Liberty" is on them? In liberty there is no place for God. No god can be as large or as magnanimous as liberty, for all gods are made by men, but liberty is the mental atmosphere of the universe. The god of any man is limited by the human mind, but liberty is larger than the minds of all men. To be free is to be free from worship of God, because worship restricts the act of the mind.

The man whom the world is looking for is not the man who said: "Come unto me, all ye who labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest," but the man who can say and back up his saying: Come unto me all ye who are hard up and I will assist you. The world does not want salvation, it wants help. The here is bigger and more important than the hereafter. It is persons who are cold, who are hungry, who are ragged, that need help. Let souls get out of the way until bodies are cared for.

Does anyone know of anything good that ever came out of a convent or a monastery? A house of old maids or of old bachelors can never be a home in the true sense of that word, and a nation is made of homes, not of cloisters. No great man of this country was a monk or even a priest, and no great woman was a nun. It does not improve womanhood to lock it up in a convent, nor mankind either. When an institution can thrive only by shutting the world out of it, it is the duty of the world to destroy it. Making men and women for God does not make them any better for men.

Arguing the Repeal.

The newspapers of Hartford, the capital city of Connecticut, where before a legislative committee the hearing on the repeal of the blasphemy statute took place February 22, gave a due amount of space to the argument of Theodore Schroeder, attorney for the Free Speech League and for Michael Mockus, in support of the bill to repeal. The Courant of February 23 said, in part:

"Probably for the first time since 1642 a committee of the General Assembly heard the law read in the halls of the Capitol and listened to appeals for its repeal. The law follows:

"Any person who shall blaspheme against God, either of the persons of the Holy Trinity, the Christian Religion or the Holy Scriptures, shall be fined not more than $100 and imprisoned in a jail not more than one year, and may also be bound for his good behavior."

"Theodore Schroeder, who said he represented the Free Speech League, was the first speaker to appear before the committee to ask that the law be repealed. Mr. Schroeder told the committee that the law was part of a system of the colonial days and would work havoc today, if enforced. The law, he said, was written at a time when the union of church and state was an actual fact and when theological qualifications were necessary for officeholders.

"The law, Mr. Schroeder pointed out, violated at least five sections of the constitution, among them being the right of free speech, the right of liberty and the pursuit of happiness and the right of equality. No man, he said, had ever undertaken to define what blasphemy means or what the trinity means. The statute does not define the blasphemy of God and the law today could not be interpreted according to the theological conceptions of 1642.

"If you deny the truth of witchcraft today," Mr. Schroeder told the committee, "you cannot live up to this law. This statute would make it impossible for such a man as Billy Sunday to deliver his sermons in Connecticut. If you do not believe that the whale swallowed Jonah or the story of Adam and the rib in the Garden of Eden then you are in for it, according to this law. A statute of this broad scope ought not to be allowed on the books."

The report in the Hartford Post was substantially the same. The representative of the Times treated the hearing facetiously, and warned the students of Yale, which is in New Haven, that their "carefree little ditty about how 'Old Noah he built himself an ark'" was blasphemous within the meaning of the statute. Mr. Henry F. Fletcher of Enfield, who is reputed to be the author of the repeal measure, pointed out that Goethe, Haeckel and Nietzsche are all blasphemers according to the law as it stands, yet all of them are read in Connecticut. Introducing himself as a Materialist, Mr. Fletcher said he believed that without knowing it he had been an habitual criminal, under the terms of the law, ever since he was fourteen years old.

It is not to be wondered at that nobody appeared before the committee in defense of the disreputable old statute.

Tabernacle Evangelism.

There are many evidences in our day which go to prove that Christianity is a decaying religion. One of the most marked of these is the strange and "unchurchly" methods now being resorted to in order to revive an interest among men in this diminishing phase of human society. These new methods have taken the form of Tabernacle Evangelism, or as it is better known, "shed" revivalism. It is to an exhibition of this novel plan for resuscitating a moribund issue that the people of New York city are zealously invited by the advance agents of its most notorious exponent, "Billy" Sunday.

The industrious student of mental science finds no difficulty in understanding this astonishing mania for extra-ecclesiastical methods of salvation which has seized the Christian church of today. To face vast congregations night after night, to be a leading topic of newspaper reporting and discussion, to be the most-talked-of people in the community for weeks, to be showered with personal gifts, to be given credit for hundreds and thousands of "converts"—all this sort of thing makes a powerful appeal to a very general type of religious mentality. It might well be compared to the enthusiasm aroused by the glamour and display of the Roman gladiatorial contests, which reached their climax of excitement when, at a signal from the emperor, the enormous crowd of spectators turned the thumb upward as a token that the combatant might live; and all to be followed by a profitless period of mental and moral lassitude, until the doors of the great Colosseum again swung open to remind the waiting crowd of pleasure-loving enthusiasts that the annual show was again about to begin.

The general impression among religious people is that this sort of emotionalism, this wild enthusiasm which is the universal accompaniment of Tabernacle Evangelism, is what the churches want, and what they are willing to pay for. Since the rise of Sunday in this business of soul-saving for so many dollars a soul, it is computed that more than 400 "evangelistic parties" have been plying their money-making trade in the different cities and towns of the country. Advance agents of these "parties" are bidding against each other to get into communities. They offer the local authorities as high a sum as ten per cent. of the free-will gifts if they will agree to open to the evangelistic party certain large towns within their territory. The business is financially profitable. Pastors receiving a salary of $1,500 a year have been known to acquire an income of $40,000 a year and more, when they took up with the new method of religious propagandism. Billy Sunday has been in the business for twenty years, and according to his rating in financial circles, it will not be long before he must be classed among the millionaire part of the population.

The serious defects in this new religious system are already being appreciated by many thoughtful persons within the church itself. There is a growing feeling that the new evangelism will wrest from the pastor of the local church the opportunity and responsibility of evangelistic leadership, and will encourage him to feel that if the unconverted people of his community are to be led to Christ, he must go into highly organized and widely advertised campaigns under the leadership of grotesque, flamboyant and sensational itinerant propagandists. "This," says one preacher, "would be a colossal blunder—a blunder which would injuriously affect the spiritual life and efficiency of the church for generations."

Have we not here a confession as to the declining status of the church of our day? There are two reasons why a man is willing to relinquish his work that it may be done by another: they are, inefficiency and indifference. If a man cannot do his work he is always very glad to find somebody who will do it for him; if he is indifferent about his work and does not care to do it, he is equally glad when another volunteers to do it for him.

There can be no doubt of the fact, believers themselves being the judges, that the Christian church has lost much of its power to effect its old-time results. It is said of Billy Sunday that the chief benefit of his work is not the number of individuals who are converted, but the general toning up of the ethical standards and the revival of the spiritual life of the church in the community. It is certainly a most extraordinary state of affairs in the Christian church when the services of an ex-baseball player are cordially invited in order to revive the spiritual life of its members; and this notwithstanding the large amount of adverse criticism which the evangelist and his vulgar methods have received from all classes of the people. In spite of his low-born speech and inhuman condemnation of those who differ with him; in spite of his grotesque gyrations upon the platform, calling forth a rude hilarity and hand-clapping from the credulous multitude; in spite of the exaggeration he indulges in in the reports of the number of converts, and the large personal gifts he welcomes and receives, the various churches still cling to him as if upon him alone depended the amelioration of the race and the successful perpetuity of the Christian religion. If anything could more clearly show the unhealthy depths to which religion has fallen, we must confess our ignorance of it.

In explanation of the archaic theology which is the stock in trade of this chief of tabernacle evangelists, it is urged by his friends that it is clearly that type of gospel which the world needs and is hungry for. In other words, the world today is in need of a revival of hell with all its medieval horrors; of a renewal of the spirit of hate and persecution, of bigotry, credulity and class distinction, with all the other undesirable conditions which have always made up the religious society.

If these be the need of the day, then, surely, the hope of the world has vanished. That man was a poor prophet indeed who read the signs of the times in terms so very unlikely of fulfillment. Never will the world again return to such an inhuman theology. Never again will it sacrifice the spirit of truth and brotherly love for the cruel and immoral conceptions of the monkish mind. Billy Sunday with all his troop may sing and talk themselves into a condition of paranoia, and excite multitudes into a similar state of mental aberration, but the man of reason and experience will never more be brought under the spell of that most debasing of human influences, dogmatic religion.

Tabernacle evangelism may for a while create a temporary renewal of interest in religion, as it is at present creating much excitement, but, like similar efforts in the past, when the great furore is over, and men settle down to normal and legitimate duties, the next decade will witness the pious revivalist very busy again, laboring with the zeal of his predecessor to convert anew the "holy brethren" whom friends distinctly recall having seen "hit the trail" ten years ago.

And so the foolish work goes on and will go on until reason and common sense sit enthroned above church and creed; until superstition and religious fanaticism are supplanted by a noble humanism which will find its sphere of activity in respecting self and in ministering to the happiness of others.

Ideals and Practice.

The one page which THE TRUTH SEEKER yields to the discussion of economic, social and political questions is thought too much by one correspondent, who says he is a reader. We have an idea that he objects less because he does not care for these matters in a Freethought paper than because he there meets with opinions with which he cannot agree. That is a human weakness. Writing from Havana, Cuba, the correspondent says:

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER:—I see that some of your readers complain that you give too little space to social reform, so I hasten to say that in my opinion you give too much. In yours of January 27 you mention Purdy as a Freethinker, yet what would he think of your frequent references to war, his chosen profession? Apparently you always keep the white flag at the masthead, as you so often refer to war in disparaging terms. This, permit me to suggest, is where you dabble in "social reform," which in its essence implies that the past is a "mistake" and that the future is going to be oh, so different! I suppose that I may be a good Freethinker and still believe war is as valuable as quinine. Again in a later number you refer deprecatingly to the action of the authorities in locking up birth-controllers. And yet I suppose I may be a sound Freethinker and believe that the birth-controller would perform a public service by committing suicide themselves instead of trying to implant the practice as a national or racial cult. Mr. Editor, I do not question your right to get up a paper for people who like the kind of paper you are now giving them, but as these other readers of yours seem to think that suggestions are in order, I desire to offer mine—a Freethought paper devoted to Freethought! Yours truly,

J. HERBERT FOSTER.

A man may be a Freethinker, as Mr. Foster supposes, and hold the views he has expressed. If to be mistaken forfeited the right of Freethought we should all be in poor standing.

There are perhaps Freethinkers who believe in war as a biological imperative, which we do not; and the standing of neither as a Freethinker is thereby impaired. It is a fact, nevertheless, that abolition of war has been one of the advocacies of Freethought in all times.

Freethinkers have been impelled to oppose war because war imperils all the guarantees of liberty, including that of speech. As Spencer said, war suspends all the moral laws—everything inhibited by civilization follows in its train.

One does not feel that he can look with approval upon what is now taking place in Europe and remain human in his sentiments. He cannot contrast war conditions with those of peace, and decide that he prefers those of war, without abdicating his reason. Hence our preference for peace at any price, and we cannot admit that such a preference needs defense. Furthermore, we should not expect to make any the worse soldier if called to the defense of human rights invaded, nor did the late G. H. Purdy because he substantially agreed with us. One may have an ideal without being compelled by consistency to practice it in circumstances over which he has no control, as he may believe in universal health and yet take quinine when he needs it. Peace is too fundamental to be called a "social reform"; it is a necessity to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

A sound Freethinker, as Mr. Foster hopes, may "believe that the birth-controllers would perform a public service by committing suicide themselves instead of trying to implant the practice as a national or racial cult." The freedom of thought is not imperiled by holding or expressing that belief. The matter takes a different aspect when the right of the birth-controllers to advocate their views, or to impart to others such knowledge upon any subject as they possess, is denied. Our critic will take notice that we have not gone beyond defending the freedom here alluded to, and that we have not recommended or maintained the propaganda on its merits. That is an open question. Family limitation would plainly be desirable in some instances, and not in others. Birth control being neither compulsory nor catching, we submit it to the freedom of discussion and leave it there.

It is our good fortune not to be obliged by conviction of error to retract or apologize for statements that we make in THE TRUTH SEEKER. One correspondent avers that we are not quite patriotic enough, yet he puts humanity above patriotism. That was our position in what was said about "invasion." Our statement that projecting an explosive against the side of one of our passenger and freight ships is an invasion, seems to be admitted by the pacifist-patriot. And two days after the number of the paper setting forth this sentiment had appeared, former President Taft, addressing a manufacturers' association at the Hotel Biltmore in New York, said that the act was "of the same nature as if our country were invaded"; that "our people who are on the decks of our ships under our flag on the high seas are where international law says they have a right to be," and that if they are attacked "it is an assault upon our territory." (Compare THE TRUTH SEEKER, Feb. 24, page 116.) We hope the critic will observe that we are in the presence of a statement of fact, not of opinion.

Points to be kept in view are that asking fair play for the birth-controllers is not indorsing their propaganda, and that there is a difference between peace and non-resistance. Self-protection is the first law of nature, but it has never passed into an axiom that an escaped lunatic should not be remanded to his asylum by the use of such force as may be necessary.

Too strict an interpretation of the suggestion, "a Freethought paper devoted to Freethought," might eliminate our News of the Week, the household page called the Children's Corner, and In Best of Humor. The segregation of the Department of Economics protects the reader from the chance of being beguiled into reading an essay on social reform where he expects something else, and we believe it needs no vindication or apology. We can evade world questions and world activities only by the alternative of suicide presented to the birth-controllers by Mr. Foster.

The Sword of Jesus.

Whether or not Christ came to bring peace on earth, it is certain that some of his ministers have another mission. We read in a recent dispatch from Washington that the clergy of the district are citing the Bible to prove preparedness for defense is a national and sacred duty.

Stirred by an attack on the House floor by Representative J. H. Moore of Pennsylvania upon the Rev. R. H. McKim of Washington, a well-known Episcopal minister, the preachers have taken up the cudgels in derogation of Mr. Moore.

Congressman Moore scored the Rev. McKim for signing his name to an advertisement appearing in certain eastern papers condemning Germany's course in the submarine controversy and urging the United States to prepare for trouble. Mr. Moore declared it a minister's duty to preach "peace on earth," and asserted that if Christ came to earth today he would not select the Rev. McKim as his mouthpiece.

Dr. McKim in reply said:

"The Bible from end to end, both from the Old and New Testaments, crowned with approval the national heroes who fought against aggression and invasion. Neither Christ nor his apostles ever told the soldiers of their day to abandon their profession if they would come into the church. The highest praise Christ ever gave a man was to a soldier, a Roman centurion.

"Jesus Christ is described as 'first king of righteousness and then king of peace'; that is, justice must come before peace, because peace has no moral significance except as the exponent of justice."

Rev. C. Ernest Smith said:

"When our Lord, Jesus Christ, came to talk about peace between nations he had this to say: 'Think not that I am come to send peace on earth, I tell ye nay, but rather a sword.'"

"Therefore, Mr. Moore's reference to peace on earth was entirely illogical, but this comes from talking on a subject one knows little or nothing about."

The Washington clergy will not allow a layman unrebuked to teach them their Bible, but they see no reason why they should not teach the layman his political duty. The notion that all hot-air is from God and that they are his blowpipes still possesses them. They depreciate peace, as compared with justice, because everybody knows what peace is while only themselves can define justice—a metaphysical conception. The world might be at war perpetually if the clergy and other God-intoxicated individuals could control its destinies.

The protest of Archbishop Mundelein and other Chicago Catholics against the withholding of public appropriations from their child-caring institutions exposes the "charitable" pretensions of the church. A charitable person or institution is one who gives of his or its own substance. When the state provides the funds it is not a church but a state charity, and to the taxpayer belongs the credit. The church that receives and professes to administer public funds is no more charitable than an undertaker who buries a pauper from his establishment at the expense of the community, or than any other concern carrying out a public contract. The employees of the Catholic institution receiving grants from the public treasury for the support of inmates are paid from the profits of child-caring. The Freethinking taxpayer contributes his quota to the support of the concern; so do all non-Catholics, thus making the charity Catholic only in name and in the proportion that Catholic contributions exceed the non-Catholic; and when it is remembered that in this country Catholics are about one to ten of the population, that proportion is not large. And since the institutions pay no taxes, while their employees make a living out of them at the community's cost, the claim that they are Catholic charities rests on a narrow basis of fact. When Catholics erect these places, pay the taxes on them according to their value as real estate, and then settle the bills without calling on the state or municipality for an appropriation for that purpose, they will deserve to be called charitable. As the business is now conducted, they are grafters. When New York proposes to examine the books of the Catholic institutions receiving public funds, the archbishop threatened in effect to cease receiving or supporting the city's wards and to dump them all on the steps of the city hall. Archbishop Mundelein in more guarded language says that without public grants the care of two thousand children of Chicago must be relinquished to the city authorities. He lets go the pretense that providing for them is a church charity, and appeals mainly on behalf of the children's "souls," which he predicts will be lost under the care of the state. We have never supposed that Catholic institutions were maintained for charitable purposes or for any purpose except to make it possible for the church to control the religious belief of their inmates. Archbishop Mundelein's protest confirms that view. Here in New York the spokesmen of the church are inveighing against the plan of the mayor to support dependent children in their own homes by helping their parents. The church wants possession, and to be paid for its services while training them as Roman Catholics.

The New York American appointed last Sunday as a day for prayer in all the churches that God would be with President Wilson and guide him. What good can these prayers do? God might prefer to be with Mr. Wilson, but the Kaiser spoke first, and "He" is guiding the German army. Is the deity a bird, as Sir Boyle Roche would inquire, that he can be in two places at once?

THE JESUS COMPOSITE.

A Personality Fabricated of Mixed and Refractory Elements, Without Reality.

In Mr. Eccles's first article, in proof of a "Jesus historical" (T. S., Oct. 28, 1916), he sets forth two Jesus entities, one Jewish, the other a Gentile. The former he believed to be an historical character, while the latter he admitted to be mythical. Having now disposed of Josephus and Origen as subjects of previous debate, I return to this original theme.

I wish to premise that apart from the Oriental elements of the present New Testament Jesus we have two Jesus characters that were launched many years apart. The first one was in fulfilment of Jewish prophecy of a coming savior and redeemer, a metaphysical mediator between God and the Jews, as set forth in Matthew. The second one was supplied to meet the demand created by the fall of Jerusalem, at a time when the Jews were in sore distress. This was in fulfilment of another Jewish prophecy, namely, for a political deliverer, a reincarnated Moses or Joshua, the messiah of the prophets, and is set forth in Luke.

Neither of these fabricated personalities was of Jewish manufacture, however. The former was undoubtedly launched from Antioch, while the latter one was more probably hatched in Rome. Both were without doubt fabricated by Gentiles as lures for Jewish converts to the religion at issue. As shown elsewhere in this paper the book of Luke is dedicated to the bishop of Antioch, and while it may also have been written there, the messianic agitation is supposed to have been more active at Rome after the fall of Jerusalem.

During many of the first decades of the Christian sect the Jewish scriptures were exclusively used, and all efforts were made to perfect their establishment by the incorporation into them and into the composite Savior and later Savior-Messiah of everything Hebrew. In the transition to the New Testament there followed the Old Testament Apocrypha, and then apparently a number of apocryphal epistles and gospels appeared before the canonical books of the present New Testament.

With the lapse of time, as the sect gained in Gentile conversions and Jewish antagonism caused it to lose its many Hebrew adherents, it appears that a movement of progressive elimination of Jewish features was inaugurated; the Pauline epistles, the first three gospels, and the gnostic books were expurgated and repeatedly revised by additions and subtractions, interpolations, prefixes and suffixes, until they became finally canonically fixed. Even then, however, were many sly alterations, extending nearly up to the present time.

During the transition period other elements stole in, such as Oriental myths, older religions and Greek philosophy. Investigation brings to light a surprising array of legends and prophecies of divine, semi-divine and political personifications identified with Christ, Nazar and the Hebrew name Joshua (the Latin of it Jesus) and modifications of these names. Also we obtain fragmentary bits of knowledge of a number of pre-Christian sects with names based upon the above, to which we will allude presently.

It is not surprising that in that age and locality where religious deception, chicanery and fraud were common, and where a rich field was promised in duping an ignorant and impressionable people itinerant mendicant secular priests did their best to "put it over" the Israelites, or that their successors later did finally succeed with the degenerate and retrograde Romans.

The whole project was a studied adaptation to a race, age and to circumstances, with the motto: Anything to succeed.

Mr. Eccles, admitting a mythical element in the Christian Jesus, proceeds then to the Jewish Jesus, whom we regard as a "man of straw," designed for ulterior purposes. Mr. Eccles seeks to establish his full historicity by a theory that involves (1) the proof that the Christian Jesus is a typical Jew, and (2) by authenticating references to him by Josephus.

His claim to an original theory, which he has virtually accused Mr. C. G. Muskrat of plagiarizing (T. S., Dec. 9, 1916)—namely, that Jesus was not crucified at the time stated, but lived until he reached about fifty years of age—is not to be considered. The early Christian father, Irenaeus (A.D. 192), in his second book against heresies, chap. xxii, stated that St. John told his master, Polycarp, who in turn told him, that Jesus was not crucified as timed in the gospels, but lived until he was nearly fifty. Thus Mr. Eccles's theory is a restatement of Irenaeus, and while it is so much against the crucifixion legend, it in no way tends to prove that the entire Jesus story is not also a myth. In other words, disproving a thing in part does not establish as truth that against which it does not submit specific evidence.

We note that whereas Irenaeus's statement necessitates antedating Jesus' birth by nearly twenty years, Mr. Eccles's hypothesis, accepting the biblical birth date, advances the life period the same length of time.

We find in the New Testament a promiscuous jumble of persons. In the critical comments of the Encyclopedia Biblica, in order that the text may work out correctly, one must, for example, substitute Paul for Simon Peter. We have John the Baptist, John the disciple, John the Elder, John the Divine, John son of Zebedee, John of Ephesus, John of Asia Minor, just John, etc. Again we have James the Just, James brother of our Lord, James brother of Jude, James the disciple, James son of Alphaeus, James son of Zebedee, and many another unidentified James. The opportunity for wild speculation is without limit. Having worked out a theory that harmonizes with one group of incidents, one soon collides with a stone wall of irreconcilables from some other direction. Such is the commonplace experience of Biblical scholars.

There are some instances where the only satisfactory conclusion is that changes have been made in the text for the express purpose of covering up certain connecting links. Especially is this true when they appear out of place.

There are hidden bases for the Jesus elements of Jewish prophecies that merge in the Christian Jesus medley. Let us follow this clue; if we do not get anywhere, we can return to our starting point.

At the outset we can detect a motive for distorting the evidence we now seek to reconnect, for we observe that a drama has been staged which sets up a composite Christ Jesus, who was born about the beginning of the Christian era and died approximately in the year 30 of the same. We are without real evidence, however, since everything to date that has been submitted as such vanishes under close investigation.

The Jesus of Luke is offered as fulfilment of the prophecy of a political messiah and deliverer of the Jews who must come of the seed of David and out of the town of Bethlehem where David was, for the Pharisees knew that the anointed of the Lord can only be a son of David. To be a king of the Jews he must descend from David and be born in Bethlehem. As he must be brought in intimate relations with Jehovah, he is baptized by John the Baptist in the Jordan.

That Jesus was the first child of the legitimate marriage of Joseph and Mary is expressly stated, and that Mary came to Joseph a virgin and conceived by him is the opinion given by the Rev. T. K. Cheyne in the Encyclopedia Biblica, vol. iii, p. 3350, as based on Luke, thus admitting his human status. The Jewish rite of circumcision followed on the eighth day.

The Jesus of Matthew was of divine origin, begotten of the Holy Ghost, a miraculous conception, announced to Joseph by revelation—a process of generation entirely foreign to Judaism, but common to paganism. This Jesus was a Nazarene (Nazarean) and came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth, that it might be fulfilled, which was spoken by the prophets that he shall be called a Nazarene. We observe that Matthew xiii, 54, and Mark vi, 1, give Nazareth as the native place of Jesus. Conversely, Joseph's home in Matthew is Bethlehem, and in Luke Nazareth. In the words of Dr. Cheyne: "Every unprejudiced eye will perceive that the Nativity narratives of Matthew and Luke are mutually exclusive and irreconcilable."

The infant Messiah of Luke is announced by the angel's words to the shepherds and the song of the heavenly host, while the divine child of Matthew is heralded by the appearance of the star in the East. The newborn messiah of Luke received his first adoration from the shepherds, while the divine child of Matthew received his from the Magi. The messianic infant is pictured as Jewish, while the divine child is of the Orient and more mythological. Matthew's "Thou shalt call his name Jesus, that it might be fulfilled," is derived from "They shall call his name Immanuel."

The Jesus of Luke was born at the time of the taking of the census by Quirinus, governor of Syria, which was in A.D. 8, while the Jesus of Matthew was born prior to the death of Herod in the year 3 B.C. Herod's slaughter of the innocents is inferred from Matthew's narrative to be sometime after the birth of his Jesus. Professor Schmiedel attributes the divergence between Matthew and Luke to prophecy, which we may well agree is largely the case; nevertheless, being taken from two diverse prophecies the prophecies, apart from their common appropriations from Mark, present two diverse characters under the name of Jesus, which in the case of Matthew is given in fulfilment of prophecy in lieu of "Immanuel."

Matthew and Luke present pedigrees of Jesus that do not conform. Matthew's genealogy significantly traces to Abraham, while Luke's traces to Adam, and they differ otherwise. Luke's narrative in general is discredited by Schmiedel. The Jesus of Matthew has a pedigree, extending back to David, of but twenty-eight generations, whereas that of Luke has forty-three generations in the same time. The ancestral names are almost entirely different.

The paternal grandfather of the Jesus of Matthew was Jacob. His Jesus was taken into Egypt. He preached his first sermon on the mount, and he taught non-resistance. The paternal grandfather of the Jesus of Luke was Heli, and his Jesus was not taken into Egypt. He preached his first sermon on a plain, and taught and practiced resistance.

The Jesus of Matthew was a divine evangelist, superior to all his apostles, while that of Mark was not superior to John the Baptist, who, as Sawyer says, literally evangelized the people. The Jesus of Matthew departed from the old superstitions, while Luke's was essentially the messiah born to be king of the Jews.

Jesus Christ—Myth or Reality.

The interesting articles appearing lately in THE TRUTH SEEKER, upon the mythical or real existence of Jesus, take us away from the well-beaten path of every-day life and lead us among musty book shelves and authorities whose very existence has almost passed from, or perhaps never entered, the mind of the average man.

For the great majority of us, this question of the existence or non-existence of Jesus hinges not at all upon whether such and such a chapter, or book or verse, was interpolated or forged; but what everyone must have asked himself at some time or other is, What was the use?

When the preacher or teacher wants to picture God's power and wisdom, the process is generally to draw upon nature and to fill the mind with ideas of the wonderful adaptability of God in fitting the means to the end.

Gradually, then, the lesson extends from the realm of nature with its inscrutable God, to the Christ—God in the form of man—and then the preacher or teacher endeavors to ascribe to Jesus the magnificent power and wisdom which the processes of nature reveal to the mind. What is the result?

"Search the scripture in a devout and believing spirit," the student is advised. The result of the effort of man to endow the mind of Jesus with the wisdom and power of God is identical with that of the attempt of anyone to draw a picture or representation of some unknown animal. No one can do this without drawing upon nature and copying into this strange beast parts of the anatomy of beasts already known or described. And then at the most a monstrosity is made—such, for example, as the Beast of Revelation.

That is just what happens to Jesus when men attempt to give human embodiment to the power generally called "God." The Jesus of the gospel is a monstrosity, and nothing else, if a comparison is made between him and God.

This of necessity classes the story of Jesus with all the other myths.

It is quite common for those who seek to put the last interrogation upon an opponent in debate to take up a leaf or a grain of sand and say, "Can man make this? No? Then, since it is a reality, some power greater than man made it, and that power is God!"

The question naturally arises: Does God necessarily lose his power and his greatness when transformed into man (Jesus)? If not, how then can we account for the ignorance and lack of wisdom which the whole story of Jesus reveals?

If it is the truth that everything is known by God from the beginning, and that everything must come to pass according to God's almighty wisdom and foresight, according to his plan, how is it then that this whole religious question resolves itself into a process of evolution, that the laws which have produced man as we know him today have also produced the religious views of the present. The history of religion is as full of adaptations, survivals, rudiments and reversions as is the history of the anatomy of man.

One needs but to read the gospels to realize just how densely ignorant Jesus was, and at that he was no more ignorant than those who surrounded him. But the monstrous part of the Jesus story deals not with his ignorance, but with the paltry miracles and wonders which are introduced into the story to compensate the lack of real mystery and incomprehensible power as exhibited in nature.

Jesus has to perform sleight-of-hand tricks like a side-show fakir or patent medicine doctor to "put over" his claims, and even at that no one knows what Jesus ever did or said. He never left a line or even his autograph, and the world has been in a turmoil of perplexity ever since the time he is said to have lived in trying to figure out just what he did say or what he means when he said it.

Theologians never arrive at an agreement, but scientists sometimes do; and when the effort of man is directed to reading nature first-hand, he is not confronted with forgeries or interpolations, as Thomas Paine long ago called attention to, for the book of nature cannot be tampered with. The record is there. It is straight. It waits only for man to decipher.

This cannot be said for the gospels of Jesus. They do not agree. They do not exhibit that dazzling wisdom which the "hand of God" in nature exhibits. There is no logic or meaning in the story, for in the end nothing comes of it.

The first time I ever read the gospel of Matthew entire, I could not repress a smile. The whole story, so long and laboriously drawn out, failed in its conclusion to justify its supposed purpose. It appealed to me like the story of the man who asked the native to direct him to a certain house. The native took great pains to elaborate his directions and finally said: "And then you come to a white house at the end of the lane. Well, that ain't the house."

The whole story of Jesus as we have it is an attempt to teach mankind a lesson, to fill him with love and reverence for God the almighty, who is trying to correct an early mistake or indiscretion; and all through the story Jesus is kept hammering away upon the idea of the justice and mercy of God, and passing it out that God never fails those who have faith; and then with his last gasp he acknowledges that he has been imposed upon and exclaims in mortal agony, "My God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

The whole story loses its point, just as does the effort of its writers, who with tales of miracles and wonders fail to match the inscrutable mystery of the universe.

Jesus believed that all which he predicted would come to pass in his day. He did not know any of the things that a modern schoolboy knows. The whole story has been told and retold, age after age, in other religions, and there is nothing new, nothing in wisdom exceeding the experience of those who preceded him; and, besides, God is trying to remedy one mistake by making another. He is endeavoring to square accounts with Adam and his descendants for an injustice; and to work out his plan he puts an equal stain of injustice upon poor old Judas; and finally Jesus himself becomes disillusioned when he reaches his last gasp, so that God is still where he was when he condemned the first pair and all who came after for no reason whatsoever.

There are those whose faith will be rekindled if it can be shown that such a man really lived, just as there are children whose doubts are temporarily set at rest if they may go and see Santa Claus in the department store.

If it pleases some persons to nurse the desire for an historical Jesus, let them nurse it; but when they at last find him they may expect to find a character such as "Elijah" Dowie of Chicago or the inmate of some asylum who, having whiskers like Jesus, feels that he must necessarily be Jesus.

What is the use of building a story of wonder and supernatural happenings to show the marvelous power of this "Son of God" if in the end the structure must tumble about the ears of him who at last cried that he was forsaken?

The conclusion that any rational man will reach must be that, as an Irishman might say, Jesus was a myth even if he did have an actual existence.

The All-Important Question.

If the "Jesus Historical" has not been worn threadbare, to the exhaustion of all possible light that can be thrown on the question, we plead by way of review to be allowed to submit the following observations.

Those readers who have been following carefully this discussion will recall that Mr. Eccles contended that there was a real personage called Jesus, and known as the Christ, as a basic truth for the gospel stories, and he brought in Josephus as a historical authority.

Dr. Wakefield raised the point that the passages in Josephus alluding to Jesus were probably forgeries or interpolations, and asked the very pointed and telling question why, if those passages were originally to be found in Josephus, Origen did not make use of them in his debates with Celsus, when he was so hard pressed for historical data to establish this very point in controversy, the historicity of Jesus.

It was clear on all hands that Origen was familiar with Josephus, since he referred to him in other connections, and it was likewise clear he was oppressed by a scantiness of history to establish his contention; and if he did not avail himself of this history the conclusion is almost overpowering that these passages were not to be found in Josephus at that time.

Mr. Eccles denies that Origen did not refer to these passages in Josephus, but claims on the other hand he did so, and quotes direct from Origen to establish that fact, inclosing the quotation in proper marks, which enables us to see it and to judge for ourselves, the quotation being as follows: "I would say to Celsus . . . that one who lived but a little while after John and Jesus wrote how that John was a baptizer unto the remission of sins; for Josephus testifies in the eighteenth book of his Jewish Antiquities that John was the Baptist and that he promised purification to those that were baptized. The same Josephus also, although he did not believe in Jesus as the Christ, when he was inquiring as to the causes of the destruction of Jerusalem . . . ought to have said (italics Mr. Eccles's) that their machinations against Jesus was the cause of their miseries; yet, as one not remote from the truth said, 'these miseries befell' the Jews by way of revenge for James the Just, who was the brother of Jesus that was called the Christ." (T. S., Feb. 3, 1917.)

It is certainly remarkable that so accurate a debater as Mr. Eccles would put before us the above quotation to establish the fact that Origen relied upon Josephus to establish the historicity of Jesus, when its very inspection proves the opposite.

Mr. Eccles does intimate that Origen probably culled the "what ought to have been said" from some manufactured book, presumably of Josephus, that has not come down to us and whose forgery was probably detected, while Origen would imply that someone other than Josephus, whom he is careful not to intimate, had said what Origen should have said.

Unless there be some elision or other in Mr. Eccles's article to connect up his claim that Origen relied upon Josephus to establish the reality of Jesus, his answer to Dr. Wakefield's point is more of an evasion than a candid refutation.

As the debate now stands, the all-important question is this:

If there was a genuine passage in Josephus referring to Jesus the Christ at the time of the debate between Origen and Celsus, how does it come that Origen did not make use of it?

Dr. Wakefield says he did not; and if he did, let Mr. Eccles point out where he quoted the passage showing that he did so, and not one altogether impertinent to this debate, or give us some satisfactory reason why Origen did not refer to Josephus.

How Best to Use Time and Effort

Did Jesus live or did he not is a fruitless and a wearisome topic to discuss in this age of the world and in the presence of modern intelligence. Whether he did or did not is of no more importance to anybody, except a person so silly as to think he needs a savior to keep a God of love, justice and mercy from sending him to hell, than to know who struck Billy Patterson, or who the next preacher will be to go wrong. What difference does it make whether the trash and nonsense called Christianity can be traced back to a real Jesus or an ideal one, that some visionary conjured up when afflicted with religious insanity. The question for consideration should be: Is this ancient mess of absurdities, so disgusting to reason and common sense, true or not true. There is nothing about it that can stand the test of reason for one minute, and anyone who cannot be convinced of that fact in about fifteen minutes' use of rational thought is the victim of arrested development, deep-seated prejudice and unlimited credulity; or he does not dare to use his brains and accept the result of clear thinking. If it is possible to show such a person that his Jesus was not a real flesh and blood man, that will not stop him from retaining his hold on Christianity; he will still claim it to be a system of morals the world cannot afford to discard, for to do so, in his opinion, would be to invite disaster; so he has got to be shaken loose from the whole business by thoroughly dissecting its absurdities regardless of their origin.

I have no brains to wear out on such follies as trying to show that a system of religion that cannot stand before the bar of reason and successfully defend itself was the product of a man or a myth, or whether man or God made it in the remote past. It is the thing itself we want to get after, and when all efforts to combat Christianity are applied directly to its fool doctrines, better results will follow. A man who can really believe that an infinite God with power to control an infinite universe—which God-believers are coming more and more to accept—ever came out of the sidereal regions and lived for thirty-three years as a finite human being is not a sane and rational man, and as an intellectual opponent he is of no more account than a child just learning to talk. To argue or reason with an insane man is a most foolish waste of time. If a Christian is not sufficiently developed to have passed that stage of credulity, he cannot be reached by any mental force that Rationalism uses. Until the desire exists in a man's mind to think, to study and to investigate, he cannot be touched or influenced by anything that goes after his cherished and satisfying superstition. We can never hope to reach some persons, but there are large numbers who are slowly waking up and wanting to know whether their faith is well founded or not, and we should find great pleasure in convincing them that their mother's religion had some serious defects that impair its value.

People who are mentally dead because the faculty to reason was killed in childhood by the priest will not find any interest in Freethought propaganda; for, as Voltaire said of philosophy in his day, it soars over their heads. Vast numbers of the human species do not think and never will, and we must recognize that fact and waste no time on them, for there is a higher grade on which all progress is dependent; and, as the lowest grade simply reflects the mental action of those above them, in no other way will they ever be moved or lifted up. Imitation is their stronghold, and to do as they see others doing is the rule by which the incapables live, move and get through the world.

Only those who think and reason are of any benefit to progressive forces, and while it is a bit discouraging to know that a large per cent of the human family will never take to science or philosophy, or concern themselves much about the way society and government are run, we can tie to the great middle class with confidence that they can and will push the world along, for they are surely the great force that has done things in making modern civilization.

The printing press has so completely usurped the lecture platform that the man who talks to an audience is a back number. Ideas can be put forth a thousand times more effectively by the printer than the preacher or the public speaker, and to circulate good literature and to get people to read it is the thing to do, and on its success hinges the weal or woe of humanity. Instead of wasting time and efforts to keep up public speaking to the same old audience, all of whom are emancipated, Freethinkers should disseminate leaflets, pamphlets, books and papers in keen competition with religion and superstition, and use that method in preference to any other. Try to get into the public press on every possible occasion, for an idea sent forth in that manner is very likely to reach someone ready and waiting. We do not get any young people at Freethought lectures, but, if of the middle class, they do read the papers; that is about the only way we can reach them and get them started as Rationalists. Many papers these days receive and publish letters from the people and to the people, something very uncommon a few decades ago, and while some of them are very cautious about religious controversies, radical ideas get in that lead to a desire for wider range of thought; and, once a person gets the habit of thinking, there is no stopping-place until complete freedom is attained. Most writers of letters in this city reveal freedom from religious bondage, and the exchange of thoughts quickens mental activity in any community; so let the printer do your talking every chance you can get.

Book Notes.

It is a fact, generally recognized by educated and refined people, that the most serious indictment ever made against the character of the Roman Catholic church had reference to its lack of moral superiority, rather than to the improbability of its theology. It has been the practice of that church rather than its deistic theories that has awakened in the minds of men a fear lest its continued growth should prove to be a menace to public morals and to the permanency of state authority.

This lack of morality on the part of that church has not been a mere conjecture made by persons prejudiced against Catholicism, but a well-grounded judgment based upon the authoritative teaching of the church as set forth in the writings of its leading theologians. Among these theologians St. Alfonso Liguori occupies a position of marked distinction, and his Moral Theology is more extensively used, and his authority more frequently quoted, than any other doctor of the papal church. The moral teaching of the Roman church having been given to the world for the most part in the Latin language, it has rarely been accessible to anybody unfamiliar with that tongue. Translations have occasionally been made into the English, but for one reason or another they have not found their way into the places where they would do the most good in enlightening the judicious regarding the sinfulness of Romanism.

We have before us an excellent pamphlet of thirty-six pages prepared by Mr. H. C. Uthoff, bearing the title: "The Moral Casuistry of St. Alfonso Liguori." The purpose of the author of this work is to exhibit in outline the unethical character of the teaching of that "prince of moral theologians." He first presents by numerous quotations the facts as to the exact place occupied by St. Alfonso as an authority in the church. He shows convincingly that no teacher stands higher in the Roman church as a moral guide than the well-known founder of the Redemptorist Order. This he follows with a sketch of the saint's life, which is followed in turn with "Points in His General System."

This latter forms the body of the little work. It is here that the writer gives specimens of Liguori's unmoral precepts, and elucidates in a very interesting way the conditions which underlie the system known as Casuistry. That part of the work having to do with Mental Reservation is of striking interest, and will offer an explanation of many a peculiarity witnessed by us in the behavior of certain religionists. The quotations referring to adultery, drunkenness, falsehood, perjury and venial sin give a sufficient idea of the character of the moral theology that has dominated the church of Rome since Liguori issued his celebrated book in 1753.

In the closing section the writer makes some sensible remarks on Liguori's "Abandonment of Absolute Ethics," and draws certain conclusions, which are both practical and edifying. For a small work it is one of unusual interest and usefulness, and will be found very convenient for informing oneself at a glance of the distinctive features of Roman Catholic morality. It is followed by a sufficient index. Price, fifteen cents. Address the Truth Seeker Company.

A Mistaken Author.

It seems strange that in an age of printing and universal education a person holding a degree from the University of Pennsylvania should attempt to pose as a historian without at least securing his facts and quoting his authorities.

This was one of my lessons when attending school, but there are exceptions to all rules, and the two books, "Literary Philadelphia" and "Robert Morris—Patriot and Financier," by Ellis Paxon Oberholtzer, whose degrees came from the same university that conferred the degree of M.A. on Thomas Paine in 1780, are the exceptions. The writer simply records his prejudices against the principal patriots of the American Revolution. Of Thomas Paine he states in "Literary Philadelphia," page 95:

"The most violent of the literary representatives of the new philosophy was Thomas Paine. He could never write except with a decanter of brandy beside him. . . . His cleverness was evinced in 1776 by the astonishing success gained by his pamphlet, 'Common Sense.' The 'Farmer's Letters,' written eight years before, was a historical and legal argument; the other pamphlet empty rhetoric and addressed to men's passions. The one was addressed to men's reason and was the work of a substantial citizen of Pennsylvania of deep and sound learning; the other of an intellectual adventurer."

Which work produced the greatest results? Which work converted General Washington? I ask.

"The victory at Trenton General Washington freely ascribed to Morris's timely aid in supplying him with large sums of hard money. This and other patriotic acts were now forgotten."

What about Paine's "Crisis"? The historian must have overlooked them.

"When in Luxembourg prison, awaiting his summons for the guillotine, he spent his time writing an Atheistic work, the 'Age of Reason.'"

Oberholtzer deserves to rank with Teddy the Terrible. This deistical work's circulation today is 10,000 copies per year.

It is true, however, that his hero, Robert Morris, too suffered imprisonment in Philadelphia for three years six months and ten days, which shows the republic's ingratitude.

"What Voltaire was to the revolutionary movement in France, Franklin was considered to be in America."

"In this country there appeared a host of men possessed of the same views, such as Jefferson, Samuel Adams, Thomas Paine, Rittenhouse, Bryan Matlack and many others whose names are now unrecognizable at this day!"

If, like the author of these books, I believed in censorship, this so-called history would be placed under the ban.

JAMES B. ELLIOTT.

Joseph McCabe Speaks in Brooklyn.

On Thursday evening, March 1, Mr. Joseph McCabe of London delivered a lecture before the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences on "Stellar Evolution." While the subject was of special interest to the student of astronomy, it was none the less instructive to the ordinary layman.

The lecturer commanded the close attention of his audience for an hour and a half, during which he traced man's developing conception of the Cosmos, beginning with the Babylonian idea of an arched vault, through the Grecian thought and on up to the present day, with its faint realization of the stupendousness of the subject. He characterized as the distinguishing trait of the thoughtful mind today the ability to say "I don't know" as it faced the difficult problems being constantly proposed by nature. In the course of his lecture, Mr. McCabe referred to what he called the "flippant assertion so often heard of late that the nebular hypothesis has been discredited." To show the falsity of this statement, he pointed to the proven existence of not less than 250,000 nebulae now known to the astronomers. The United States, he said, is now foremost in the astronomical world, due to the great observatories, such as Yerkes and others, which have been located here.

In discussing the controversy that has raged about the existence of canals on the planet Mars, the lecturer said that while nothing definite was known on the subject, he nevertheless pinned his faith to Professor Lowell's idea, as he considered him the keenest observer and an astronomer who had the privilege of the use of one of the finest observatories in the world. The interest of the lecture was increased by the use of photographic slides, which Mr. McCabe brought with him from Europe. The audience, which numbered more than five hundred persons, was most generous with its applause.

Mr. Stanley J. Clark, a Freethinker, with whom we have not happened to come into communication, is having a good time in Texas debating with the local clergy. In Dallas, Texas, he lately took on the Rev. Joseph Warlick, a Christian elder, and discussed with him the fallibility or infallibility of the Bible in the city auditorium hall in the presence of "twelve hundred impartial persons," as the Dallas Dispatch reports. "A stop watch was held on the applause," says the same paper, "and it was found that the Agnostic 'missionary of Infidelity' was given just four minutes more appreciation than the Christian." At one point a woman, who does not appear to have been altogether impartial, arose and "shrilled": "God ought to strike you dead." She was addressing Mr. Clark, who merely remarked: "There's your Christianity." In imitation of Washington's biographer, the Rev. Dr. Weems, who used to sell the "Age of Reason" and its "antidote," the Bible, "a man went through the audience selling the 'Gospel Guide' with one hand and a book of Thomas Paine with the other. He didn't let his right hand know what his left hand did." Mr. Clark is booked to discuss the divine origin of the Bible at Blue Ridge, Texas, March 20 to 23, with Ben M. Bogard, a noted debater of the Baptist communion. We learn from Mr. Dwight Spencer of Coalgate, Oklahoma, that Mr. Clark is the undefeated champion of Rationalism in the Southwest.

There are said to be "200,000,000 of men" in Islam who pray constantly. The women must be awfully patient creatures to put up with them.

NOTES AT LARGE.

The Belgian's Children Fund is still soliciting "in the name of God." The motto is: "God reigns, and in his name the Belgian children must be fed."

It is intimated that if Americans fail in their duty toward these Belgian children, God is liable to do something to us that we won't like.

In such an event we shall know what to think of God, although at present our thought of him is that he does nothing to or for anybody.

The Christian deity, according to the conception of him that is held up for our adoration and worship, is an inexorable dispenser of punishment. He will punish us for our fault in not responding liberally enough to the relief of the Belgian children, but hardly so severely, we may hope, as he is now afflicting those children, who suffer through no fault at all.

We should like to have the Belgian Children's Fund explain its God and the reason for appealing to him. Admitting our derelictions and that we deserve and must prepare to receive divine castigation, we are yet curious to know why a God who has the capacity to take vengeance on Americans should not, if he is benevolent, employ that same capacity to take pity on these suffering children and relieve their wants.

That course would very much simplify the problem, since by feeding the children, whom he has allowed to be made destitute by the Prussians, he would never have thrown upon us the test of charity and the burden of dispensing it under the pains and penalties of his wrath.

One query follows another. If he reigns, why did he not shield the Belgian children in the first place, instead of marching with the German army, as we are assured he did by the kaiser, whose word, as a theologian, we have no more reason to question than that of any other revealer of God's will, purposes and movements in war time.

If God had the disposition to relieve the Belgian children, he could not make the plea of poverty as an excuse for not carrying out the best of intentions on the broadest scale. In this country alone property valued at some two billions of dollars ($2,000,000,000) stands in his name, with no tax on it. Could he move the trustees of this property to assess it at the rate paid by property not God's, a fund of say forty millions would result—enough to provide for the Belgian children as long as the war is likely to last.

We might call attention to the fact that the same causes that impose hardships on the children of the Belgians are pinching our own. The relief sent to other nations has put us in a position to be relieved. Last year's crops of vegetables was too small for the necessities of the world, and we are paying three prices for staples—5 cents per pound for potatoes, 15 for onions, 8 for cabbages.

Annually we have a day of national thanksgiving to God in view of abundant harvests. Were we not premature in thanking him last year, when the crop was too small to go 'round?

We have viewed this subject from all sides, and at no angle can we see where God comes in except as a derelict, or discover any relevancy in the assurance that he "reigns."

Since the European war broke out, every thoughtful person has endeavored to find a satisfactory explanation of the precise bearing that the war may have upon the future of Christianity, seeing that this great calamity arose among nations whose leaders and people generally are Christian. Cardinal O'Connell of Boston attributes the war to the widespread Infidelity among heretofore Christian nations, during the last fifty years. The ready answer to this view of the matter is that the men professing to be unbelievers were everywhere opposed to the war, unless such men as the emperor of Germany and the late emperor of Austria are to be looked upon as Infidels! No one knowing the facts of the case can doubt for a moment the religious character of the present war; it is not a case, as were the Crusades, of Christians attacking infidel nations, but it is plainly a twentieth century exhibition of how cruelly and dastardly certain Christian nations can make war upon other nations of the same religious belief. The cardinal is annoyed because the fact of almost all the warring nations being Christian is everywhere emphasized; and so to offset this consideration, he feels it necessary to confuse the situation by declaring that 'the monstrous outcry raised against religion because of this world conflagration is but the very outcome of a half century of Infidelity and war against religion.' This is but the old story over again of the identity of wickedness and Infidelity, which is the stock argument in use among Romanists to cover the infamous annals of the papal organization. The only means by which the Catholic church will ever be able to dim the heinousness of its own crimes will appear when it has completely established the overt wickedness of some institution baser than itself. We cannot imagine that this will ever be done. Contrary to the opinion of the prelate of Boston, Cardinal Gibbons of Baltimore thinks that war is perfectly compatible with Christianity, for did not Jesus say that he "came not to bring peace but a sword"? Apart from the lack of agreement between these representatives of Rome, it would seem that his Eminence of Baltimore is strictly correct. The intrinsic character of Christianity is undoubtedly martial. No religion has given such an unquestioned inspiration to war as has that religion. A great part of its nomenclature is derived from the military profession and from the requirements of state governments. Even its God is known as "the Lord of Hosts," who "teaches men's hands to war and their fingers to fight"; and its hymns are tuned to a soldier-like strain, as if penned in the atmosphere of militarism. If war be consonant with Christianity, then it is an act of the highest injustice to attribute its cause and maintenance as exhibited in the present European conflict to any source other than that growing out of the religion's genius for tyranny and persecution.

When the Rev. W. A. Sunday, America's most distinguished Protestant clergyman, addressed a woman's meeting in Erie, Pa., in 1911, the report of his remarks about the superiority of Catholic religious training over Protestant made him say:

"If a number of Catholic girls are taken and put in a room on one side of the hall and an equal number of Protestant girls are put on the other side, in a given time the Catholic girls would still remain virtuous, while the Protestant girls would every one be prostitutes." (See the Erie Dispatch, June 30, 1911.)

As it is a habit with Protestant ministers to concede the superior moral system of the Catholic church, the Rev. Sunday got away with his statement and was not rebuked until recently, when he came to Buffalo and an organization, doubtless an auxiliary of the Guardians, called the Protestant Girls' Defense League, wrote him a letter to inquire whether he had been correctly reported. At this time it is not known how the inquiry was received by the evangelist, or what was his response, if any. His monstrous statement is of course false, since statistics show that Catholic girls are as prone as Protestant to become prostitutes. Religion is no protection against misfortune. At the time Dr. Sanger wrote his "History of Prostitution" there were in New York more Catholic than Protestant women of this class, although the Catholic population was the smaller. In 1913, when a Moral Efficiency Commission in Pittsburgh numbered the fallen women of the city, there were about two-thirds as many Catholic as Protestant females among them, and Pittsburgh is a Protestant community. Ignorance and a weak mind, with lack of parental care, put girls on the street. But the Rev. Sunday never had any genius for facts or for correct statement when facts were known. His denial of the words attributed to him would be inconclusive.

The man of God whose curiosity or instincts lead him into forbidden places has an advantage over the layman when it becomes necessary to explain his motives. It happened recently that the police of Pittsburgh, in the course of the day's work, raided an alleged disorderly house, whose inmates, as the Song of Songs says, were black but comely. In their final search of the place, after rounding up three colored women and two white men, they discovered a third male Caucasian "in a bedroom trying to hide behind a trunk." Him they apprehended, to discover later that he was the Rev. Frederick A. Gould, pastor of the Mount Washington Methodist Episcopal Church. On his depositing $15 as a forfeit the prisoner was released and he did not appear at the hearing in the police court. To the public and before the official board of the church the Rev. Mr. Gould explained his mission in the house and behind the trunk. For many years, he observed, he had been a student of the saloon and social evils. We quote:

"Yesterday afternoon, after making several pastoral calls, I went to town for an umbrella left to be repaired, and, having time, went to the Hill district, going through several streets and alleys.

"Passing a house about 5 P. M. I was openly solicited, and, bent on getting evidence, in my unthinking zeal I went inside.

"Within five minutes the house was raided and I was arrested with the others. It was a most unwise thing to do to go alone into the place, and I have no other excuse to make than that given, and have already paid a penalty of keen suffering for my well-meant mistake in judgment. Naturally I was excited and frightened, and did not know what to do."

A sad result of unthinking zeal for virtue. The Rev. Mr. Gould's official church board accepted his account, as we do, and gave him assurance of continued confidence, while disapproving of his indiscretion in pursuing a vice crusade alone. But a layman would be obliged to furnish a better alibi than that he was simply sociologizing, or his friends would look upon him with speculative eye.

Professor Bacon of Yale was right in his sarcastic comments on the public press and the way an official denial of a misrepresentation is allowed to lag behind the original sensational report. On December 2 Professor Bacon gave an address at Haverford College, Philadelphia, in reporting which the newspapers said that he had characterized as a "forgery" a passage in Matthew dealing with the virgin birth, and had supported his view by citing "original manuscripts of the Bible." On January 2 the eminent Prof. Morris K. Jastrow, president of the society before which the paper was read, published in the Philadelphia Public Ledger a correction of the misreport. On February 3 THE TRUTH SEEKER published a letter by Professor Bacon from which it appears that on the occasion in question he did not touch the virgin birth at all. Despite all this, the newspapers and their correspondents up to the present time have not ceased to discuss the proposition, attributed to Professor Bacon, that the virgin birth is a forgery exposed in the original manuscripts of the Bible—as though any man on earth had the slightest idea what the said "original" manuscripts may or may not have contained, since we have nothing but changed and rewritten copies. Professor Bacon wrote in the letter published in this paper that he hoped soon to inform the public what he really did say; and THE TRUTH SEEKER, as the only newspaper so far as we know that has made an unsolicited correction of the sensational report, will be glad to learn.

It occurred to the Rev. Dr. Christian F. Reisner, a Methodist minister of this town, to ask a number of persons whether it is ever right to lie. Most of them gave qualified answers, such as its being a matter of conscience, but one Zoe Beckley said yes, "if by the telling of a lie something salvational is accomplished." This may be approval of lies told for the glory of God. Catholic moral theology admits of so many equivocations as almost to dispense with truth-telling altogether. Rationalists, we believe, do not concede the legitimacy of lying under any conditions; it disturbs the orderly processes of the universe. Huxley, we may repeat, said that if wife and son, fame and fortune, were taken from him one after another as a penalty, still he would not lie. But Huxley was devoted to things scientific, not salvational.

A newspaper clipping sent in by an Oklahoma subscriber tells how one Jim Stanley of Muskogee gave his wife a beating because she would not attend his church, and was fined one dollar and costs by the court. Husband and wife are Christians, but he belongs to the First Baptist Church and she to the First Christian Church. The lady told the court that while she was willing to let her husband and children attend Baptist services, she would "be blown" if he was going to take her there when she didn't want to go. She is of the stuff the martyrs were made of, and he of the material that gave martyrs a chance to become such. His dollar and costs will be returned to him, doubtless, when Christian zeal is rewarded with a heavenly crown.

It is an occasional diversion of Mrs. Marilla M. Ricker to vex the public library board of the town of New Durham, N. H., where she was brought up, with the offer of a set of the works of Robert G. Ingersoll. Her last offer was made in September, 1916, and she has a letter from the librarian, dated February 21, 1917, declining the gift. "We think on the whole," writes the librarian, "the sentiment is against our accepting your offer. We ourselves have no personal objections to them, but think it would not be advisable for us to put them in the library." Did somebody say that Ingersoll's work was completed forty years ago? In New Hampshire it has not reached the stage where they dare to read him and find out what it was.

It was announced from Philadelphia, on the strength of a call sent out by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, that on a recent Sunday "seventeen million church members" would pray that divine wisdom would direct the acts of President Wilson in the present international crisis. If President Wilson receives divine guidance, in what form will it present itself, and how will these seventeen million know whether he acted upon it or used his own bean? It is a foregone conclusion that, whatever Mr. Wilson may do under divine guidance, those not approving his course will be as ready to say so as though they had not by their prayers put everything in the hands of their god.

Of 1,923 inmates of the Arkansas penitentiary 49 declare they have no religion, or at least no denominational preference. According to the report of the State Penitentiary Commission, the sects are represented by the following numbers of adherents: Baptists, 859; Methodists, 622; Presbyterians, 205; Episcopalians, 71; Catholics, 76; Holiness, 39; Christian Scientists, 2. The report as condensed in the Arkansas Democrat notes that while nearly all occupations are represented in the penitentiary, newspaper men, dentists, lawyers and doctors are exempt. The clergy are not reported upon, but their sectarian followers make up approximately 90 per cent of the criminal class.

The "bone-dry" law passed by the Arkansas Senate exempts the clergy from its operation. This is Section 17:

"That nothing in this act shall make it unlawful (1) for any priest or minister of any religious denomination or sect to order and have shipped and delivered wine for sacramental purposes; nor for any common carrier, corporation or person to ship, transport, carry or deliver wine for said purposes to any priest or minister of any religious denomination or sect."

The section places no restriction on the amount a minister or priest may bring into the state. Perhaps the exemption is intended to encourage more young men to enter the ministry.

Humanity forbids the compiling of a "round-up" of persons who go insane over religion, but one day after another brings reports of enough to make one possible. This case is from the Binghamton, N. Y., Republican of recent date: "Miss Minnie Benson, 27 years old, an East End resident who has taken much interest in religious matters during the last few weeks, was taken to the State Hospital yesterday, violently insane. She is obsessed with the idea of religious uplift and continuously sings hymns and prays. She was a constant attendant at the tabernacle revival."

The call of the German-American pastors of Chicago for a day of prayer "to repent for America's share in the bloodguiltiness of war" sounds as if our hyphenated citizens were approaching their maker in a spirit of sarcasm. They may be sincere, but in asking God to restrain the nation from war while war is being thrust upon it is a useless agitation of the atmosphere.

The Texas legislature has declined to pass the bill, introduced and supported by the Baptists, providing for the inspection of monasteries and convents. For some undisclosed reason, the measure was bitterly opposed by Catholics, who ought to be pleased to show goods.

A prayer to God: Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive yours.

The $50 Prize.

It is too early for anybody to appear and claim the prize of $50 offered by Atwood Manville, our Missionary Editor, to the subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER who should in the next six months procure the insertion in any magazine sold on the subway newsstands in New York of a 2,000-word article attacking the Bible for its inaccuracy, immorality, contradictions, barbarity, and so on. An article by Mr. Manville himself, who is the author of "The People vs. the Holy Bible," was declined by a magazine editor on the ground that interest is no longer felt in the subject. How an editor could reach that decision without making the experiment is not plain. We are of the opinion that were the magazine editor to print a strong Bible-smashing essay, he would discover through the receipt of criticisms from the clergy and others that there was quite an excited interest in such articles—more, perhaps, than he would relish.

There is no lack of fairly good writers who would be glad to get $50 for an article of 2,000 words. Are there biblical critics, polemics, among them, or is such criticism a lost art?

OBJECTS.

It is the object of THE TRUTH SEEKER to educate the people out of religious superstition. It denies the inspiration and infallibility of the Bible, and asserts the human origin of that book. It denies the existence of the theological heaven and hell, but as to the existence and immortality of the soul neither affirms nor denies. It waits for evidence.

THE TRUTH SEEKER upholds the theory of Evolution, believing that to be the solution of the question of the origin, growth, and development of the animal kingdom, including man. THE TRUTH SEEKER believes that the answer to the questions Whence? and Whither? can be given only by Science.

THE TRUTH SEEKER holds that morality and ethics—or man's relation to man—are entirely independent of creed or religion, and are founded on rules developed by experience.

In current politics THE TRUTH SEEKER takes no side or part. In general it holds to the principles of freedom enunciated by the Founders of the Republic.

THE TRUTH SEEKER believes in Free Speech, Free Press, and Free Mail; in full discussion of all sides of all subjects, and affords those having new and worthy thoughts, clearly stated, a generous and welcome hearing, each contributor being responsible for his own opinion. We neither indorse an idea by printing it, nor condemn it by exclusion.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is the recognized medium of communication between the Liberals of the country, and is edited each week for their information, instruction, entertainment, and support against religious error and mental slavery and in maintenance of their equal civil and religious rights as citizens of the United States.

The Editor invites communications on the subjects to which these pages are devoted.

POLITICAL PRINCIPLES.

(THE NINE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.)

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in the Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privileges or advantages shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

BIBLE AND TRUTH

From B. A. Plummer, Iowa.

To the Editor of the Truth Seeker:

I see by the press that the Gideons are very persistent in an effort to place Bibles in the hotels throughout the country. The Gideons are no doubt sincere in thinking that they are doing a pious and charitable act, but from the standpoint of the scientists, Catholics, and students of sacred literature (see Encyclopedia Britannica) it is quite credulous, for none of these consider the Bible an authority.

You see it was like this: King James appointed a commission in 1607 consisting of forty-seven persons to translate, revise and formulate the Protestant Bible, and that commission finished their work in 1610.

The Catholic church is the Mother Church and therefore sponsor for the Bible. Now the facts are that the Catholic Bible has six more books than the Protestant Bible, and there are many differences too numerous to mention, besides at least one hundred square contradictions. The Bible tells incredible stories about Jehovah, God of the Jews, and also about some other noted Jews, like Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, et al. Jehovah sanctioned falsehood and deception, to wit:

And he said "I will go forth, and I will be a lying spirit in the mouth of all the prophets." And he said "Thou shalt persuade him, and prevail also, go forth and do so." "Now, therefore, behold the Lord hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all the prophets" (1 Kings xxii, 20-23).

"If the prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the Lord have deceived that prophet" (Ezek. xiv, 9). "O Lord, thou hast deceived me" (Jer. xx, 7). "Wilt thou be altogether unto me as a liar?" (Jer. xv, 18). "God shall send them strong delusions that they should believe a lie" (2 Thess. ii, 7). God said unto Adam: "In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." Adam lived to a good old age after that.

God commanded Moses to deceive Pharaoh, rewarded the midwives for their deception and instructed Samuel to deceive Saul. For her treason and lying Rahab is rewarded. Paul canonizes her as a saint. David, Elisha and Jeremiah, three of God's holiest men, were deliberate liars (1 Sam. xxvii, 8-11); (2 Kings viii, 7-15).

"Christ taught in parables that he might deceive the people" (Mark iv, 11-12). Paul says: "Being crafty I caught you with guile."

Jehovah's "chosen people" had a mania for killing, for when they were not slaughtering and roasting bullocks so that Jehovah might "smell a sweet savor" they were slaughtering their fellow men, and Jehovah would assist them by making "the sun to stand still for nearly a whole day" for Joshua to complete the slaughter of innocent people.

Again Jehovah shows how bloodthirsty he is when he commanded "Thou shalt smite every male with the edge of the sword; thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth." "Thou shalt utterly destroy them," "but the women and the little ones thou shalt take unto thyself" (Deut. xx, 16; Num. xxxi, 18).

Yet when it came to hard scrapping Jehovah wouldn't be in it with the Kaiser, for he "could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley because they had chariots of iron," while the Kaiser has driven out the inhabitants of several "valleys" and they had much worse things than chariots of iron (Judges i, 18).

It is the same today as it has been in the past. It is only the credulous or superstitious who accept the Bible as infallible authority.

I write this in the interest of the Truth, for "the Truth shall make you free."

NOTES CONCERNING PAINE.

From J. B. Elliott, Pennsylvania.

To the Editor of the Truth Seeker:

One of the most important publications in New York three score years ago, which lived about five years, was The Age of Reason, a liberal and independent paper, edited by Peter Eckler, Sr., and published at 21 Ann Street. It published the lectures, debates, etc., that were held by "The Society of Liberals," that met on Sunday afternoons at Eagle Hall, 26 Delancy Place.

This society celebrated the birthday of Thomas Paine with appropriate services in 1850. Gilbert Vale delivered his lecture on "Paine's Part in the Declaration of Independence," and at the meeting April 15 he announced that the Thomas Paine farm was advertised for sale, and that a committee was appointed to ascertain the price and terms. On the 15th of April following Mr. Vale announced that the Paine farm had been purchased for the sum $5,500, and $1,500 had been paid, leaving a balance due of $4,000.

He also announced that on the 4th of July there would be an excursion to the Paine farm at New Rochelle, and that a steamboat had been engaged to convey the excursionists, and carriages were to be in waiting to take them to view the monument erected in Paine's memory. A country dinner was to be served. Speaking, dancing and other amusements were part of the program.

The particulars of the first dinner in Paine's house to Liberals will be sent for the next article.

THE MARRIAGE TIE.

From C. H. Eshleman, Michigan.

To the Editor of the Truth Seeker:

In reply to a communication headed "Notes on the Marriage Tie," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 17, it should be stated that the marriage ideal is more than a man-made affair; it is a law of nature. It has its origin among the lower animals, but its highest development is seen in the life of humanity. It is the only method by which man and woman may fully render to each other the obligations involved in their relationship; the only method by which the father may be assured the offspring are his own; the only method by which children may receive of the care of those who bring them into the world, so that they shall have permanent homes, and loving and thorough training for the work of life. There are remarks in the communication to which I am replying that in order to exercise all possible charity I will assume are either not seriously meant or have not been grasped in their sinister significance.

If this writer has in mind a system that is an improvement over the marriage ideal and that fulfill the conditions of marital relationship and the welfare of the children, let him by all means fully explain it. Until then, the marriage tie is sacred. "Sacred" is not too strong a word. To regard it lightly is not only erroneous in theory; it is criminal.

HELL.

From Dwight Spencer, Oklahoma.

To the Editor of the Truth Seeker:

Rationalists every now and then fall into the happy mood of thinking all the believers in a genuine, real, red-hot hell have about died out, and that what few who still live are ashamed to say it out loud, that they believe in a hell fire.

My happy mood was given a jolt last week when I received a postal card from Mr. James Dotterer, of Inola, Okla., telling me "mammonism belongs to the lower regions, where a cubic inch of ice is worth a million dollars." Think of it, Comrades, writing such valuable information on a postal card! Well, I got busy right away. I wrote Mr. Dotterer, who by the way is a "Christian Socialist," and asked for information as to where this "lower region" was located, and stated I was thinking of going into the ice business next summer and would not object to having a few mammonized millions. I told him I never had gotten acquainted with God, but with mammonized dollars it was different. I have at least seen them at a distance and know their power. I didn't use a postal card in writing to Mr. Dotterer either. My communication was sealed.

Then Mr. Dotterer answered on another postal card and, among other things, said: "The rut you seem to be in will lead you straight to hell. However, methinks when you arrive at the gate the devil will not admit you. For you would monopolize his business." I henceforth got busy and penned the following letter, which is self-explanatory:

"Mr. James Dotterer:

"I am going to have you arrested if you don't quit writing to me on postal cards. Do you suppose I want everybody to know I am on the road to hell? Some people might take what you say for the 'honest gospel truth,' and then my standing in society would be destroyed. You want to be more careful in the future.

"Now, don't you give it away. I have got some designs on hell. I would capture it, if you would tell me where it is, and turn the poor devil and his little imps out on the cold, cold world. Then I'd move hell up to the North Pole and open up that region to settlement.

"I promise to grant you, Thomas W. Woodrow, and the rest of Bouck White's disciples a large tract of land, on which to try out your wonderful theories of Universal Brotherhood, Christian Socialism and the co-operative commonwealth. I promise to furnish this colony with free heat for a period of fifty years. At the end of that period, if 'hell ain't froze over,' possibly I'll extend the time."

MAN BEFORE RELIGION

From a Baptist Preacher, Alabama.

To the Editor of the Truth Seeker:

I am a very happy reader of your paper. My eyes were opened before I saw a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Their being open was why I saw it, but they get open wider as I go on seeing the paper.

To one who has never known anything but orthodoxy it would repel, and that is the only fear I have of the paper not becoming popular, except among those who are thinking a little. Poor things! You know they cannot help it. They were taught orthodoxy—it was ground into them just as it was into me. And I never would have gotten away from it if I had not fallen into the hands of science, the redeemer from superstition. I got this in a Denominational College after I was 35 years of age.

I will soon be 50. I have preached for twenty-nine years, and from my own experience my judgment is that public schools, where science is taught, and in our universities and colleges, which have to go deeper into that rich field, are the agencies to give relief.

My! how people need to be saved from religion—at least its products; and if from its products, then from it.

Most orthodox people think they are saved by religion, but since religions have developed such institutions, exercising such lordship over human life and work we must be saved from it. Not until about three years ago did I dare question a statement made in the Bible or a demand made by the church. I had doubts and suspicions, it is true, but to question was to invoke the hell-fire of God upon me.

About this time I began to think for myself on these questions. I reasoned in this way: If the Bible and religion have had a beginning and have grown up out of man's religious experience, then man is older than either, and had to exist before and independent of either. They are products, therefore, of man's effort to adjust himself to his environment and destiny; therefore, they are man-made. So then man and not religion is the creator.

Now which should be free, the institution created or those creating and receiving it?

LECTURE BY AN EX-PRIEST. From Libby C. Macdonald, Chicago.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

We've just had a most interesting lecture, "Why the Catholic Church Opposes Birth Control," with William F. McGee, ex-priest, as exponent of the question on Percy Ward's platform. It will be impossible to give any but brief extracts from it. Said Mr. McGee:

"In the year 2000, seventy-five years hence, when birth control will have been definitely established as a universal custom, the Catholic church, i. e., what is left of it, will tell the world that she inaugurated the scientific regulations that brought about this most wonderful reform. This has been her method in the past. Roger Bacon in the thirteenth century tried to inaugurate scientific methods of study. The church imprisoned him. She stood against the freedom of science and every art until they became the commonplaces of human life. Then she boasted that she was the mother of them all.

"Church opposition to what she called sin is very illogical. If the Christian theory is true, everyone should sin as much as possible. Redemption is free and pays for all sin. God's justice is satisfied and he has no right to ask more.

"From the great encyclical letters of Leo XIII, from Wynne's authorized "Christian Marriage," February 10, 1880, we quote the modern opposition of the church.

"Page 69: To decree and ordain concerning the sacrament of matrimony is, by the will of himself, so much a part of the power and duty of the church that it is plainly absurd to maintain that even the smallest fraction of such power has been transferred to the civil ruler."

"Page 71: Certain it is that in Christian marriage the contract is inseparable from the sacrament, and for this reason the contract cannot be true and legitimate without being a sacrament as well."

"The opposition of the church comes from:

"1. The early Manichean idea that marriage is unholy, indecent.

"2. The idea that woman is a shameless creature, the cause of all human woe.

"3. The instructive knowledge that with birth-control established the church will lose its control over women. This means the death of the church shortly.

"The inner consciousness of having done wrong and the knowledge that his wrong must be revealed to the confessor gives the church a powerful control over the minds of her children. It is analogous to the power which unscrupulous policemen hold over their stool pigeons.

"From St. Alfonso Liguori is the following:

"A man may beat his wife at will.
"A wife must bear children under circumstances which will cause disease and death.

"De Matrimonio et de Sponsalibus.
"He who embraces the religious state, abandoning a woman whom he has sworn to marry, does not sin, because in such a promise is always included the reservation of devoting himself to the priesthood."

"The man who seduces a woman by means of an oath to marry her, but without having any such intention, is not bound to marry her, especially if the woman is of a condition inferior to his—i. e. peasant girl and noble; or a poor girl and rich man."

"If the young woman did not know that her seducer was of better condition than her own, she has no right to demand of him what he is worth when he marries one of higher rank than she."

"Equally if the man fears loss by keeping his promise to marry someone, made under whatever circumstances, he may decline to fulfill it."

"In general a promise of matrimony may be broken for the sole reason that celibacy is preferable to matrimony."

"Ignorance allowed the church to make the body indecent from the neck down, so that modesty blushes with shame at the sight of the nude—that is Catholic modesty.

"Ignorance enabled the church to make the biological necessities of life filthy and sinful, so that thoughts, words, looks, emotions and desires are to be subjected to the scrutiny of a priestly confessor.

"In the last thirty months the world has lost nearly ten millions of lives, wasted the accumulated energy of the last forty years, and put a tax on our children and children's children which will be a curse for many future generations.

"As a suggestion for serious thought, let us question the wisdom of the mothers and fathers of the last sixty years in Europe. Let us ask ourselves seriously if the present war could ever have started if there had been universal birth-control of a scientific character. I doubt it very much.

"The church acquiesces in this war. She does not dare—she, the infallible moral guide of humanity—does not dare to do more than condemn the wrong in general terms. What have generalities ever amounted to? Why is she not able to focus the attention of the world upon the specific facts which caused the war, so that humanity as a whole may repudiate and destroy them?

"The church says birth-control is unnatural, and therefore immoral, sinful, base, harmful to individuals and to society, a menace to church and state.

"Let us say that nature is the greatest enemy of humanity. The only advance in civilization has come from the subjection and exploitation of nature by man.

"Nature is not wise; it is not loving, it is not economical, it is not moral. It is flaunting in its unchastity; its prodigality is not so much reckless as it is riotous. Its cruelty is savage, and 'red in tooth and claw.' Nature seems but a 'blind Cyclops, hurling stones of destiny, and not in fury.'

"Rev. Bertrand L. Conway, Paulist missionary, speaking to a packed audience at St. Mary's Church, made some exceptions to the marriage rites. He said:

"Some men have been known to marry while they were drunk. Indeed, some men would have to be drunk or they wouldn't marry at all. When I was a priest in New York a young woman of forty-eight came into the rectory one night with a young man of twenty-eight. The young man was profligate; he was very drunk."

WHAT IS A "REAL" CHRISTIAN? From C. J. Boren, Kansas.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Almost every time we pick up a newspaper we read where some propagator of the Christ doctrine has committed an atrocious crime. Rationalists will point to the circumstance and say to the believer: There is your Christianity! But whenever we charge these crimes, with which history's pages are covered, up to Christianity, our friends, the Bible apologists, will exclaim, Yes, but that is not "real" Christianity.

I ask the question, then, What is "real" Christianity? Our religious brothers in America say that the war in Europe was not caused by Christianity but because the people there are not "real" Christians. We ask, then, at the end of 2,000 years' teaching how many real Christians are there on earth? We often wonder what it takes to constitute a real Christian. To believe in the Darwinian theory of evolution is to be a disciple of Darwin. To be a disciple of Christ or a Christian one would have to believe in and follow the teachings that are said to have been taught by Christ. Let us examine some of the commands of which he is said to be the author. "He that hateth not his father and mother, his brothers and sisters, yea, he that hateth not even his own life, cannot be my disciple."

Any man who could look into the eyes of his old gray-haired mother, who had suffered death that he might live, and hate her, is not worthy of life, here or anywhere else. And yet to be a "real" Christian one must not only do this but must leave all your loved ones behind and take up your cross and follow on. Just pause and think of the homes that have been broken up, of the deserved wives and hungry children that are the result of this monstrous fraud. There is a white woman lodged here in the city jail. She was arrested in the suburbs of the city, in a haystack for keeping company with a negro man. I went to see her and talk to her, and as I gazed at her faded hair and wasted form, I said to myself: she must be a Bible victim! I asked her if she had ever been married and she said yes, and that she was the mother of three children who are now in the orphans' home.

She said she believed the Bible and that if it was not for that book we would not know anything. But who can blame her. She has been taught that the Bible is the word of God, and the Bible sanctions adultery. I believe that anyone of ordinary intelligence, after having read and just half studied this aged lie will agree with me that there is not, and never was such a living thing in existence as a "real" Christian.

The most infamous crimes of which there is any historic record are sanctioned by this book.

To-day we see a mighty nation bowing its head to this gruesome and bogus doctrine.

Europe to-night is a scene of professed Christianity; what would it be if we had the real stuff?

O good people of America, when will you awake and realize that the progress of the world is not due to Christianity, "real" or otherwise, but to those who have opposed it?

AGNOSTICISM AND SPIRITUALISM.

From P. O. Hopkins, Ohio.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

May I say a few words to my good friend, Mr. Thomas, regarding his ideas of Spiritualism and Agnosticism?

He says Agnosticism with him was only a belief. That being the case, little wonder he was not satisfied with his "belief." But Agnosticism is more than a belief; it is an absolutely proven condition, for it has been demonstrated beyond any doubt whatever that no man knows or can possibly know anything whatever about a condition beyond life here. Reason and science tell us death here is the end of all intelligence so far as the individual is concerned; but that is Atheism and, as reason and science can not penetrate beyond the things seen and touched, Agnosticism takes the more conservative and positive position that any intelligent existence after life here has ceased is unknown and unknowable and not simply a belief; for believing or disbelieving a thing is of no value whatever so far as evidence is concerned.

It is evident, therefore, that you were not an Agnostic, but believed you were until a great sorrow overtook you. You had never delved deeply into the subject, but merely scanned or scratched the surface. For there is nothing more consoling on losing dear ones than Agnosticism. We know they are not tossing in a fiery hell or playing on a harp surrounded by the murderers and persecutors who have gone before.

Now as to Spiritualism, I know many kind, sincere and honest people who are firm believers in the cult and I respect them just as I do all people who are honest in their opinions. But, from my own experience in trying to get into Spiritualism, I am satisfied they are mistaken, although many of them are intelligent and educated.

The writer has investigated considerably along that line, but has never been able to discover any fact or "condition" that convinced him he was talking to, or receiving messages from, departed friends. I have attended public lectures and seances as well as private seances, and they have at all times appealed to me as being just about as worthy of acceptance as the old purgatory and hell-fire-and-brimstone doctrines of the orthodox pulpits. One thing I like about the Spiritualists, however; they are quite tolerant and do not condemn those who differ from them.

Undoubtedly, Brother Thomas, you have merely a belief that Spiritualism as taught by its adherents is a fact, but facts and beliefs have little relation. Then why not dig deeper into the questions and endeavor to arrive at a rational conclusion? Really, I hope and wish that Spiritualism is the unadulterated truth, but until the disembodied spooks come forth in a convincing manner, I must remain outside the pale of the adherents.

A SCIENTIFIC QUESTION.

From S. A. Bassett, Kansas.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

As a subscriber who has not the research to read up and find out the answers to ideas absorbed in or from your paper, I would like to ask the following of Mr. Russell or David Eccles or any posted man: Given matter in motion (falling bodies), will not the resulting energy produced thereby, sufficiently alternate matter to make the two elemental conceptions inseparable? That is, matter may be so attenuated by force that the electron, a product of energy, can not be distinguished from matter.

THE CATHOLIC ATTITUDE.

From Charles Hunt, Illinois.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Your reply to Catholic Critic, Jan. 20, shows the Catholic attitude. The church is so scared that the smallest objection is sinful. I know of a Catholic who returned some correct quotations from a pope with this written across: "You poor fool." How this applies to people who fairly quote, I cannot tell. The church could be destroyed in a year if actual quotations from popes, prelates and editors, were spread broadcast.

IMPRESSIONS OF A MAN AT SIXTY.

When we pass sixty stages
In life's short span;
Of the three score and ten
That's allotted to man;

We may get sorely kicked
From pillar to post;
If we don't cash in
And give up the ghost.

As young people think They're superior to old,
At about the same ratio
That brass bears to gold.

We come to this world
Without any say;
And most will pass out
In the very same way.

Some have led lives
That were not lived in vain,
By spreading true sunshine
For heart aches and pain.

But some have been zealous
For their own selfish greed,
While some who were lazy,
Their brains went to seed.

Yet most do their best,
But for reasons unknown;
They try hard, but fail.
Is the fault all their own?

Perhaps there was used
The wrong kind of clay,
And our heads weren't fashioned
In just the right way.

If all are not equal,
What's wrong with the plan?
Is it fault of the maker,
Or fault of the man?

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

Gerritt Smith, March 6, 1797—December 28, 1874.

This abolitionist and great Freethought philanthropist was born in Utica, N. Y., March 6, 1797. His father, Peter Smith, was at one time associated with John Jacob Astor in the fur trade, and became afterward the largest landowner in New York. Mr. Smith graduated in 1818 from Hamilton College, Clinton, N. Y., with the highest honors of his class, excelling as a student and an orator. He studied law, more with the intention of using it as an aid to him in business than to practise it.

GERRITT SMITH.

He fell heir to his father's vast estates, which lay in forty-two out of the then fifty-nine counties of New York. He was a model business man, prompt and thoroughly honest. As an instance of the latter quality, in 1837, owing to failure to collect his rents, and fearing that he might be compelled to sell valuable property, he traveled to New York city and approached his father's old partner, John Jacob Astor, for a loan of $250,000. That tight-fisted old Dutchman complied, taking only Mr. Smith's verbal promise to pay. In due time the debt was liquidated. While rich from the cradle, Mr. Smith early came to the conclusion that it was an injustice to the propertyless for one man to hold so much land. In 1842 he started to give away 200,000 acres, in small farms of fifty acres, to deserving white and colored people, often aiding them to erect homes thereon. He was by this not only a pioneer land reformer but a practical one. He established and supported the Oswego Orphan Asylum and made large contributions to Hamilton College. In 1857 he established a colored farming community in Essex County. So much did he give away to deserving poor people that when he died he did not have one-eighth as much as when he started in life. And yet, in spite of his works and the works of others we have mentioned and will have occasion to mention in this department, Christians continue to ask the old question, "What have Infidels done for the good of the world?" They certainly ask it from either pure mendacity or hopeless ignorance. In 1824, Mr. Smith married a second time, his wife being a Miss Fitzhugh of Maryland, whose father was a slaveholder. This brought him into contact with slavery and made him an Abolitionist. At first he believed that the only proper solution of the slavery question was by the colonization of slaves. He joined a society for that purpose and became one of its officers. Later he changed his views, holding that the negro should not only be free, but should remain in the United States. From this time on the abolition cause had the benefit of his time, ability, eloquence and money. In 1852 his friends invited him to become an independent candidate for Congress. He did so and was elected, notwithstanding that both the Democratic and Whig parties had already nominated their candidates. He was a supporter of John Brown of Osawatimie, without knowing that Brown intended violence. Yet, when Jefferson Davis was imprisoned for two years, Mr. Smith with Horace Greeley and several others went on his bail bond. But not slavery alone demanded his attention. He was an equally strong opponent of the use of both tobacco and liquors. He preceded our modern "peace advocates" in his opposition to war by almost three-quarters of a century. He believed that women had the same rights as men, including the right to hold property and vote. He worked for prison reform, and sought the establishment of juvenile reformatories, and always aided education in a substantial manner. His home in Petersboro was an open house, being always filled with guests, white and black, most of whom were there by their own invitation. His death occurred December 28, 1874.

Of Mr. Smith's religious views, Appleton's Annual Encyclopedia for 1874 says: "When a young man Mr. Smith became connected with the Presbyterian church. . . . In 1850 his views on religious subjects . . . were modified, enlarged and changed. His new belief found form in the religion of Nature, or what he called 'Rationalism.' He was a subscriber to the Boston Investigator, and once in renewing his subscription he wrote the publisher: 'Bad as some people think your paper, nevertheless I read it, and I think I read it with profit.' In 1864 Mr. Smith published a book called 'The Religion of Reason,' from which we quote two extracts:

"A religious creed is entirely proper. Every man should have one. But a church creed is improper."

"Many clergymen are among the best of men. Nevertheless, such an order is wholly unauthorized and exceedingly pernicious. Their assumption of an exclusive right to teach religion makes the teachers conceited, dogmatic, arrogant, tyrannical; and their hearers lazy in mind and slavish in spirit."

Let Christians name their best men and Freethinkers can more than duplicate any one of them with Gerritt Smith. His biography has been written by O. B. Frothingham.

Other events of which the past week is the anniversary are:

March 4, Inauguration Day.
March 5, Laplace, Atheist and astronomer died, 1827. Foote, Ramsey and Kemp sentenced to 12, 9 and 3 months imprisonment for blasphemy. London, 1883.
March 6, Davy Crockett died, 1836.
March 7, Sir John Herschel born, 1792.
March 8, H. W. Beecher died, 1887. Sir William Hamilton born, 1788.
March 9, Gall, founder of the system of phrenology born, 1758. Mirabeau born, 1749. William Cobbett born, 1762.
March 10, Mazzini, Italian patriot, died, 1872.

Editorial Courtesy.

It is said that the return of a manuscript to its author may imperil the life of the Chinese editor and that only by the invariable use of the most gracious, courteous and apologetic language can he expect to avert the awful wrath of the contributor whose manuscript is declined, and save his own editorial head from swift decapitation. The following letter from a Celestial editor, accompanying the return of a manuscript, surely denotes tactfulness and a realization of the direful consequences if the recipient took offense thereat:

"Most honored brother of the sun and the moon: Your slave is prostrate at your feet! I kiss the ground before you, and implore you to authorize me to speak and live. Your manuscript has permitted itself to be looked upon by us, and we have read it with enchantment. I swear on the tomb of my ancestors that I have never read anything more exalted. It is with fear and terror that I send it back. If I allowed myself to print this treasure, the president would immediately order me to use it forever as an example, and forbid me to dare to print anything inferior. My literary experience enables me to declare that such literary pearls are only created once in ten thousand years, and this is why I take the liberty of returning it to you."

Paradise for Cohen.

Barney Bernard, the Hebrew comedian, says a friend of his, named Cohen—when Barney tells a story his friend is always named Cohen—dreamed that a coreligionist died and went to Heaven, arriving at the Pearly Gates simultaneously with a person of color.

As Saint Peter swung the portals ajar the black man scrooged in.

"My son," said the good Saint, "you are about to receive your reward for your good deeds done in the flesh. In addition to welcoming you into Paradise I have the power of bestowing upon you one great gift. What is your dearest wish? Speak and it is yours."

The newly-arrived rolled his eyes in earnest thought.

"Well, suh," he said at length, "ef 'tain't too much trouble I believes I'd lak to have a millyun dollahs."

Instantly the fortune was in his arms. As he stood there dumfounded by his good luck, tongue-tied with astonishment, and popeyed with joy unutterable, Cohen's compatriot slipped gently into the Celestial precincts. To him Saint Peter turned.

"My son," he said, "what is your wish?"

"Not very much, Mister Saint Peter," said the latest comer. "All I want is fifty dollars' worth of phony jewelry and halluf an hour alone with that colored gentleman."

Interested Politeness.

A bright-eyed little boy in a sailor-suit saluted the occupants of a passing motor-car so quaintly that they stopped to give him sixpence.

"You're very polite, little fellow," the lady motorist said. "Do you salute all the strangers who pass in the same way?"

"No, no, ma'am, only motorists," the boy stammered, fingering his sixpence nervously. "Father says I've to be polite to them, because motor-cars bring him trade."

The lady seemed disappointed.

"What is your father's trade, my little man? Does he repair motor-cars?"

"No, ma'am; he's an undertaker," was the little fellow's response.—Tit-Bits.

College Boys Growing.

Measurements by scientists bring out the interesting fact that the American college athlete of today is a much larger man than his father was, and is constantly growing. The average height of the Yale athlete today is an inch and a half more than it was five years ago; he is 22 pounds heavier, with three inches more chest development and 42 cubic inches more lung capacity; the average height of the Yale athletes is now 5 feet 9.9 inches and their weight exactly 170.5 pounds. At an examination of Harvard athletes Professor Sargent found that they were an inch taller and from four to five pounds heavier than were the students of thirty years ago.—New Bedford Mercury.

Answered One Anyhow.

An applicant was undergoing a civil service examination. With a view to testing his knowledge of history, the examining officer asked him what he knew of the Punic wars. "The name sounds familiar," said the applicant, "but I can't just remember when it was or where it happened." "Don't you know anything about Scipio?" "No, sir." "Surely you have heard about Hannibal?" "Oh, yes, I know all about Hannibal. That's where Mark Twain used to live."—Youth's Companion.

His Part.

"So you confess that the unfortunate young man was carried to the pump and there drenched with water? Now, Mr. Fresh, what part did you take in this disagreeable affair?"

As the Angels.

The late John Townsend Trowbridge, author of "Darius Green and His Flying Machine," had a plain way of expressing himself.

A girl asked Mr. Trowbridge's advice one day about marrying an impecunious young poet.

"How much does he make?" Mr. Trowbridge asked.

"Oh," said the girl, "he only makes about $6 a week. He's no pay-your-own-way poet. But," she added, fervently—"but he says he will treat me like an angel."

Humph," said Mr. Trowbridge, "I suppose so. Nothing to eat and less to wear."

Unstable Knowledge.

General Butler was at one time a member of a commission to examine young applicants for admission to the bar, and before him came a youth who failed. Finally, Butler asked: "What would you like to be examined in? You have failed in everything we have suggested." The reply came, "Try me on the statutes; I'm up to them." Butler shook his head solemnly. "My friend," he said, "I'm afraid you won't do. You may be ever so familiar with the statutes; but what is to prevent a foolish legislature from repealing all you know?"

A Skilful Mixer.

When it comes to mixed metaphor the prize must be awarded the San Francisco afternoon paper which decorated its front page with the line: "Congress Casts Net in 'Leak' Probe." The fellow who can stick a probe in a leak and then haul the thing in in a net deserves a higher job than writing wood-type headlines.—San Francisco Star.

THE FREETHOUGHT BADGE PIN

Dedicated to all honest men and women—to those who can and are willing to reason—who constitute the grand army of progressive thinkers throughout the world.

An Emblem of Freedom and Progress

Represents no lodge, order or society, but is designed as a token of recognition for progressive minds of every shade of thought.

All claiming to be free from superstition, all who base their belief upon science and reason, should wear this emblem to speed the grand work of emancipating humanity from the thralldom of mental darkness.

This is conceded by artists and the trade to be the most beautiful Badge ever designed. Being a practical jeweler and designer of emblems of every description, as well as an enthusiastic worker in the cause of human progress, Mr. Wettstein has succeeded in combining in this badge the great want of this age and the future. It represents the Burning Torch of Reason, the Rising Sun of Science and Freethought, beautifully enameled in brilliant colors in contrast with the Night and Darkness of Superstition, enameled in black, and symbolizes the evolution of the world from the Night of Superstition to the Day of Freethought, Science and Reason.

"A pin whose torch and golden sheen,
Would grace the breast of Sheba's queen;
And will lend grace in coming time
To queens of beauty more sublime."
(Impromptu by Eliazur Wright.)

As a token of recognition among Liberals of every shade of thought, either at home or abroad, it is especially valuable.

Made in two styles and by best workmen in the most artistic and substantial manner.

Considering amount of gold and artistic workmanship in the badge, no other badges in the world are sold so cheap. They will last for generations to come and increase in popularity and value until fear and superstition exist no more.

THE LETTER BOX.

HERLICK.—Yes, the papers you name are getting THE TRUTH SEEKER. The Mission to the Editors works well. One paper of wide circulation to which this journal goes under that plan contained three quotations in a single issue.

J. G. JEFFRIES, South Dakota.—Do not let the likelihood that we have already seen an article of interest deter you from sending it along. Better it were duplicated than missed. The piece you forward has furnished the editor with a text.

W. J. S., Richmond Hill, N. Y.—Your letter is received and referred to the parties most in interest. Thank you. The typographical appearance of THE TRUTH SEEKER is a matter of deep concern to us, and if it were permitted we should be glad to make it the best specimen of the printer's art in the world.

A. D., MARCKRES, Vermont.—The three 1883 copies of the Boston Index are welcomed, and worth reading. Our pleased attention was attracted by this item: "Mrs. Ralph Waldo Emerson wishing at one time to have the children christened, Mr. Emerson said he would not object, whenever a minister could be found to christen the children who was as good as they were."

A. C. S., Alabama.—When a correspondent does not wish to attach his name to a communication printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER, we do not furnish his address to anyone. We only forward letters addressed to him in our care. It is for him to choose whether he shall reveal himself to his correspondent. Of course when you get a letter from someone in a distant state it looks as if he had got your address, but such is not the fact. The superscription was written here.

C. E.—Older Freethinkers like you (and like us) were introduced to the evidence against the historicity of Jesus forty years ago. We find it as new to younger ones now as it was to us then, when the standard books on the subject were those written by the Rev. Robert Taylor, long before the days of Robertson or Drews or W. Benjamin Smith. It is the penalty of living past middle life that we must read so much that we have read before; but knowledge is not transmitted by inheritance, and as a consequence the facts must be repeated for the benefit of the younger generation as they were for ours.

W. I. H., Washington.—There is a Free-thought society in Seattle, meeting weekly. The president is L. A. Wheeler, 1330 First avenue. A preacher who has become a convert to Freethought and is prepared to lecture might interest the brethren there. But lecturing does not seem to be greatly in vogue at present. Unexplainable changes take place. There used to be lecture bureaus that laid out country-wide circuits for lecturers, but they have passed, and probably could not be revived. If you wish to lecture to Freethinkers you might introduce yourself to them by submitting some of your work for publication in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

H. M., M. D., Illinois.—It is related that R. D. Blackmore, author of "Lorna Doone," wished to say in his preface, "The writer neither dares nor desires to claim for it the dignity or cumber it with the difficulty of a historical novel." The proofreader inserted a letter n before the or; the author marked out the n, but another proofreader inserted it again, and the word was printed as nor despite the author's struggles. It was the kindly offices of the printer or proofreader on THE TRUTH SEEKER that caused, despite our efforts, the name of the church father in the heading of one of your articles to be printed Origin instead of Origen. We carefully marked in the e, but the informed and conscientious workman was not to be misled, so "Origin" was retained.

Marriage law reform is a subject which is likely to assume greater prominence in the near future. DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

When Women Become As Men

Mr. Babb, you are welcome to my little band of opponents. May you long swell their number!

Your first statement regarding me, while strictly to be classed as denunciation, yet contains a compliment for which I thank you. You say: "... If an individual is suffering from mistaken ideas, obsessions and general incompetency as to scientific data, facts and mistaken historical conceptions, she is one." Your admission that I am suffering from general incompetency as to "mistaken historical conceptions," while a compliment paid in a rather unusual form, is yet one for which I appreciate. Again, thank you. I have ever sought to achieve incompetency in this particular direction, and your observation is encouraging.

Having made this personal recognition, I relapse into the conventional third person and get along with my refutation.

Says Mr. Babb of me: "Her attempts to show that woman is physically inferior to man are but pure abstractions. In remote times she was the physical equal of man." Of certain peoples, this was and is still true, but, unfortunately for Mr. Babb's contention, we are not dealing with the hefty females of New Guinea or Patagonia, but with the degenerate, neurotic and hysterical females of the so-called most advanced country on earth. From scientific statements made in the paper Physical Culture one may learn that the modern woman to be man's physical equal must be 25 per cent stronger than he, to compensate for her inferior development. If it were the Patagonian and New Guinea ladies who were clamoring for Political Freedom, I should say: "Mesdames, physically you are parallel with man; prove but your mental equality and the vote is yours." But, dealing with the hyper-civilized white woman, with her race-suicide doctrines; her frailty and nervousness that render twilight sleep a necessity; her flighty-minded divorce facilities, most numerous where woman has a voice in the legislature; her wild and wanton waste in dress, revealing as it does a hysteria and craving that she has not the brains sensibly to satisfy; her degenerate elevation of pet dogs to the rank of babies; her insane cult of every new and fantastic philosophy and philosopher that comes along; her relegation of her husband to the role of meal ticket; her superstitious support of doctors in default of brains to evolve a rational diet on which to build the bodies and minds of those whose health depends solely upon her efforts; her church-going propensities; her penchant for erotic novels and moving pictures; all these things cause me to say to my sisters: "We are not fit. Happy are the few among us who realize that fundamental fact; for we, although unfit, are not fools."

Then comes this mysterious observation: "It appears to me that women are nearly emasculated at the present day in so far as sex function is concerned, and this is due to our ignorance of things sexual." So women are "nearly emasculated!" Nearly! If this be so, then I fear that most of our men folks have been most unkindly deceived. But surely Mr. Babb cannot have looked up the word very recently or he would know that emasculation is an attention possible to be paid to the male sex alone, and from which the vagaries of Nature have inevitably excluded us. I cannot deal further with this remark of Mr. Babb's, as his strange use of the term to which I have referred, renders his meaning ambiguous; but if he will consult his dictionary and revise his sentence according to the definitions that bind him, I shall be pleased to thresh this point out to a finish.

Now, let us see. "These characters (i. e., those I chose to illustrate my argument of woman's incapacity for position of public responsibility) are made to represent woman in the past, present and future. One can take female characters from past history and show that woman is the embodiment of all the virtues and wisdom possessed by the race. ... There is no logic in this style of argument." And, pray, do we not take men of history as representatives of men in the past, present and future? Do we not cite Washington, Lincoln, Napoleon, Nero, Machiavelli as eternal types to which men may rise or fall, according to their particular individual traits and opportunities? And as to the women of history whose careers shine out as apotheoses of female virtue, who are they? Not they who actively reigned or ruled. Wherever a queen has been on the throne, she has been the puppet of her favorite courtiers, a victim of her own vanity; and whenever a monarch has been dominated by a feminine hand behind the throne, as in the case of the four last Capets, the result has been even as was that in the case of France—degeneration, revolution and disaster. The women who stand out happily in history are those who filled some place suited to their feminine attributes, to the peculiar and proper scope of womanly activity—the mother of Alfred the Great; Florence Nightingale; the famous women of France's revolutionary period, who attracted to them and encouraged all the brightest wits of their day, not in emulation, but in that wonderful counter-attraction and encouragement that spring from intercourse between womanly women and manly men. Queen Victoria is often cited as a great queen. She was—in this way, that she did not interfere with the dealings of the intelligent men of her reign; that she did not obstruct their paths with feminine vanity, or impose upon their activities the embargo of her limited female apprehension, so preventing or forbidding service in her country's welfare. Her usefulness as a queen lay in her inactivity in public life, and not in any positive capacity. As a woman she was of the old school, autocratic and intolerant, but happily for England she displayed the opposite of these characteristics as a queen.

Here is a sentence: "It is true that woman in the past has produced but a few great characters as compared with man, and this because of her subjection." I am not going to make any unfeeling criticism of this statement; I am just going to transpose its terms. "It is true that because in the past woman has produced but a few great characters as compared with man, therefore her subjection." That's all.

Mr. Babb thus adjoins us: "Let us try the experiment of taking a group of young females and raising and educating them as the male is educated, and the product will be masculine as masculine standards go." George Eliot once said: "Prophecy is the most gratuitous form of error"; and lest it appear illogical for me to quote one of my own sex, let me here say that Frederick Harrison in his "Life of George Eliot" draws attention to the fact that she treated the whole Feminist movement with utter disregard, and in so far established her right to be quoted as a woman possessed of enough sense to warrant quotations from her spoken or written words. Therefore, Mr. Babb is indulging this particular form of error when he predicts that a new system of education is going to eliminate from girls menstruation and maternity, with the corresponding mental conformation and limitation produced by the exercise of these functions.

But in a wild flight of fancy, let us for the moment assume that Mr. Babb is right. In the name of Nature, what use will such females be, either in the economy of Nature or Society? As the old saying has it, they will be neither "fish, flesh nor good red herring." Can not the strenuous advocates of equality between the sexes see the insult they hurl at the very sex they pretend to uphold, when they practically say: "Women, you're not a bit of use as you are, but wait until we make you just like us, then you'll be all right." Happily, nature herself is against their unseemly project, and she, the infallible and logical mother, will prevent her silly children from their self-damnation.

It appears to me, also, Mr. Babb, that "modesty in the sexes is about evenly divided," but you do not hear men boasting of their superiority in this respect, while with women it is most sickeningly asserted as a self-evident fact.

There is a strain of Christian charity within me that makes me thankfully happy that I addressed my challenge exclusively to the ladies, for, while I did so solely because until then my adversaries had all been of that sex, and with no desire to obviate the intervention of my masters, still the limitation successfully prevented Mr. Babb from the futile search that his acceptance of my gauntlet must have occasioned him. Ladies, your male champion's acceptance of my glove was a mere feint, and the list is still open to you. With lance in rest, I wait.

MARY MONICO.

PATRIOTISM.

THE TRUTH SEEKER editorial on our national obligations does not seem to me to be sufficiently patriotic. My forbears were officers in the Civil, Revolutionary and Colonial wars, and my great grandfather was one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, so the spirit of patriotism should be in my veins. However, there is evolution in patriotism as in all else, and the spirit that impels one to work for his country's good may be manifested in other ways than those formerly considered essential. A hundred and fifty years ago it was necessary for a gentleman to resent any insult, real or imagined, by challenging the offending party to a duel, but such an absurd idea of honor has disappeared. Nations have not yet become emancipated from this fallacy and still believe that a declaration of war satisfies their honor better than a declaration that they are unalterably opposed to war. The United States has suffered many losses on the seas, and has taken no belligerent steps toward reprisals, and has been abused by many of our own citizens for such passivity, but can any one doubt that we are considered by the majority of "civilized" nations more honorable than the country that has shown the greatest military prowess?

Everyone is entitled to defend himself; that is, he has the right to love himself; but love of his family is finer than that, and love of his country is still finer, and love of humanity is the noblest of all. When it is said that an attack upon one of our ships is practically an invasion, that is right in one sense, but such an attack, outrageous as it is, is an incidental aggression not aimed primarily at us, and our verbal protest is a record of our disapproval. If we can accomplish the abandonment on the part of others of their outrages by war, there may be some excuse for a declaration of war, but when England's great fleet has not been able to stop the submarines, how shall we be able to do so? After all, if we enter the war it will not be for humanity but for ourselves, so the comparative cost to ourselves is a fit subject for discussion. Even in the Spanish war, the slogan was "Remember the Maine" rather than "Remember the maimed." To save a few hundred lives, we would sacrifice thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands of lives of our citizens, and risk acquiring the same spirit of hate that war necessarily engenders.

Our honor is safe if we act honorably, and it is debatable whether we may not be of greater service to humanity by standing steadfastly by our principles and encouraging both sides to adopt disarmament than by adding our force, which is comparatively ineffective at a distance of three thousand miles. PACIFIST PATRIOT.

SUFFRAGE AND GOD.

"Ohio, like Illinois, grants women the privilege of voting for President, but New Hampshire still hesitates." This item I copied from a New York paper. Do you want to know why New Hampshire hesitates? It is simply this. New Hampshire and all New England have not yet outgrown Puritanism. Its dark shadow still casts a gloom over our land. According to the Christian Bible, man was made first, and woman was an afterthought, and afterthoughts must bide their time. It seems to me that it is time for afterthoughts to come to the front and be recognized politically, but there may be "watchful waiting" ahead of us. Blackstone declares that the right of personal security, the right of personal liberty and the right of private property are the three principal or primary natural rights. Natural rights are national rights in every sense of the term, and the possession of these rights necessarily implies the means to secure and enforce them. In a republic that means the elective franchise, to secure these rights governments are instituted among men deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, says the "Declaration of Independence." When did one-half of our people consent or have opportunity to consent to the government established over them by the other half? The right to vote may be regulated, but it may not be denied. To refuse the suffrage to women merely because they are women is not a regulation of the franchise. What is it? In my opinion it is a crime. Thousands of professional men and thousands of non-professional men who are educated are guilty to my mind of what might be called the crime of silence. Many clergymen may not be guilty of suppressing the truth, but they are guilty of not telling the truth. They do not perhaps assert what is not so, what is not true, but they refuse to voice their convictions. There is a pulpit habit (and I might say that the habit is not confined to the pulpit) of ignoring facts, which is culpable inasmuch as it permits men and women to be wrongly classified. I do not expect a man to wantonly cast aside his equipment for earning his living and defy a hostile majority, but I do say that a man who is convinced that to call the Christian Bible the word of God is to lie ought to look about and see if there is not an honest opening somewhere in the world for an honest man. Perhaps the editor of a religious paper or of any other paper is guilty of the crime of silence oftener than any other person. No man can be always writing without sometimes having doubts arise as to what he ought to say, but when he is treating a subject of vast importance to mankind and knows that what he says will be regarded as reliable, he is in duty bound to write what to him is true. I am willing to allow that a man may honestly differ with me upon the subject of the Bible's divinity, but I expect him to be honest enough to tell me wherein he finds the reason or excuse for his difference. Just when and where a man should keep silent must be settled by each individual, but when a vital question like the following: "Is the Bible the Word of God?" is up for discussion, I hold that everyone is bound to give his candid opinion. There is too much evasion on religious matters, too much hiding of convictions in dishonest silence. When a man says he is not obliged to jeopardize his living and that of his family by opposing the religious majority I wish to assure him that the world respects honesty yet a while and, more than that, it will defend honesty. But that is not the point. If to him the Bible is the work of man, with man's thoughts upon various subjects, why should it injure him to say so? That is the point. Is mankind more ready to shield and protect a lie than the truth? If so, let us know it. If our society is founded upon a lie, would it be a crime to expose it? You cannot defend the Christian religion today without defending a lie. It is not true that the Bible is the word of God. It is true that too many people are guilty of the crime of silence in respect to the character of this book. MARILLA M. RICKER.

THE WAR.

Each morn, and with the coming night,
I scan the press with eager eye;
In hope to see some flickering light,
Shine through war's darkened, smoky sky.

Ten thousand guns renew each day
The belching of their smoke and shell;
Ten million soldiers nightly pray
Deliverance from the awful hell.

'Tis not from choice the soldier kills
His brother, who, when war's declared, Becomes his foe against his will
Through "Higher Ups" his rage is bared.

Some handful, scum of parasites,
Who would usurp a world-wide sway;
Applied the torch, today ignites
All Europe in a bloody fray.

Blood-suckers, nonproducers, who Live high on honest labor's toil,
Yet know not what it means to woo
An honest penny from the soil.

When once again the sword is sheathed,
And subjects' tongues are free to speak;
There's something yet unknown, bequeathed,
Which king and emperor need not seek.

What mockery attends the third
Unholy Christmas of the war;
When prayers to God are ever said,
Imploring power to kill and mar.

Instead of peace, good-will towards men,
They pray for skill to war and fight;
Self-glory and their country's gain
Become for them the only right.

With murderous aim he plays the shot
In hopes to kill some fellowman,
Whom he ne'er saw, and knoweth not,
Yet such is war; he kills who can.

In far off cities from the fray
Bells may ring out glad notes of pride;
'Tis vain for him who fights today—
His peace is gone, his hope has died.

When shall this awful carnage cease?
And wisdom, once again enthroned,
Shall guide their hands in ways of peace
And pardon crave from thousands wronged? —R. H.

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxes of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

In Best of Humor.

Futility.—"I wonder why it is you can't argue with a woman."
"You can; but it doesn't do any good."

Found Out.—"There are a lot of girls who don't ever intend to marry."
"How do you know?"
"I have proposed to several."—Puck.

Impediment.—Billy—"I would lay the world at your feet but for one thing."
Milly—"And that is?"
Billy—"Some other people are using it."—Judge.

Practical.—Po—"Your roommate says that he is a practical socialist."
Dunk—"He must be. He wears my shirts, smokes my tobacco, and writes to my girls."—Pitt Panther.

As He Saw It.—"John, dear," wrote a lady from the Capital, "I enclose the hotel bill."
"Dear Jane, I enclose a check," wrote John in reply; "but please don't buy any more hotels at this price—they are robbing you!"—Tit-bits.

Expert.—Manager—"Yes, we have a vacancy in our financial department. Have you had any experience in finance?"
"I'm supporting a $10,000 wife on $5,000 a year."—Life.

Oh! What a Change!
One hundred years ago today
When wilderness was here,
With powder in his gun, the man
Went out and got a deer.

But now the thing has changed—
And on another plan,
With powder on her cheeks,
The "dear" goes out and get the man.
—Exchange.

Too Much Knowledge.—They had been spooning a bit, and when she raised her face from his shoulder and they both observed the white streak on his coat he patted her affectionately, and said:
"Never mind, dearie, it will all brush off."
At this the young thing began to sob.
"Oh, Harry," she exclaimed, hiding her head again on his shoulder, "how do you know?"

Economy.—"I found such a wonderful bargain," said Mrs. Flatter.
"What was it?" asked her husband, a resident of Back Bay.

"You know I went down-town to buy a hat. Well, just as I got in the store, they put up a sign, 'All hats at half-price.'"

"So you only had to spend half of the money you intended."

"Oh, no, I bought two hats instead of one."—Chicago Herald.

Dull.—The pretty girl of the party was bantering the genial bachelor on his reasons for remaining single.

"No-oo, I never was exactly disappointed in love," he mediated. "I was more what you might call discouraged. You see, when I was very young I became very much enamored of a young lady of my acquaintance; I was mortally afraid to tell her of my feeling, but at last I screwed up my courage to the proposing point. I said, 'Let's get married.'"

"And she said, 'Good Lord! Who'd have us!'"

Experience.—"Have you ever had any experience in handling high-class ware?" asked a dealer in bric-a-brac of an applicant for work.

"No, sir," was the reply, "but I think I can do it."

"Suppose," said the dealer, "you accidentally broke a very valuable porcelain vase, what would you do?"

"I should put it carefully together," replied the man, "and set it where a wealthy customer would be sure to knock it over again."

"Consider yourself engaged," said the dealer. "Now, tell me where you learned that trick of the trade."

"A few years ago," answered the other, "I was one of the 'wealthy-customer' class."—New York Telegraph.

Easing the Editorial Conscience.—Only a few days ago the editor of a paper in Indiana grew tired of being called a liar and announced that he would tell the truth in future; and the next issue of the paper contained the following items:

"John Bonin, the laziest merchant in town, made a trip to Belleville yesterday."

"John Coyle, our groceryman, is doing a poor business. His store is dirty and dusty. How can he do so much?"

"Rev. Sty preached last Sunday night on 'Charity.' The sermon was punk."

"Dove Sonkey died at his home in this place. The doctor gave it out as heart failure. Whisky killed him."

"Married—Miss Sylvan Rhodes and James Collin, last Saturday, at the Baptist parsonage. The bride is a very ordinary town girl, who doesn't know any more about cooking than a jack rabbit, and never helped her mother three days in her life. She is not a beauty by any means, and has a gait like a duck. The groom is an up-to-date loafer. He has been living off the old folks at home all his life and is not worth shucks. It will be a hard life."

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

A very frank book; serious, scholarly, convincing.

This edition of Thomas Paine's masterpiece is the one that is sure to become the standard for all future correct editions. It is reprinted from one of the first copies in English published by Barrois at Paris, January, 1794, and the proofs were probably read by Paine. It enables the world of the twentieth century to read Paine's AGE OF REASON as Paine wrote it in the eighteenth century. It is printed from large new type. 180 pages. 15c. T. S. Co.

THE CHRISTIAN HELL

From the First to the Twentieth Century

By

HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work. Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

JUST OUT ETERNITY

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

The price of foodstuffs in New York is reported to be tending downward.

Great Britain has placed nearly $100,000,000 in contracts with American ship-builders.

The steamship Frederik VIII, with Count von Bernstorff and his party on board, left Halifax, N. S., Feb. 27 for Copenhagen.

President Wilson will sign the District of Columbia prohibition bill, passed by Congress to become effective Nov. 1 next.

Two hundred and fifty United States marines were landed at Guantanamo, Cuba, Feb. 27 to protect the large foreign owned sugar mills and plantations.

General Jose Miguel Gomez, leader of the Cuban revolution, and his forces have been defeated signally by government troops under command of Colonel Collazo.

Col. Walter Katte, who built the elevated railroads in New York and was noted for other important engineering work, died here last Sunday at the age of 86.

The Rev. Bouck White, pastor of the Church of the Social Revolution, is on trial before a jury for burning the United States flag in a melting pot with other national emblems.

Two of the leading daily newspapers in Athens, Greece, the Patris and the Nea Hellas, have been suppressed by the royal government for exposing King Constantine's pro-German intrigues.

Herman Ridder, late editor and proprietor of the New Yorker Staats-Zeitung, left liabilities of more than $250,000 and assets of $17,986, according to an accounting filed Feb. 21 by Mrs. Mary C. Ridder, his widow.

Mr. Benjamin F. Fell, the oldest resident of Passaic, N. J., who voted at twenty-one Presidential elections, died Monday night, Feb. 26, at the home of his daughter. He celebrated his one hundredth birthday on Sept. 20 last.

The port authorities at Buenos Aires March 1 boarded the Dutch steamer Amstelland and seized a bag containing 1,500,000 marks and addressed to the German Transatlantic Bank branches in Buenos Aires, Santiago and Montevideo.

August Schraeder, the "divine healer," died at the county hospital, Los Angeles, Cal., March 1. He was under indictment with Francis Schlatter, the "second messiah," for fraudulent use of the mails. The two fakirs "blessed" handkerchiefs and sold them.

Germany is now drawing upon church bells for war requirements. An order appropriating bronze church bells after March 1 is published in the German press. One bell in a chime may be retained in default of other means for summoning the congregation to worship.

Captain C. W. Visser of the Dutch freighter Samarinda, which arrived at New York March 3 from Rotterdam in ballast to load for Japan and China, told how he had rescued 179 persons from five vessels torpedoed or bombed by German submarines in the Bay of Biscay on Feb. 3.

The Bethlehem Steel Company at Sparrow's Point, Baltimore, Md., announced Feb. 28 that it had received contracts for two cargo ships of 10,000 tons each from the Cunard company. It was announced that the ships are the first to be built in this country for the Cunard company in fifty years.

The Federal Trade Commission finds that there has been no shortage of news print paper, and no increase in the cost of production that would justify the increase in price. Paper is costing more because manufacturers in Canada and the United States band together to obtain unreasonable profits.

The American freighter Rochester dropped anchor March 4 at the mouth of the Gironde, France, three days after her sister ship, the Orleans. These two vessels were the first to leave the United States, flying the American flag, after diplomatic relations between Germany and the United States had been severed.

Heavy sentences were imposed in the Bergen County (N. J.) Court Feb. 21 on John Degan, alias "John Doyle," and Martin Ellis, who were convicted of attacking a young woman they lured to a lonely place on the Palisades. They were sentenced by Judge George G. Tennant to serve not less than twenty years in the Trenton Prison, and also were fined $5,000 each.

Three thousand German residents of Mexico, pledging "all for the Fatherland," are said to be using money, threats and promises to array Mexicans of every faction against the United States. The Society of the Iron Cross in Mexico, composed of practically every German in the Republic, has seventy-five branches in Mexican cities, and each branch is an active agency for German activity among Mexicans.

President Wilson was sworn in for his second term at the Capitol on Sunday, March 4, in the presence of his cabinet, and again Monday on the inauguration stand before the Capitol. He issued a statement Sunday in which he said: "A little group of wilful men, representing no opinion but their own, have rendered the great Government of the United States helpless and contemptible." In this he referred to about a dozen pro-German senators who by filibustering defeated the bill to arm American vessels against attacking submarines.

THE WAR.

President Wilson officially confirmed the charges of a German attempt to stir up Mexico and Japan to war against the United States when he sent to the Senate February 28 a message giving Secretary Lansing's report on the subject.

In a violent counter attack on the Northern Rumanian front Feb. 28, the Russians won back most of the positions on both sides of the Jacobeni-Kimpolung high road lost to the Germans the day before.

Shattered and disorganized, the remnants of the Turkish forces from Kut-el-Amara have fallen back toward Bagdad, with the British troops still at their heels. In the last week alone more than 2,500 prisoners have fallen into the hands of the British.

The Rumanians have made substantial advances, dislodging the enemy from a height north of the River Zaval and sweeping in a number of prisoners.

Destruction of a German submarine in the Atlantic by the British steamer Knight Companion was reported March 1 by the steamer's officers on her arrival. The steamer was several days on her way to New Orleans, according to the story, when she sighted a German submarine.

During February the British captured 2,133 German prisoners, including thirty-six officers. The following villages also were either captured or surrendered to them by the withdrawal of the Germans: Ligny, Thillo, Lebarque, Warlencourt, Pys, Miramont, Petit Miraumont, Grandcourt, Puisieux-au-Mont, Serre and Gommecourt.

The German government has offered to replace the seven Dutch merchantmen which were torpedoed off the English coast last week with German freight ships until the end of the war, on condition that Holland purchase them afterward.

Parallels in Heathen Myth and Hebrew Scripture.

By a Texas Pagan.

PICTURES BY RYAN WALKER.

This is a lecture by a Texas Pagan, which has been illustrated by another. The text is what the title describes, a comparison of the heathen myths with the Hebrew tales told in scripture. The illustrations are exquisite bits of satire and wit, made by a genius with the pencil, and each is a gem. Text and pictures together, the book is certainly one of the wittiest ever produced, while the information it contains is solid and reliable. It will be a source of pleasure to every Liberal, and is at the same time a splendid Freethought lecture. We guarantee its quality from start to finish. 115 large octavo pages, 75 illustrations. INFIDEL DEATHBEDS

BY G. W. FOOTE.

An account of the passing away of the noted Freethinkers of the world, to which are prefixed brief accounts of their lives and of the work they did for mental liberty. "Infidel death-beds" have ever been a fertile theme of pulpit eloquence, and the clergy have drawn harrowing pictures of fear and terror and recantations and repudiation of sentiments held when living by the great Infidels of the world. This book shows that such sermons are "just preaching," and totally false as to statements. Every Liberal should have it for reference. The author founded the London Freethinker, and was one of the ablest writers in England. Price 25 cents.

The Belief In God and Immortality

A STATISTICAL STUDY

By JAMES H. LEUBA

Professor of Psychology and Pedagogy in Bryn Mawr College.

The work is the result of an inquiry among men of science — biologists, sociologists, historians, psychologists — as to whether they believe or want to believe in a prayer-answering God and in continuance of life after death. The answer is altogether different from what might be expected in view of the frequent affirmations of the supernaturalists that belief in Christianity, or at least its fundamental dogmas, is held by the majority of the men of science.

It puts into the hands of Freethinkers exactly the information they want on that subject, with the facts and figures verifying it.

As a logical conclusion, founded upon the general aspect of the case, we have held that science leads its votaries to a rejection of such undemonstrable propositions as the existence of gods and the survival of the "soul" when the body is dead. Here we have the evidence, in statistical form, which confirms our view.

To the inquiry into the attitude of the scientists there are added statistics regarding the thought of college students regarding the same religious dogmas.

The author is himself a man of science, an authority in his special branch, which is Psychology, and he knows and sets forth the origin and history of the beliefs with which he deals.

No recent book has attracted more attention from the press, or presented such a serious problem to the supernaturalists.

THE FUTURE OF RELIGION

The Church Can Not Prolong Its Existence Unless It Discards the Supernatural.

BY RICHARD ELLSWORTH.

The greatest illusion that has ever taken captive the mind of man has been that of the perfection of Christianity. Christian advocates treat their religion as the compiler of certain official war reports has treated the facts of the various campaigns—studiously ignoring or slurring over all unpleasant truths, and giving an air of verisimilitude to an imaginative account by inserting one or two minor facts too patent to be omitted. The birth of Christ is represented as dividing darkness from light. It marks an era which brought something unique and transcendent into the world. Whether by human agency or by divine, there appeared on the corrupt soil of Paganism the flower, immaculate and immortal, of the Christian ideal.

This belief is natural to the orthodox Christian—that is to say, to any one of the numerous and contradictory sects that claim to represent orthodox Christianity. But it persists among people who have abandoned all the dogmas of Christianity and expressly repudiate any claim to be described as Christians. "They look upon the Galilean as a moral genius who first perceived and taught many things which were hidden from the hearts of mankind, who first poured the oil of pity upon the waters of strife, who discovered the jewels of compassion and brotherly love in human clay. And from this conception they proceed to make it 'almost a point of honor' to regard Christianity as having conferred unprecedented blessings on the world." The Christian era is much more to them than a calendar period; it is the epoch which opened when the harsh laws of the struggle for existence felt, for the first time, the power of perfect altruism.

Now that a dozen of the most enlightened nations of Europe are engaging in a war, unequaled by any of the military horrors of the past for ferocity and cruelty, it would seem that the time has come for an entire revision of the astounding claims made for Christianity by its devotees. History has to be read anew, and in a spirit of scientific detachment, before one realizes the supreme fallaciousness of these claims as contrasted with authentic ecclesiastical records. If we sum up the victims and the agony of religious wars and persecutions through the Christian era, we are presented with a new standard of comparison. "On more than one battlefield there stands, untouched in the midst of ruin, a crucifix. The caprice which spared the image of Christ is alleged to be divine; if it be so, then God does not disdain irony. Two thousand years have passed since he spoke his saving message and died to prove it valid; do the corpses of millions of his followers multiply the proof?" This seeming recognition of a sacred object by the heavenly powers may be very gratifying to a pious Christian sentimentality, but it is highly derogatory to the alleged perfection of the Christian system, and to its determination to appropriate to itself all that is best in the world's civilization.

For the great majority of writers—and the majority of bookmakers have been Christians—the ethical history of mankind has been contained in the Old and New Testaments. They knew little of the moral heights attained by ancient civilizations, or of the lofty moral precepts of religions founded centuries before Christianity. Concentrating their attention on one corner of the world and one short section of time, they ignored the first glimmerings of morality in animal life, the slow and fitful broadening of the dawn among primitive human societies, and the clearer light towards which nation after nation pressed in its evolution. Indeed, few of them sought to penetrate behind the assumption that the highest ideals of life were created by Christianity. They accepted it as an axiom. We note, therefore, that one of the marked features touching the future of religion will be the elimination from it of that false presentation of history which has beguiled the believing nations for many hundreds of years. Men are demanding today, and will continue to demand with increasing emphasis in the future, that the history of the church be truthfully presented in books and discourses, no matter how detrimental that presentation may prove to be to the interests of ecclesiasticism. The most effective way to test an assumption is to assume it true, and then measure the logical results with the gage of fact. If Christianity be true, one should have no difficulty in discovering the unique element which sets it apart. When the history of Christianity is faithfully rewritten, as is already being done, and its good and bad elements carefully weighed, the future will show that neither the structure nor the fruit of that religion bears out the claims made for it by a fictitious history.

Closely allied to the falsification of history as heretofore shown in the Christian records is the spirit of obscurantism which has largely characterized religious thought ever since the rise of Rationalism. By obscurantism is meant the opposition to the revival of learning and all new ideas, growing out of a religious prejudice. There is no difficulty in recognizing the true obscurantist—that person whose one end and aim is to plunge humanity once more in the gloom of medieval credulity, and thereby bring it under the control of the priesthood as in the golden days of the papacy. There is, indeed, no possibility of mistaking him, for he carries with him an indelible mark of his personality in his habit of indulging in diatribes and jibes against science and its methods, in a tone of oracular wisdom and of magnanimous contempt for Agnosticism. This disparaging of science is absolutely necessary to a revival of belief in the "occult" and "mysterious," for a scientific atmosphere is for religious fables a lethal chamber.

In the future of religion men shall everywhere mark the death of obscurantism. Many a man in the workshop today knows more about the Bible and church history than many a monk and bishop a few generations ago. The church can no longer shut itself in behind walls of "tottering traditions." Evidence against the truth of Christianity can no longer be destroyed or suppressed by persecution. In the future, "miracles" will be no longer worked, except where people are still grossly credulous or ignorant. "True it is that passages of the Bible can still be read in church which every educated man knows to be (to use a mild term) unhistorical, and which, to console his conscience, he calls allegorical. True, in our churches, with but few exceptions, the white lie of silence is daily told. But even mild pious frauds of this nature will soon be a thing of the past. The Higher Critics and the advanced school of the church will see to it. They are beginning to speak out even in our day." When Bishop Colenso, the Anglican prelate, was censured by a clergyman for depraving one of his parishioners by criticisms of the Pantateuch, the bishop replied: "The blame would be more fittingly attached to the teachers who lead people to rest their faith in God and duty on a foundation of falsehood which every new wave of thought is sweeping away."

The future will no longer listen to those who would forbid us either to taste the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge or to give it to others. Obscurantism, dogma's best friend, is breathing its last. The disposition to perpetrate pious frauds for the sake of God and the church will be an unknown factor in the future of religion. As men grow higher every generation in the scale of ethical culture, they will relish less and less the vain pietism which is the outcome of ignorance and superstition; the "holy" deceit upon which the "faithful" have been fed for centuries. Science, which is reason applied to knowledge, will show the utter futility of all such vain conceits for the upbuilding of mankind in everything that would tend to distinguish it. Every phase of religionism that would contribute to the obscuring of man's moral and intellectual progress on the earth will be swept away in the avalanche of practical utilitarianism which shall undoubtedly distinguish the dawn of the near future.

The Christian religion has always taught that morality without a belief in God is not conceivable. We have been made to believe that "all our righteousness is as filthy rags" unless our good works were performed "in Christ." The future of religion will plainly show the unconditional fallacy of this statement. The history of the church proves it already, but the pious still cling to it as if their very life depended on its truth. "Theological apologists, who insist that morality will vanish if their dogmas are exploded," says Huxley, "would do well to consider the fact that, in the matter of intellectual veracity, science is already a long way ahead of the churches; and that, in this particular, it is exerting an educational influence on mankind of which the churches have shown themselves utterly incapable." The wisdom of the future will show that the moral life is derived from the universal experience of mankind, approved by the judgment of the wise, and justified by the fate of the foolish. The claim that the future will meet is simply this, that Christ taught an essentially new ethic which has been of incalculable benefit to the human race. If this be true, history and ancient literature do not show it. They plainly exhibit the facts that Christianity did not bring a new moral code, did not inaugurate peace, nor purity, nor universal brotherhood; did not originate the ideal human character; but checked civilization, resisted all enlightenment, and deluged the earth with innocent blood in the endeavor to compel mankind to drink old moral wine out of new theological bottles.

Morality cannot be based upon or deduced from any metaphysical or theological proposition whatever. Indeed, so far from ethics being based upon or deduced from theology, a rational theology is largely based on ethics. Moreover, the future will peremptorily reject the view that the obligation of morality depends upon sanctions—i. e., reward and punishment, in this life or any other. "If," as George Eliot once pithily remarked, "you feel no motive to common morality but a criminal bar in heaven, you are decidedly a man for the police on earth to keep their eyes upon." Let him who wrongs a fellow-creature remember that he wrongs himself as well, and wrongs both for eternity. This is the awful thought that will ultimately keep men just. It is more moral and more corrective than any trust in a vicarious atonement of a promised savior. Since the war began we have been surfeited with the tale of German atrocities; its monotony wearies us. Let it be remembered that the religious wars and the "Holy Inquisition" were far more subtle and comprehensive in their cruelty and slaughter. The Roman Catholic church has been silent before the calculated crimes of Germany; does it recollect too vividly its own past? "Let the dead bury its dead." This is a convenient way of relieving Christianity of the accumulated load of crime and error. At the same time it is a surrender of the traditional claim to saving grace.

There is no conception that has taken deeper root in the heart of the believer than that religion is the greatest consolation known to earth. This has been sedulously fostered by the church in order to maintain her hold upon a credulous people. The future of religion will prove that this also is an illusion. Inquire, if you doubt, from any medical man what are his experiences among the dying; how many are not even aware that they are dying; how many are too much taken up with their physical sufferings, and too anxious to be relieved from them, to think of anything else; how many die in a space of time so brief, reckoned from the moment when they are first made aware of their dying condition, that the case is practically one of sudden death; how many are unconscious from the time when their life is first in danger; how many have the knowledge of their approaching death carefully concealed from them by kind-hearted doctors and relations, albeit both the patient and his attendants say they believe in a supremely happy existence after death? Far more often than not the religious consolation so frequently and solemnly held up to us by the priest as an inducement to believe is never enjoyed. Does it not furnish a damaging commentary on one of the strongest arguments for belief—the argument from religious consolation?

If religion fails for one reason or another to prove itself consolatory at the hour of one's death, to an even greater degree does it fail at the crucial times in our active daily experience. Let us take the present war as an example. This terrible conflict brings into more lurid colors perplexities which have faced men since the days when they dwelt in caves and lifted their wondering eyes to the rising sun. But in the shadow of the immense disaster the figure of the Loving Father recedes into dim and formless outlines. Trust in his care grows faint and feeble. Human tears blur the vision of eternal bliss, as human love has quenched the fires of hell. It is true that many, in despair of human effort, will fix their hopes the more intently on objects that seem to bring balm to their wounded souls. But where thought stings into activity, where obstinate questionings are not crushed or evaded, the claims of reality cannot be ignored. The comfort derived from religious faith is largely made up of personal desire and imagination. Behind the faith lies a view of the universe which is eternally unverifiable. Love of illusion is common, but it is not universal; nor is it likely to be permanent. "The conception of the Fatherhood of God is beautiful and beneficent, but essentially a reflection of the idea of human fatherhood. It satisfies us only so long as we believe it to correspond faithfully to the facts—the total facts—of life. When it appears to be irreconcilable with facts which are beyond dispute we must, unless we are content to hold our judgment in suspense, abandon either the facts or the doctrine. Man's highest duty is to be true to the knowledge he possesses."

The future of religion will emphasize the absence of intolerance. Twentieth-century Christianity proves, as all the Christian centuries prove, that a faith founded on a superhuman basis or on the teaching of any individual, however divine in appearance, is the father of intolerance, whose one virtue is consistency, and whose vices innumerable are written in blood and flame on the pages of history and live on today, impotent to kill, but still able to embitter the heart and cloud the mind. "The shadow of the fanatical priest, that half-demented coward, sneak and assassin, still blights us. Although that holy monster, with his lurking spies, his villainous casuistries, his flames and devils, and red-hot pincers, and whips of steel, has been defeated by the humanity he scorned and the knowledge he feared, yet he has left a taint behind him. It is still held that it ought to be an unpleasant thing to be an infidel." There can only be intolerance where belief is dogmatic, and that the religion of the future will never be. Religious intolerance is much more fierce and bitter than political intolerance just because it is religious. It is the supernatural that breeds the fury. It is the feeling that the Christian religion is divine and holy and all other religions human and depraved; it is the belief that it is a pious thing to be "jealous for the Lord" that drives men into blind rage and ruthless savagery. All such phases of religious experience will be absolutely unknown in the future of religion, which will show a wise tolerance for every difference of opinion.

Another important fact which is showing an increasing influence upon religion as the years pass, carrying with it a prophecy of what may be expected in the near future, is the growing dislike among thoughtful men for every kind of human thought that takes the form of theological dogmatism. It was Kant who said: "The death of dogma is the birth of morals." However men may choose to read the signs of the times, our present knowledge seems plainly to indicate that the solution of the religious problem can never be in accord with the Christian dogmas. Indeed, it is an open question whether all religion (in its theological sense) is not "an unessential quality which has been mechanically attached to it, and which, consequently, it may at any time throw off without experiencing any serious loss." Mankind has now largely awakened to the fact that the churches have taught many errors. Reason and science have confuted these errors. Hell is no longer a reality, not even in thought, and likewise the devil. Honest intelligence no longer countenances the Christian championship of slavery, of witch-murder, of martyrdom, persecution and torture; we have destroyed the claims for the infallibility of the Bible, and have taken the fetters of the church from the limbs of Science and Reason, and in a short time we shall have demolished the belief in miracles. Supernaturalism has been beaten many times by Reason in the past, and the promise of the future is that a point of decisiveness will be reached in the battle, when this great barrier to the progress of human endeavor shall arrive at a vanishing stage of effectiveness. The future of religion will demand Reason and Facts, not rhetoric.

Bishop Butler, in his "Analogy," tells us: "Reason is the only faculty we have wherewith to judge concerning anything, even revelation itself." How is it, then, that religionist and Rationalist arrive at such contrary conclusions? Here is the explanation: the religionist trusts, the Rationalist distrusts, his emotions. Which is in the right? The survival of religious belief will largely depend upon the view men may ultimately take upon this question. Whether religion be no more than "morality touched by emotion," as Matthew Arnold defines it, or whether all religions are only different ways of expressing a reality which transcends experience and correct expression, we cannot, on that account, accept dogmas that are untrue; we cannot pretend that a supernatural revelation has been made to us. In view of the prominence given to Rationalistic thought in our day, the church has felt it necessary to keep pace. It is her only chance of prolonging her existence. Its new attitude in this respect will undoubtedly be the means of confusing the issue—the truth of Christianity—for some years to come. Absolute truth may always remain beyond the cognizance of man; but that is no argument why he should not go on trying to get as near it as possible, and the first step is the elimination of untruth. It is necessary, as Buckle observes, that men should learn to doubt before they begin to tolerate; and that they should recognize the fallibility of their own opinions before they respect the opinions of their opponents. "The world is now facing the dawn of that better and happier day when piety shall be confined within the sphere of the natural, when morals shall be looked upon and cultivated as essential conditions of a truly blessed social life, and when all mankind shall aim, not at imaginary happiness in a purely imaginary realm, but at real prosperity in a profoundly real world. This would be the exaltation, not destruction, of morality; the glorification, not annihilation, of the sense of responsibility; the enthronement, not repudiation, of the joy of altruistic service."

A religion worthy of our times must be in hearty accord with science, historical criticism, democracy, the aspirations of women, the humane spirit, education of a high type for all, free and cordial national and international intercourse and co-operation, and with the concept of the supremacy and sublimity of the moral ideal and man's power and privilege to actualize it. Supernaturalism has no niche allotted to it in the modern scheme of things. On the lips it may yet live; from the heart it is gone. Our age demands that expression shall accord with thought. In the future of religion, it will not be satisfactory for the Christian preacher to reply, when the doubter animadverts upon the liturgy of the church: "I am responsible for the sermon, not for the service." The service must faithfully reflect the sermon, and the sermon the soundest contemporary conclusions. While the old forms of service survive, considerable masses of men tend to remain fossilized, and the temptation to hanker after the old flesh-pots of an easy-going transcendental religion persists. If there is a new modernism, let it be open and above board, dependent neither on pope nor Bible, but on an enlightened reason and conscience.

The religious mind is slow to appreciate the majesty of fact. "Too long has the world revered the vain dreams and the arrogant pretensions of priest and theologian. They have no substance in them; they do not correspond with the things we know." In spite of its large claims, religion has in the past been mainly a dividing force. The spirit of the bitter sectary, burning to convert the world to his own partial views, has crushed the humble, misled the wise, and almost killed the vitality of the enlarging soul. One reason why religion retains and cherishes this sectarian tendency is that its title-deeds can be so variously interpreted. Rationalism, on the other hand, unites men in an earnest search for and allegiance to truth; and, though notions of truth differ widely, it strongly discounts the spirit of exclusiveness which treats partial conceptions as universal conceptions.

To the Rationalist, the brotherhood of man is a greater reality than the fatherhood of God, for man exists as a certain fact—God as an imaginative hypothesis.

Organized religion has proved a failure; never has it elevated the life of nations. It is time that the free spirit of humanity be let loose, and its resources tested with confidence. Dr. White's assertion that Christianity "arrested the normal development of the physical sciences for over 1500 years" is supported by the record of scientific history from Pliny to Darwin. And the long relentless persecution of opinion was, it may be observed, a direct result of the assumption that Christianity embodies a perfect and complete guide to the soul of man.

It has often been asked by persons reluctant to acknowledge the beneficent progress of science whether Christianity, by virtue of its distinguished and instructive history, has not answered social needs; did not embody an ideology satisfactory to the Western mind at a particular stage; did not develop an organization of the highest efficiency for good, and by virtue of its metaphysical doctrines adapt and adjust itself to new phases of thought in a way which was not open to rigid polytheistic cults. To look upon any religion as an unrelieved calamity would be a depressing and pessimistic conclusion indeed. Since every leading human institution meets some social need, it is improbable that a religion which has persisted for ages should be wholly a superfluity and an excrescence. In fact, the human origin of all religions forbids such an assumption being seriously entertained. "Religions are not luxuries, and they would have perished of neglect long ago if they touched no human chord." It is strange, however, to find non-Christians arguing that the persistence of the Christian belief is a sign of its utility; it is no more so than it is of its truth.

The truth of the matter is that Christianity did not make good men what they are, but good men have made Christianity what it is. Besides, a false belief cannot possibly serve a good purpose after its real character has become known.

Christian people are today enjoying the benefits of a very high civilization. These benefits they are applying to their religion in the way of a lofty humanitarian spirit, which from the standpoint of altruism has quite revolutionized the character of Christianity. What success Christianity has met with has depended upon the transformation of its original doctrines. It is constantly changing, so that no one today would be bold enough to offer a definitive description of its essential content. When the Rationalist is accused of minimizing the blessings resulting from the spread of Christianity, he has a right to ask what is meant by the term, lest in seeming to condemn the good deeds of faithful men, he condemn the fundamental principles which constitute his distinctive position. The fruits of civilization is one thing, and the immediate consequences of a dogmatic religion is another. The trouble with some well-meaning people is that they seriously confuse these two things in their mind. Christianity, as exhibited in our day, bears little resemblance to that of the earliest centuries. Even the Roman Catholic church, which boasts of being semper eadem, has been greatly influenced, especially in America, by the progressive and enlightened trend of the age.

"The reign of justice and reason is approaching. Now the mists are thick about us, but gleams of light shine through. Slowly men are beginning to see that human well-being depends on human effort; that the prayers which for long ages have gone up to indifferent heaven have died away unheard; that there is none other that fighteth for us but only thou, O Man." The future of religion will declare itself by men's "reverence and love for the ethical ideal, and the desire to realize that ideal in life." This was Professor Huxley's definition of religion, and we cannot imagine for the human race a more glorious destiny than that it so develop that this condition shall constitute its final goal. A religion, the chief feature of which is an intellectual creed, will always fail, as has Christianity, to impart true emphasis to the need of ethical culture. Theology is not a true science. Faith is always shifting its intellectual defenses. Having no real data from which to argue, it changes with the character of each succeeding century. It has no stability, for its success lies in its constant changing. Not so with Reason; not so with Science. The splendid results accomplished by these in the past over the machinations of religion are a sufficient forecast of the glorious time that awaits the future of the world.

God and My Neighbors.

There has been brought to my attention a case which shows the wonderful power of religion to transform the life.

Alva had his first religious experience years ago before his marriage. Hannah's father was very religious. Alva wanted Hannah. He first got religion, then got Hannah. But he did not prove a good husband. He was jealous, and exacting, and Hannah's lot was harder than that of a servant. Years of infelicitous married life went by. Alva grew gray and fat. It was discovered that he might die suddenly at any time under physical or mental stress. And Alva got religion again.

It would seem that Alva is, and ever has been, superstitious, selfish and cowardly; that he is afraid of that good old institution, hell, and means to keep out of it. Hence, his "goodness." But isn't he inside the same old Alva?

Isn't it a pity that Alva could not have been "raised" with different ideals? Suppose he had been trained to respect the rights and feelings of others, to take pleasure in making others happy, to be ashamed to inflict pain upon those dependent upon him. Then poor Hannah, Alva's wretched bit of property, might have had many happy years with him, and he too would have been happier.

No; as an incentive to make people good, fear of hell is a poor thing. The penalty is too remote and is too easily evaded. But it appeals to a certain low class of minds, to make their possessors hypocritical.

There is little that is new. I think something that to me seems new, but many others have had the same thought and have expressed it better perhaps than have I. I make a discovery, and am pleased and proud. Then I learn that someone made the same discovery long ago. Alone I have made many finds in that collection of Hebrew and Christian literature known as the Bible. I procure Remsburg's books and learn that most of my discoveries and many besides are therein shown.

Mr. M. is greatly pleased with the article from Mr. Weatherby, of Columbus, Ohio, and concurs with that gentleman in his opinion that most Christian clergymen are sincere.

However, it seems to me that these men are in a peculiar position. They have been met and refuted and beaten till they have nothing left except absurdities. But they are with the majority. It is fashionable and profitable, socially and pecuniarily, to go with the crowd. Their education has given them not a scientific cast of mind but a theological one. They go by preference. They want to believe in a heaven for themselves. They are making money out of the system. They care little for truth. So they put up a big bluff, and use the meanest of methods to silence their critics. If this is sincerity, what can insincerity be?

Said the Baptist brother, "In the good old times it was easy to get votes. You remember how we used to vote through the schoolhouse window. Many a vote have I bought for $2.50. To guard against being cheated I would take my voter by the arm, meanwhile holding the ballot in my left hand, march him up to the window, give him the ballot, and watch him while he handed it in."

"Yes," said the Methodist, "and do you recall the time when there were so many Roman Catholic candidates on our ticket that we called it the Catholic ticket? Well, that time, when election day came round, I hired ten men at my own expense, each to go with team and wagon to a different polling place and work against our ticket. And we downed those Catholics completely."

The present birth-control discussion calls to my mind a pathetic story connected with the agitation of the same subject in England years ago. The story is told by Moncure Conway in his autobiography and is probably familiar to many readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Mrs. Annie Besant was a Freethinker, her husband, Frank Besant, a clergyman. The young couple had two children, a boy and a girl. Not being in sympathy as to religious opinions, and Mrs. Besant being an active Freethinker, not a passive one, they separated with the agreement that the father was to have the boy, the mother the girl. Thereafter Mrs. Besant supported herself by her literary work, aided by sympathizing friends, the Conway family in particular.

But Mrs. Besant, becoming interested in the condition of the poor of the city (London), and thinking she saw a practicable way to help them, prepared a pamphlet teaching birth control. There was a hubbub, of course. Mr. and Mrs. Grundy held up their hands in horror. The Rev. Frank Besant went to court to take his daughter from her mother. In court Mrs. Besant conducted her own case. She made a good defense. The booklet was not obscene. She had used such language as is employed in medical works, of course. And she could take good care of her daughter.

But the judge, a Jewish one, proved a true follower of Moses. He decided against her, claiming that she had lost her standing in society and could not bring her girl up under fitting conditions. So the child was torn weeping from her mother and taken away. Mrs. Besant had entered the courtroom young and brave and hopeful. She came out old, broken, crushed with humiliation and grief.

The Conways stood by Mrs. Besant through this ordeal, and the ladies of Dr. Conway's congregation took especial pains to show her kind attentions to make up as far as possible for what she had suffered. And as soon as the daughter, Mabel, came of age she rejoined her mother to remain with her until the younger woman married.

Though in his autobiography Dr. Conway speaks highly of Abraham Lincoln, he is not in sympathy with his canonization. He tells some things about the President's words and acts that indicate that Lincoln was a shrewd politician, a man of policy rather than of lofty principle.

Moncure Conway hated slavery, but he hated war also. He disliked the watching and waiting policy. He wanted it to be known and acted upon that the war was caused by slavery and slavery must be destroyed. But it was a war to preserve the Union. The North wanted the sympathy of England. Now the English were in sympathy with the North if that section was fighting to end slavery, but if the war was one to hold together the different sections in an unwilling partnership, the English had no great choice between North and South. Dr. Conway wanted the slaves freed early in the war. He thought this would weaken the South, as they would have to keep guard over their slaves. But the President was afraid to do this. He thought he must make the Union the slogan of battle. Northern Democrats would fight for the Union, but not for the slave. So the government at Washington drove escaping slaves back to their masters to work for them while those same masters were serving in the confederate armies.

But presidents are not all-powerful. They cannot go much ahead of public sentiment, and that is slow. If Dr. Conway had had Abraham Lincoln's political experience, he might have agreed better with his policy.

In the story of Cain and Abel is a point that to me is rather significant. Cain, the farmer, offered the god fruits and vegetables. Abel, the herdsman, gave him good meat. And he preferred that meat. Of course, thereby he got blood (life) which was his pet article of diet, but I fancy that this part of the tale was used for the benefit of those hungry priests who liked good meat better than greens and turnips.

It must have gone against a young fellow's stomach to have to take his older brother's widow as a warmed-over wife and raise up children unto that brother when perhaps he already had an eye on a maid and was thinking of raising some children on his own account. And it is not to be wondered at if sometimes one of these boys balked. Then the story of our much-lied-about-friend Onan came in play. Onan essayed birth-control, and the god slew him. And afterwards good people made up a lie about Onan and held him up as a warning to boys. What a reward for trying to be obliging and to compromise!

The writer of the epistle to the Hebrews adapts and uses the story of the trial of Abraham in a way that illustrates pretty well theological method.

As told in Genesis the story is one of fear, not faith. Abraham was tried by the god to see whether the patriarch had the requisite amount of godly (or devilish) fear. He stood the test and was rewarded. The story reminds me of some of the incidents of the Eneid that show narrow escapes of Ascanius, the hope of the future. Isaac was the one through whom Abraham had hope of a great posterity. In the end the Hebrew nation was endangered. To us Abraham was no hero, but the reverse. But to those who of old knew the story, his conduct was quite natural and praiseworthy.

The writer of Hebrews tries to prove the dogma of the resurrection and adapts this tale to his purpose. He calls it one of faith. Abraham would slay his son, confident that his god would raise him from the dead that he might live to fulfil the god's promise of a great posterity for Abraham. This is a perversion of the story and an anachronism, theologically speaking; for the later theological writer imputes to Abraham ideas of a date, among the Hebrews, much later than the patriarchal age.

My neighbor, the good wife of the deacon, also calls the story one of faith, but her interpretation is somewhat more civilized than that of Paul, who retained a belief in sacrifice, human sacrifice at least. The deacon's wife is a merciful woman, and she makes out a good case for both the man and the god. Says she, "Abraham got all ready to kill his son, to be sure; but he'd never have done it. He knew all the time that God didn't want him to." So it was just a game of bluff. Jehovah tried to bluff the old man, who called his bluff. This saves the character of Jehovah at the loss of his reputation for sagacity. He was not so shrewd as Abraham. The ram caught by its horns in a thicket rather bothers the good lady. Her God would have wanted her to turn it loose and let it go, she is sure. Of course she believes in the sacrifice on the cross. In some unintelligible way it was the proper thing under the circumstances.

W. C. Bryant on J. Cheetham.

Recently I have discovered some new facts concerning James Cheetham, whose "Life of Thomas Paine," characterized by Houghton Mifflin & Co.'s "Literature of American History" as "absolutely unreliable," was the foundation of the slanders which followed the "Author-Hero" for so many years. It will be remembered that these slanders cost Cheetham a judgment of $250 damages in a New York city court. He had maligned others besides Paine, among them DeWitt Clinton. His abuse of Aaron Burr, for which he was paid by Alexander Hamilton, was largely the cause of the unfortunate duel. James Parton calls him "cur Cheetham," a very appropriate name. He had been a prominent Democratic worker, but deserted the cause for the Federal party. For this Paine had castigated him severely. It is said that it was his intention to return to England (he being English born) and enter the service of the Tory party. He hoped his vindictive "Life of Paine" would be a means of introduction to favor in England, where they were putting men in prison for selling Paine's works. As it happened, he sank from public view and died in obscurity, one of the most despised men in American journalism.

The New York Evening Post was established in 1801 by William Coleman. William Cullen Bryant began to contribute to its columns about 1825, and in 1828 became its editor, a position he held until his death in 1878. In the fiftieth anniversary number of the Post, November 15, 1851, Mr. Bryant gives some reminiscences. He speaks of the American Citizen, published in New York city by James Cheetham, and the Aurora in Philadelphia by William Duane. With these two men, Mr. Coleman, founder of the Post, was in constant conflict. Of Cheetham, Mr. Bryant says: "He appears to have been a man of coarse mind and manners and not easily abashed." Once Cheetham insinuated that a letter published in the Post was not genuine. Mr. Coleman warned him to "beware of wantonly repeating the insinuation, protesting that he would not allow any impeachment of his veracity, and that he would not engage in a war of abusive epithets." He later, in speaking of Cheetham, referred to "the insolent vulgarity of that wretch." "At a subsequent period," says Mr. Bryant, "the Evening Post went so far as, in an article reflecting severely upon Cheetham and Duane, to admit the following squib into its columns:—

"Lie on, Duane, lie on for pay,
And, Cheetham, lie thou too.
More against truth you cannot say
Than truth can say 'gainst you.'"

Finally Cheetham became so obnoxious that Mr. Coleman challenged him to a duel. While brave in a war of words, he did not care to face a pistol. Mutual friends patched up their differences. In no place where Cheetham's name is mentioned in history do we find anything to his credit. Yet the sky pilot, the "guardian of morality," will peddle his proven and convicted lies about Thomas Paine at second hand.

Ministers Are Like What They Preach.

It strikes me that Christian ministers must modify their language. Everyone who differs from their say-so is not an ignoramus, nor deserving of eternal condemnation. Honest men, intellectual men, moral men, are outside of the pale of Christianity.

There is a widespread dissatisfaction with the conclusions of Christian ministers. The great majority of mankind see no sense in Christian dogmas. No man dare face the twentieth century and say he knows anything of the future which lies beyond the grave. To send to a hell, which is at most very uncertain, men and women who reject the Christian superstitions is to populate that place with the highest and best which the earth has produced. For myself I have enough to occupy my mind with the life on earth without considering any other existence.

Christian ministers teach what they have been taught. Young men are led by old men. One age follows another. What is needed to-day is independence, faith in one's own mind, in one's own reason, in one's own common sense. We are too much ruled by the past. No century before ours had better means of acquiring knowledge, of observing the universe, and no previous century brought to the task of studying nature more earnest and honest minds than flourish to-day.

In view of the fact that nothing has been discovered that supports the preaching of Christian doctrines, am I asking too much when I ask the Christian minister to send different persons to hell, if he must send anyone there? Disbelief of the Christian doctrines is a crown on the head of man; belief of these doctrines is a sign of mental undevelopment or of mental decay. To send men and women into endless torment who deny orthodox Christianity or who cannot believe its dogmas, is the malice of little minds towards great ones.

The man to damn hereafter is the man who injures his fellow men here—if anybody is to suffer damnation. The honest, upright man who lives by the light of his reason should have and enjoy the best of this life and the best of any other that comes to him.

What I object to most in Christianity is the injustice, the meanness, the malice in this religion. The Christian religion that is practiced most in this age is to save your soul and hurt your neighbor if he does not agree with you.

Back of the dogma of hell, no matter who preaches it, must be a cruel and wicked faith. We know not in whose brain this terrible notion had its origin, but we do know that such a monstrous dogma did not come from what is right, from what is just, from what is true. The man who preaches hell to-day must have within his mind some of the cruelty and wickedness from which this vile dogma sprung.

The Double Life of God

The Bible contains, in various books and passages, two discrepant ideas of the nature and attributes of the "Supreme Being," about as wide asunder as ever prevailed among organized and civilized nations. If the Bible be the Word of God, and be in every portion of it true and inspired, then one of these two conceptions is just as correct as the other, and we are not entitled to choose the lofty and to reject the derogatory one.

One of these conceptions is about as low and inadmissible as a rude and violent people ever framed for themselves in their most uncultivated times. The other is about the noblest and purest that human imagination ever reached. There is the God who showed his "back part" to Moses—and the "God who is a Spirit, and must be worshiped in spirit and in truth." There is the God who wrestled bodily with Jacob and who fed with Abraham in his tent—and the God whom the heaven of heavens cannot contain, much less a temple made with hands. There is the God who talked with Moses face to face as a man talketh to his friend—and the God "whom no man hath seen or can see"—whom "no man can see and live." There is Jehovah, who was the national and selected God of the Hebrews—and there is our Father in heaven, who dwelleth in light inaccessible and full of glory, who is the dwelling-place of all generations, the Father of the spirits of all flesh.

There is the jealous, angry, and relentless God of the rudest Jewish fancy, appeased by sacrifices and whole burnt-offerings, repenting him of what he had done, of what he had threatened, of what he had promised, unjust according even to our poor human scales of equity and righteousness—and there is the God of better days and truer conceptions, to whom whole-burnt offerings and sacrifices were a weariness and an abomination, with whom is no variable-ness or shadow of turning, long-suffering and plentiful in mercy, loving all his creatures, and loving most especially those whom he is compelled to chasten, forgiving till seventy times seven, giving his only-begotten son to die for the world that he would save, and whom the pure in heart shall be privileged to see at last.

An ordinary believer—pious, sincere, knowing nothing of the higher criticism of the Bible, and the influence of science upon biblical cosmogony, and having not been "insensibly" inoculated by the subtle emanations of the Zeit-Geist (time-spirit), but trained in the common doctrine of biblical inspiration, is often put to sore suffering and trial in the presence of this double aspect of the life of God. A man in sacerdotal robes, brought up at the feet of the most accredited Gamaliel, stamped as sterling by the image and superscription of a prominent church, addresses him thus: "You are bound to believe—for it is all written in the 'Inspired Books' and endorsed by the church—not only that God created man; called Abraham; led the Israelites out of Egyptian bondage, and set them apart and trained them as a peculiar people; revealed his true character and relations through a succession of prophets; and finally completed the purification and redemption of man through Jesus Christ;—but also that he directed the construction of Noah's ark, and sent all living beasts therein; aided Jacob in a filthy fraud; sanctioned the basest treachery; commanded fearful cruelties and unmerited penalties; permitted the flogging of slaves to death, provided only they did not die upon the spot; and dictated the veracious narrative of Balaam and his ass."

The man in sacerdotal robes continues to address the ordinary believer thus: "You must accept the one set of statements as not only equally true, but equally valuable and instructive, with the other; for what are you, that you should dare to choose between one and another deed or word of the 'Most High,' or place one on a higher level than another? You must receive all these things, on peril of damnation; for they are all written in the 'Word of God.' Everything written therein is inspired: and to reject or doubt 'the true sayings of God' is eternal punishment; for 'he that believeth not shall be damned.'" An ordinary Christian, thus addressed, either succumbs or resists. If he succumbs, his reason is outraged and bewildered, and his moral sense is shocked and injured. If he resists, he is made miserable by doubts, misgivings, and tormenting fears.

Now it ought to be plain to the person of usual intelligence that both these conceptions of the life of God cannot be true. It requires no profound thinking to reach this conclusion. To harmonize them is out of the question; and consequently, to believe them both is a mental impossibility. To explain the great divergence between the two, we must either suppose them to have been written by two different peoples, or by the same people at different periods in its history. Whatever the explanation be, it is certain that in this dual presentation of the deistic idea, we have the most convincing objection to a belief in the Christian god of which it is possible to conceive. However longingly men may desire to believe in a supreme being, maker of heaven and earth, it is past controversy to the sincere mind, that the Jehovah of the Jews and likewise of the Christians, will ever fill this requirement. To rest in one of these conceptions alone to the utter disregard of the other is to expunge from the Bible half of its supposed revelation; for if the immoral and debasing picture which it gives of God be not true, neither is the pure and exalted one, for they are both found in the "inspired" volume.

For one to say that both these pictures of God are true, presenting, as it were, different aspects of his nature in a more or less anthropomorphic way—in order that man might more perfectly understand him—is, to speak mildly, even a more complete condemnation of the truthfulness of divine revelation than the opinion expressed above; for, if both views be true, then we are sure that the Bible was written by ordinary uninspired men, for experience has taught us that it is only men who live a dual life; and when such an existence is recorded of God, the "Holy One," we are prima facie confident that the whole narrative is the product of the human mind, of a debased and debasing human intelligence. Individual men on this earth may choose to spend their days in a manner involving a sinful duality, but even they require of their god that he shall be pure and holy and without reproach, and highly sublimated above their selfish and pernicious affections. The world still awaits the manifestation of the god of the idealist.

Noah and Science.

In a review of a book, Mr. James Huneker, the noted critic, says: "Noah is the supreme symbol of science, he the first namer of the animals in the ark."

Is Mr. Huneker right? The scriptures say, as we read in Genesis ii, 19, 20, that when the Lord God had formed all the beasts and fowls he brought them to Adam to see what he would call them; "and whatsoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof; and Adam gave names to all cattle, and to the fowl of the air, and to every beast of the field." All fauna paraded before Adam except the female of his species, which was a later product (verses 21, 22) excerpted from Adam himself. It was a feat in naming (called nomenclature by men of science) that has won Adam a good deal of credit for versatility, since according to lists we have seen, there are upward of 380,000 different forms of animal life. We cannot vouch for the accuracy of the figures, but must accept such authority as that of Denton (Myth of the Great Deluge) and of Kelso (The Bible Analyzed). The last-named says there are more than a million varieties, including insects. Sereno Todd, in his tract on the naming of the animals, enters into a calculation of the time required to bring all of the beasts, birds, reptiles, etc., before Adam, and concludes that the job would consume about seven years, not excepting Sundays and holidays. There must also have been some delays—the bringing of the horse from his pasture, the coaxing of the perverse elephant, the leading forward of the obstinate pig. The recording of the names, and the description of the animals bearing them, are also to be provided for; for if the inventing of so many names came easy, the feat of remembering them seems beyond the capacity of the human mind. The list would be needed to be handed down to Noah, so that in marshaling them into the ark he would know when all were aboard.

If, as Mr. Huneker says, Noah was the "first namer of animals in the ark," then the prodigious labors of Adam must be passed to the credit of the hero of the flood. A passage in Ingersoll (Mistakes of Moses, p. 150) says: "Eight persons did all the work. They attended to the wants of 175,000 birds, 3,616 beasts, 1,300 reptiles, and 2,000,000 insects, saying nothing of countless anamalculæ." One of the seven persons, assumed to be Noah, gave each animal a name as it came up the gangplank. The account of the creation does not inform us that Adam was required to name the insects, unless the words "every living creature" include them; the story mentions particularly "every beast of the field and every fowl of the air." But Noah (Gen. vii, 14) had to take in "every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth." Provision for giving handles to the fishes and other denizens of the deep is absent in both accounts. Again the element of time must be considered. It would take a good while to name a million creeping things, not to mention the delay that would be caused in examining each pair of them to see if both sexes were there as required.

From Mr. Huneke's elevation of Noah to be a symbol of science, we infer he wishes us to accept the statement that Noah named the animals in the ark as a matter of fact. It is for him, then, to clear away some of the difficulties, or to show us how we can at least conceive of the thing's having taken place. We will not cavil at his substitution of Noah for the Adam of the biblical story. We understand that the older Babylonian tradition makes Noah the first man as well as the first sailor and collector of wild animals, and Mr. Huneke may have depended on that account; but before accepting Noah as "the supreme symbol of science" we want to be assured that in doing so we are not overlooking somebody who, by actually doing scientific work, established a better claim to the title. We have had our Barnum, who combined the executive ability of Noah with the psychological insight of Noah's biographer, being not only a good collector of beasts, but the author of the generalization that the people like to be humbugged.

What Does Jesus Do?

It is believed by honest Christians that Jesus saves them. There is a familiar hymn which says: "Jesus paid it all." Jesus is a kind of poor debtor's court for those who profess to believe in him.

Now, I have nothing against Jesus, although I take no stock in him as a God, as a man or as a savior. I think he was neither one of the three. To my mind men have fathers who are men, and not ghosts. The fact that Jesus had no human father is enough to prove to me that he was not a man. But I am not concerned at the present time about the genealogy of Jesus. I am more interested in him as the accepted savior of human beings.

To save a man a savior has to do something. There is a lot to do to save some men. A savior has a lifetime job, at least. Salvation begins at the cradle, or before. It begins where life begins. Sometimes a word will turn a life in the right direction and save a human heart much suffering. Is Jesus this kind of a savior? Does he stand where there is danger and warn the innocent to beware?

What kind of a savior is Jesus? Does he save a man from becoming a drunkard? Does he save a man from becoming a burglar? Does he save a man from becoming a thief, a liar, a cheat? What does Jesus do to save man? When man is hungry, does he feed him? When man is naked, does he clothe him? When he is sick, does he care for him? If Jesus does none of these things for man, in what way does he save him, and what does he save him from?

We are told that Jesus saves a man from something hereafter rather than here; that he is not an earthly savior, but a spiritual savior; he saves the soul. Now, what does it profit a man to save his soul and lose all the good things of earth, all the joys, all the happiness, all the blessings that come with liberty and knowledge? A man can be saved by Jesus only by being ignorant enough to believe in a Holy Ghost, only by being foolish enough to believe in the "immaculate conception," only by rejecting the counsels of his reason and common sense and accepting the silly superstitions of religion.

Man wants the salvation of civilization, of humanity, of modern life and modern attainments. He wants salvation through truth and right and justice. Jesus did nothing to exempt man from doing his duty; to take from man the natural penalty of his deeds; nothing to save him from the just fate of his life. Man wants safety from wrongs, security against evil.

One person can help another, and can help another to save himself in this life. That's all.

Jesus does nothing to save man. In a twentieth century sense he never did anything. He added no knowledge to the world. He flattered its ignorance and increased its superstitions. He took away one god and gave one not much better. His promises were all broken. His predictions were unfulfilled. As a savior he was an utter failure. The cross was his last defeat. It ended his pretensions. A son of God, as he claimed to be, became the sport of men. He was the leader of a handful of ignorant men. He was the king of a mob, the general of an army of the rabble. As a man he did not rise above his fellows. In short, it is difficult to find his humanity in the mass of wild and insane literature of the gospels. He is not so much a man as a mixture of several men. He was painted to suit the demands of too many followers.

As a savior Jesus is not wanted. The world has outgrown him. L. K. W.

Another Pretender to Divinity Gone.

That pretender to divine healing power, Francis Schlatter, who died the other day in the Los Angeles county hospital, is perhaps the last of his class now living, unless his partner, August Schrader, makes the same pretensions. A list of the men and women within our time who have manifested a willingness to be regarded in the light of prophets and messiahs, or reincarnations of the Christian savior, would contain many names. Those who gained most notoriety were Teed, Schweinfurth, Dowie, Mrs. Eddy and Schlatter. Their appearance was predicted long ago, according to the gospels of Matthew and Mark, where those listening to Jesus were warned: "Then if any man shall say unto you, Lo, here is Christ, or there; believe it not. For there shall arise false Christs, and false prophets, and shall shew great signs and wonders; insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect." The prediction was undoubtedly suggested by the existence of messianic rivals of Jesus. At the time referred to in the fifth of Acts there were enough of them to have become a nuisance. The Pharisee Gamaliel, a great counsellor among the Jews, stood up on one occasion and spoke about them, naming two—Theudas and Judas—to whose fate he advised the people to leave the apostles: "And to him they agreed; and when they had called the apostles, and beaten them, they commanded that they should not speak in the name of Jesus, and let them go." Gamaliel appears to have entertained some ideas favorable to religious liberty and freedom of speech, the only one of his kind among biblical characters. The pope of Rome is now the sole conspicuous example of a man pretending to speak as the vice-regent of Christ. Some of the European monarchs have divine rights, but they assign their source to God, not to Jesus. Voliva, the successor of Dowie, boasts himself to be somebody, as Gamaliel said of Theudas, but the messianic claim is not conspicuous. Jesus intimated that when he returned there would be celestial phenomena akin to lightning splitting the heavens from east to west, so that no mistake could be made in identifying him. Nothing analogous to this has occurred. The higher fakers come and go without making much of a disturbance.

It argues no defect in a principle that the unprincipled disregard it.

The Inutility of Gods.

Several American papers have been publishing of late more or less long accounts of the daily life of the emperor of Germany in this present war time. The point emphasized seems to be his great fear of assassination. While the rulers of the allied nations walk about with perfect freedom, anticipating no attack from a home or a foreign enemy, the ruler of the German empire, the special friend and companion of God, is alleged to be in mortal terror of losing his life at the hands of an assassin. No prominent person in Europe has made himself more conspicuous for his personal converse with God, and his trust in God's guiding and protecting power, than this ruler of the German people. He has given the world the impression that a close intimacy has been formed between himself and the celestial potentate, carrying with it the assurance of victory for the German arms, and perfect security and exaltation for the person of the emperor and his illustrious family. Supposing this to be true, the question immediately arises, why should the emperor exhibit any fear for his personal safety, especially when moving about among his own people? "If God be for us," he might truly say, "who can be against us?" Yet notwithstanding his faith in God; notwithstanding his supreme confidence in the justice of his cause, he exhibits the most abject fear and alarm, and makes every possible human provision for his security as if he were a notorious criminal seeking to escape the judgment of the law. This is a capital illustration of how the God-idea works practically. In peaceful and prosperous times men prate about it as if it were the one redemptive idea upon which turned the solution of all the problems of life and death. They organize societies to perpetuate the notion, and label hostilely those who will not agree with them. They divide communities and families by enforcing this childish explanation of the universe upon an unwilling people; but when the time comes that would prove the practical utility of the Divine power by its supplanting the cruel will of man, and demonstrating a providential care for humanity over the wiles of a chance creation, the interference of the supposed God invariably fails, and man betakes himself to the customary human methods for his individual safety and continuance. God is simply an idea that has no practical utility. If God shows no willingness to help those whom he calls his own, but compels them to resort to earthly means for assistance alike with the unbeliever, what is the wisdom of perpetuating the mere idea of divinity, the worthlessness of which can be so easily demonstrated? "God helps those who help themselves"; but be sure to help yourself first, otherwise you will never be helped; and so vanishes the greatest delusion that has ever obsessed mankind.

Ralph Philip Boas, in the Atlantic for February writes: "Judaism differs from Christianity in this—that while one chooses to be a Christian, one is born to be a Jew. An Atheist born of Jewish parents is an Atheist Jew, just as Disraeli, baptized in the Church of England, was nevertheless the 'Jew Premier.'" He shows that, no matter what renouncements or changes a Jew may make, he is still a Jew; and that large numbers of them are "professed Agnostics, in all the senses of that convenient term," and continues: "The fact is that, if Judaism must be a group of men without religious ideals, . . . it is far better that Judaism should disappear." We can hardly agree that people choose Christianity. In most instances they are born into it, just as a Jew or a Moham-medan is born into his religion. Very few grown people who have lived as Agnostics become converted to Christianity, for its foundation upon the miraculous appeals chiefly to immature intellect. The child naturally follows what he sees is generally accepted. One of the meanings of the word Christian is an inhabitant of Christendom, and in that sense it is not a voluntary choice. The word is also used to denote a person of the usual "exemplary" type, regardless of choice, shown by such remarks as, "Why don't you dress like a Christian?" And we have heard that the poorly dressed are not welcomed in many Christian God-houses.—A. M.

I do not see, therefore, how we can easily avoid the obvious inference that Jahweh, the god of the Hebrews, who later became sublimated and etherealized into the God of Christianity, was, in his origin, nothing more or less than the ancestral sacred stone of the people of Israel, however sculptured, and, perhaps, in the very last resort of all, the unhewn monumental pillar of some early Semitic sheikh or chieftain.—Grant Allen.

THAT JOSEPHUS QUOTATION

Its Repudiators Challenged to Produce an Edition of the Antiquities Not Containing It.

If Dr. Homer Wakefield has no more to offer than the reassertion of disproved allegations, he should retire. Unless something more than unsupported statements is presented I will close the discussion with the present article. Endless guesses, without evidence, elucidate nothing. To try to follow a man who has no fixed opinions, but veers from one hypothesis to another, is largely a waste of time.

He rejects a rational explanation from a text of Josephus that no man can impeach to take up the wild guess that "it is more than probable that the historical record (given by Josephus) of the insane Jesus, son of Ananus, provided a nucleus for the synthesis of the gospel Jesus." To my mind, such a supposition is the height of improbability. This Jesus, according to Josephus, was insane. For seven years and five months he gave articulation to nothing but one or two variations on the lamentation, "Wo, wo, to Jerusalem!" Josephus says "during all the time this man did not go near any of the citizens, he made no manner of reply to what was said to him, nor did he give ill words to those that beat him, nor good words to those that gave him food." The only time he is said to have varied from his doleful wail was just previous to his death. He is said then to have cried, with his utmost force: "'Wo, wo to the city, and to the people, and to the holy house.' And just as he added, 'Wo, wo to myself also,' there came a stone from one of the engines and smote him and killed him immediately." That is all the "historical record" we have of him, and the prediction of his own death is most likely a popular addition to excite superstition in the credulous.

The man who thinks that would form a nucleus that would deceive the apostle Paul must have an exceedingly low estimate of his historical knowledge. Paul quotes what Jesus said before he died. Where did he get it? It is not Josephus' account of Jesus, son of Ananus. The Jesus of the gospels refers to the death of Zacharias. As Jesus son of Ananus was crazy before Zacharias was killed, he could not have been the author of that expression. The Jesus of Paul was "hanged on a tree" and thus became cursed for our sake; Jesus son of Ananus was killed by a stone thrown from a Roman catapult. The writings of Paul have no doubt been "doctored"; but enough is genuine to give us assurance of his general belief.

In their desperation, the mythologists try to get rid of Paul as well as John the Baptist. That can be done only by undermining the credibility of all ancient history. It is beyond question that some of the epistles attributed to Paul are forgeries. Rival Christian creeds wanted to secure his endorsement of their own doctrines, and forged them. The Acts of the Apostles was written as a patchwork, to reconcile the divided followers of Peter and Paul. Paul is the earliest writer quoted by the Church fathers. Origen quotes him profusely. The epistles of all the other alleged gospel writers are likely spurious. The greatest difficulty I find in verifying my hypothesis as to the late advent and death of Jesus is the necessity to prove that Paul did not write at the early time church historians allege. He could not have been brought before Festus, as the Acts of the Apostles asserts, for, according to Josephus, Festus died before James the brother of Jesus was killed; and my hypothesis assumes that Jesus was then alive. He might have been before King Agrippa, who died A. D. 100, but his alleged speech before that king is as much a manufactured article as is Jesus' prayer when alone in Gethsemane. Beyond accepting it as a record of current traditions of the second or third century, no reliance can be placed on the Acts of the Apostles. It proves, however, that the story of Jesus sending his disciples into all the world to preach is a later manufactured myth. Now, any evidence that Dr. Wakefield possesses showing from late critics that "the earliest epistles of Paul" were written "not earlier than 100 A. D." will be extremely welcome to me. It is the one fact needed to establish the truth of my hypothesis. The existence of Paul is undeniable; although Burr, Robertson and others, in trying to support their pure myth theory, have gone to the extreme of denying it. Taylor did not attempt to deny it; although he says Paul's writings offer no confirmation of the mythical Jesus of the gospels; to which I agree. Two well-known Roman writers refer to Paul, viz., Longinus Dionysus Cassius, and Lucian, in his Dialogues. I quoted the latter in my "Gospels Unveiled" and drew the deduction from his sarcastic reference to the "bald-headed, hook-nosed Galilean who went into the third heaven" that the epistles of Paul and the Christian beliefs generally were then (A. D. 176) just coming into popularity, and became the objects of his satire. Should evidence of Paul's earlier advent be produced, I should be compelled to fall back on Mr. Muskat's theory that there were two Jesuses who claimed to be Christs within a short time of each other. To explain Paul, a real Jesus is necessary, unless Paul was the worst liar who ever masqueraded in the guise of a saint.

Dr. Wakefield takes three positions concerning Origen: First, he did not quote Josephus; second, he forged a quotation; third, some one else forged it into his writings. And yet, doubting which position to assume, he tells us, "These undoubted forgeries of Origen are not the only ones which stand to his discredit." To fortify this statement he rings in the Rev. J. W. Burgon's indictment of Origen for "corrupting the Holy Gospels." He might as well talk of corrupting a rotten egg. Who on earth knows what the "original text of the Holy Gospels" was? Does Dr. Wakefield? Origen was as competent as any man that ever lived to determine this. Anthon, in his Classical Dictionary, says, "No man did more to settle the true text of the sacred writings"; but, he adds, "from a fault in his education he applied to the scripture the allegorical method of the Platonists." This was no fault in his education. Paul did the very same thing. He tells us distinctly they are allegories. And Paul did not know the true text of "the holy scriptures"; for, as I have shown in "The Gospels Unveiled," he quotes psalms and texts not to be found in our "holy scriptures." Did Paul corrupt them? Where did Matthew get his quotation, "He shall be called a Nazarene"? It is not in our text. Will Burgon say Matthew "corrupted the holy scriptures"? Where did Josephus get all his numerous prophecies and sayings, alleged to have been made by Bible characters, that we have no record of? For two hundred years previous to the time of Jesus the Jews did not speak the Hebrew language. Origen was a Hebrew scholar, and modified the Septuagint version to conform to the numerous readings before him. No doubt he selected in the direction of his creed bias, and his explanatory notes, after renewed translations, crept into the "original" text. That "original" of God's word was built up by just such additions and mistakes. Origen was as competent to tell us what God meant as Paul or Josephus or Philo. He spent twenty-eight years in gathering up all the various readings of it. If after making two copies of a revised Septuagint he "destroyed all others," as alleged, how on earth does Burgon or Wakefield know he corrupted it? The Jews had done that before him; and any variation of his text from extant Jewish copies proves nothing but the precarious predicament in which God has left his word. Even if we had Tatianus's lost book, on which so much is relied to clear up the mystery, it would not help us a step in the solution of the problem. It would only add another to the multitude of opinions. Concerning Origen's translation of the Septuagint, Anthon says: "The great use that had been made by the Jews of the Septuagint previous to their rejection of it, caused a multiplication of copies in which besides the alterations designedly made by the Jews, numerous errors had been made by transcribers, and from marginal notes having been allowed to creep into the text." The opinion of a nineteenth century parson, then, as to Origen's "corruption," is not worth quoting. Mr. Wakefield has a good deal of his old theological training still clinging to him. Let us not forget that the original of Origen's translation was never preserved. Anthon says: "To repair as far as possible this loss scholars have in modern times occupied themselves with the task of restoring it from various sources." The Benedictine version, on which Wakefield relies, was one of these efforts, and compiled A. D. 1713. What it has taken in or what it has left out is a matter of prejudice.

Dr. Wakefield makes the curious statement, "Had I not neglected to include in my last article the fact that Origen expressly says (Contra Celsum I. 47) that Josephus did not recognize Jesus as the messiah, the controversy would have been ended." That was the very statement he made in his first article, and to which I took exception by saying he was twisting Origen's words out of their meaning. It is now manifest to me that Dr. Wakefield has never read Origen. The words he refers to occur in the very passage I quoted; but copying them from an appendix to my own volume of Josephus, where the reference is given by page, I was not aware that it was identical with "Contra Celsum" I. 47. His positive assertion that no ecclesiastical or modern writer had ever heard of such a quotation, and calling on me for proof of its accuracy, compelled me to waste my time by going to the Congressional Library to verify it. Such a bald denial by ignorance equals any audacity Origen could ever have been guilty of. I do not think there is a volume of this controversy with Celsus in the Congressional Library that does not contain it, but not being a Greek or Latin scholar, I could only verify it in English and French translations. The only place where Origen refers to Josephus is in chapter 47, and that chapter, in every translation I examined, contains the equivalents of the very words I quoted, modified, of course, by different translators. I also found the quotations in an appendix to one or two volumes of Josephus, like my own, notably that by Whiston, Tegg, and Crombie. I also found both quotations—i. e. from the controversy and from the commentary on Matthew—in a very late work by A. S. Garretson entitled "Primitive Christianity," published at Boston, 1912. This author seems to be either a Unitarian or a Freethinker, but falls into the error of accepting Tacitus for the crucifixion of Christ. If Tacitus had ever written this, Origen would have known it, and have been under no necessity to tell Celsus what Josephus "ought to have said." Whiston tries to defend the forgery generally attributed to Eusebius, but fathered on Gaius by Photius, by stating that Josephus was a Nazarene, and might have written it. If he had been a Nazarene he would have known Paul and mentioned him. Paul, being later than generally supposed, could have had no reputation when Josephus wrote his works, and there is not a word in Josephus' whole writings to indicate he was a Nazarene. From his frequent reference to Essene prophets I would conclude he was an Essene, like Philo. Origen had imbibed much of the Logos lingo from this source; and Eusebius thought Philo was a Christian. Mr. Eshleman's conjecture that this may have been an early form of Christianity before the death of Jesus is probably true. After Jesus' death, then "the Word or Logos was made flesh and dwelt among us." No doubt the writers of both the Gospels and the Acts drew from Josephus, and mixed up characters and events in an ignorant way. Perhaps Josephus' use of the words "who was called Christ," was the very reason for their being put into the mouth of Pilate.

The use by Origen of this quotation in his Commentary on Matthew, before his controversy with Celsus, shows that it was not forged under stress of finding evidence. Because he called the James of Josephus "James the Just," every theological parrot from that day has done the same, including Dr. Wakefield. In every volume of Josephus I looked at in the Library I came across the inevitable foot note "this refers to James the Just." It is like Bible Commentators telling us that Solomon's love songs refer to Christ. "James the Just" is probably a myth. Origen borrowed him from apocryphal gospels, and his statement that Josephus attributed the destruction of Jerusalem to his death is false, wherever he got it. Josephus nowhere in all his works mentions James the Just. He nowhere calls a man the "brother" of another named individual in a church sense. It was because the text of Josephus gave the lie to church traditions that this James the Just and "brother" application was invented, and Dr. Wakefield has not been able to show wherein I have been "unfortunate" in rejecting the whole spurious apology.

Let Dr. Wakefield find me an ancient text of Origen that does not contain the forty-seventh chapter referring to Josephus' use of the words "James the brother of Jesus who was called Christ," and I am done. Till he does, he should be done. The fact that it had been quoted for centuries, and he did not know it shows how much dependence is to be placed on his judgment.

He absolutely refuses to consider how it came to pass that in a book purporting to explain how Jesus came to save all men, the evidence is given that he did no such a thing; or how while claiming that he was contemporaneous with John the Baptist, words are put in his mouth, and in the mouth of Paul, that show he did not live till after John's death. Half the contradictions we find in the gospels spring from a dual story of Jesus—one derived from Jewish sources, and one from Gentile.

An able writer and physician from Boston writes me he is interested in the Jesus controversy, but says: "In order that I might push out the fear and theological results of Christian teaching, I have always denied such a person, and attributed the religion to the sun myth theory." Because a story may have a nucleus of truth is no reason why its manifest falsehoods should not be denied. My theory really helps to get rid of these accumulated falsehoods. The whole religion of the Jews is borrowed from astronomical mythology, and Jesus and Paul and Josephus were the victims of its false teachings. No headway is made against Christians by denying the existence of these people. Even Mr. Washburn, to be effective, is continually compelled to assume Jesus' existence as a means to expose the low moral status of his teachings. If he would only point out that the Jesus who tells the young man to seek salvation by obeying the Jewish commandments and the Jesus who wants people to be born again before they can enter into eternal life are contradictory traditions from two different sources, his exposition would be plainer. Dealing in Large Numbers.

"The city [the New Jerusalem or heaven] lieth four-square and the length is as large as the breadth; and he measured the city with the reed, twelve thousand furlongs. The length, and the breadth, and the height of it are equal." (Rev. xxi, 16.)

John the Revelator here gives us the dimensions of the abode of the blest; but, as is customary with his class of historians, has failed to locate it. In this statement of John, we have the size and shape of heaven. It is 1,500 miles long, 1,500 miles wide, and 1,500 miles high. We can readily enough conceive of a city 1,500 miles square, but to have walls around it 1,500 miles high has stumped all creation up to the present time. But have patience, a little further on I will show you a use for them. Heaven was made in the shape of a cube to show Jehovah's utter disregard and independence of the process of nature, all other celestial bodies being of a spherical shape.

From many biblical quotations heaven would appear but a short distance away, and yet this great mysterious 1,500-mile cube has never been sighted.

This heaven is the place where the righteous will reign as kings and priests, but what they will reign over is past comprehension. As none but the righteous will inherit this kingdom, they must of necessity be all kings and priests, and as the natural propensity of kings and priests is to plunder and pilfer, they will have a merry time skinning each other.

By appealing to God's holy word, we may obtain some idea as to the number of persons that will arise at the resurrection with claims of residency in the New Jerusalem. In Gen. xxii, 17, Jehovah tells Abraham: "I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the seashore." This does not include the millions that are not of Abraham's seed or those that were before Abraham.

There is no way that I know of to estimate the number of grains of sand at the seashore, so we will put the number at a reasonable figure. It will be greatly underestimating it, but let's say sixty sextillions. This immense figure (speaking in a human fashion) will answer our purpose. All we have to do now is to find out if the heaven that God has provided is commodious enough to accommodate the gathering.

The ground space of this city would be 62,726,400,000,000 square feet. Allowing a space of five square feet for each person, it would only accommodate 12,545,280,000,000. As this would leave too many out in the cold, or heat, whichever the case may be, we will utilize the walls which surround the city. As they are 7,820,000 feet high, we will take the liberty of making the city 7,900 stories high. This leaves 1,000 feet between floors; the extra 20,000 feet can be allowed for the thickness of the floors. From the mundane view, this space between floors looks like a waste; but, taking into consideration the tolerable height of this building "not made with hands," it is not out of proportion. If we should add more stories by lessening the height of the ceilings, the building would appear squatty. Even with these additional stories, the building would only accommodate 99,107,712,000,000,000 persons. This would still leave outside the breastworks 59,999,900,892,288,000,000,000 souls waiting in line for their turn to be admitted. As there will be no more dying there and therefore no vacancies, the case of those on the line looks hopeless. Viewing problems like this shows an incentive for the damning of souls as freely as God has done it. He did not know what else to do.

We have made no allowance for pillars in this edifice to support the floors. If we did, it would take away that much more standing room and God knows they are cramped enough as it is. We will let it stand as it is and trust to God's everlasting shoulders to hold them up. As the quarters of these redeemed ones will be limited, they will have to stand up to do their lying. Sleep, possibly, will be unnecessary, as there will be no night there. Even if sleep is required, they could obtain a little sleep, also a little slumber, by quietly holding their hands. (Prov. vi, 10.)

throne of God and all his holy angels with their harps and other paraphernalia might be squeezed in.

If, as some think, it is only the soul that survives, and as estimated by the late Dr. Talmage, 1,000,000 souls can sit on the point of a pin, all this great building would go for naught, as every single soul that came up in the resurrection could be accommodated in a goldfish bowl and even then have ample room to fly around. This would make damning souls for lack of room unnecessary.

When the tremendous number of those taking part in the resurrection (sixty sextillions) is mentioned, some scoffer is sure to remark, "Why, there would not be enough material in a half-dozen earths to form their bodies." Well, we will investigate.

Todd's Astronomy estimates the weight of the earth at "six sextillion tons," or twelve septillion pounds. In this immense figure, there is enough material to allow two hundred pounds to each individual composing the sixty sextillion risen ones; so, it would not be necessary to requisition many more earths to make their individual girths remarkable to view.

To give some idea of this number (twelve septillion, the weight of the earth in pounds), we will suppose one hundred million pounds annihilated every second of time. It would take at this prodigious rate of destruction, allowing 365¼ days to the year, 3,802,570,537 years to accomplish the complete destruction of the earth. Enough said, let's have no more loose talk on this subject.

V. SPRAGUE.

Shall We Pray?

I just saw it stated in the Christian Register that certain American scientists have been asked by Prof. James Henry Leuba whether or not they believe in a God who answers prayers in any other sense than a subjective psychological one.

Dr. Leuba's purpose is not to learn the religious belief of these men, but only whether they "believe in a particular concept of God, without which Christian worship, as now practiced, cannot continue."

If this question had been propounded fifty or sixty years ago a certain religious reserve (call it piety) would have made it difficult to get any satisfactory answer, but during this time, science and investigation have led active minds much closer to nature, which is godless, so far as concerns bending in any way to our desires or needs, prayers or no prayers. Nature, as Du Prel says, "is neither cruel nor loving, neither tender nor hard-hearted; she merely acts according to laws, and in the whole universe not an atom moves except by law." There are plenty of unfathomable wonders in nature, but no miracles. Her laws are fixed, the same to-day, to-morrow, and at all times. If it were not so, worldly progress would be as impossible as it would be to tell time by a watch that varied one way or the other two or three hours in the twenty-four. Casualties come everywhere without regard to loss or value of property destroyed.

A bomb or an iceberg may sink a steamer with a thousand souls on board, or miss a fishing smack with a crew of only six or a dozen men. The steamer might have many of the greatest intellects of the world on board, as well as men holding high positions, where the good of the community greatly depended on them, and the boat's crew might know little more than enough to bait a hook or cast a net. These results are simply the working of nature's laws, and they are not modified by any mercy in regard to loss, whether it is great or little.

The only possible answer to prayer in any case is by stimulating the nervous system to greater exertion, but this subjective process answer is not what Christians want.

Years ago, it was proposed by some scientific men to separate certain wards in the Massachusetts hospital, and have regular prayers for the recovery of these patients, and compare results with wards that had only the regular medical and surgical treatment, but various religious excuses were offered by Christians against any such test, so nothing was done. A belief in a God who does not suspend or interfere with his own laws, and still answers prayers, is to me inconceivable. The answer must be in the subjective psychological sense. Any way, much profit can be derived from reading Dr. Leuba's book, as it shows a broad grasp of the subject of prayer, God and the question of a future life. The work is free from bias, either on the Christian or anti-Christian side of the question. FRANCIS ALGER.

A country cannot well subsist without liberty, nor liberty without virtue.—Rousseau.

Ultimus Romanorum. The last of the master-builders of modern science, whose structure, however amended in detail, rests on a foundation that cannot be shaken, has passed away in the person of Sir Edward Burnett Tylor.

Born at Camberwell, of Quaker stock, he was educated at Grove House, Tottenham, a Quaker school; entered his father's brass foundry, but threatened lung trouble compelled him to leave London and seek health in travel. In Cuba he met Henry Christy, also a Quaker, now remembered only by a few for his discoveries of prehistoric art in the caves of the Dordogne. The two traveled to Mexico, a result of which was Tylor's first study in anthropology, "Anahuac, or Mexico and the Mexicans," published in 1861. From that time onward until 1907, when his health failed, there flowed from his pen a series of treatises, large and small, of the highest import as contributions to knowledge of man's physical, but primarily, in the case of all that Tylor wrote, psychological, evolution. His "Researches into the Early History of Mankind" appeared in 1865, and his "Primitive Culture" in 1871. To this last named he might have applied the words in which Thucydides writes of his history: "It is an everlasting possession, not a prize composition which is heard and forgotten."

For it is not possible to overestimate the value of Tylor's truly epoch-making book. The subtitle, "Researches into the Development of Mythology, Philosophy, Religion, Language, Art, and Custom," shows what a vast canvas is covered, and this with never a blur. The enormous body of fact, on which is based the significant conclusion as to the application of the processes of evolution to what Herbert Spencer called the "super-organic," is marshaled in perfect order and set forth in a style so luminous and simple that the power therein is apt to escape the reader who permits his attention to be diverted from the matter to its treatment.

What Huxley, in his "Man's Place in Nature," established in proof of the ascent of the body, Tylor, in his "Primitive Culture," established in proof of the ascent of the mind. The last chapter in the first volume, and the whole of the second volume, are devoted to an exposition of the history of animism and of the body of ritual and custom springing out of that primitive conception of things. The keynote is struck in the following passage, which, since the book is not on the shelf of every reader of this journal, may be cited without apology for its length, both in evidence of the clearness of the style and the importance of the subject:

"For the most part the 'religious world' is so occupied in hating and despising the beliefs of the heathen, whose vast regions of the globe are painted black on the missionary maps, that they have little time or capacity left to understand them. It cannot be so with those who fairly seek to comprehend the nature and meaning of the lower phases of religion. These, while fully alive to the absurdities believed and the horrors perpetrated in its name, will yet regard with kindly interest all record of men's earnest seeking after truth with such light as they could find. The reward of these inquirers will be a more rational comprehension of the faiths in whose midst they dwell, for no more can he who understands but one religion understand even that religion than the man who knows but one language can understand that language. No religion of mankind lies in utter isolation from the rest, and the thoughts and principles of modern Christianity are attached to intellectual clues which run back through far pre-Christian ages to the very origin of human civilization, perhaps even of human existence." (Vol. I, pp. 420-21.)

The concluding words of this quotation evidence that Tylor was quite prepared to extend the period of the evolution of religion so that it is linked up with a stage when the human merges in the animal. But the reader will do well to buy or borrow the book, if only to see how incisively, nearly fifty years ago, Tylor dealt with modern Spiritualism. The mischievous drivel which fills the pages of Sir Oliver Lodge's "Raymond" is shown by Tylor to be "a direct revival from the regions of savage philosophy and peasant folk-lore. . . . Necromancy is a religion, and the Chinese manes-worshiper may see the outer barbarians come back, after a heretical interval of a few centuries, into sympathy with his time-honored creed" (ib., pp. 142-23). The whole of the chapter, entitled "Survival in Culture," deals with this subject, and demands careful perusal.

Tylor had the simplicity and high integrity which marks the Quaker character. In wandering with him through the Museum, guardianship over whose prehistoric contents was his joy, or in a chat in his library over schemes which, the publication of his Gifford Lectures to wit, were frustrated by waning powers, the charm and heartiness with which he put his visitor at ease made the latter forget for the moment into what fellowship of a great soul it was his privilege to enter.

Honors, as numerous as they were deserved, were showered upon him. He would hold in small esteem the knighthood which came to him in 1912; it was the recognition of his work by his scientific comrades that he prized most, and not least among this was a volume of "Anthropological Essays," dedicated to him by a number of brethren of the cult in celebration of his seventy-fifth birthday.—Edward Clodd in the Literary Guide.

Chat from Chicago.

England has given us a world-renowned speaker and writer, and now an invaluable immigrant to our shores, in the person of Joseph McCabe. The submarine will oblige him to rest content in our land of the free if he does not want to share the fate of that other famous fellow, of whom we used to sing, named McGinty.

Having captured Johnny Bull's people, McCabe comes over here to capture Uncle Sam's folks. He doesn't look sizable enough to capture or conquer anything, but he got us Americans all right.

"Was it the great war that bloo you over to us?" said I to him. "Sure thing; it was the big war that blyew me over," said he to me.

It's a comfort to have a man carry his nationality about with him. Mr. McCabe proclaims himself English as soon as he speaks. He is so far from being a giant in size that I fail to see where he stows all that gray matter of his, for one small head certainly cannot contain it all. And the noise he makes is something terrifying. Where does he get all that? I suppose he can talk in the open air to ten thousand people and be distinctly understood by every one of them.

The stress he places on final consonants, so that every word will get over the footlights, is worthy of imitation by all our speakers if they would make their voices far-reaching. The American indubitably is slovenly of speech as compared to the English, yet I do not believe we deserve the fling at America which is implied in a sign that hung in a window of a Luzerne tea room. It read: "English spoken here. American understood."

Since I have heard McCabe and enjoyed him so hugely I do not wonder that he is so proud of his nationality, of his "tight little island." A poor deluded youth was Joseph McCabe. His trust in an over-ruling Providence was as infantile as it was sincere. He told of taking a glass of crystal clear water into his cell in the monastery, where, placing it in the window so that any eye, let alone the all-seeing one, could not help noticing it, he prayed with all his might that God would change the water into wine, and God was mean enough to ignore the prayer. This blunder on God's part cost him Joseph's allegiance, for he lost his faith at once in such an impotent being. Another factor in destroying the young man's faith was the sight of a reverend father in the monastery with a bottle of whisky protruding from his breast pocket. If God was generous enough to furnish strong drink to the reverend father, why could he not afford to give Joseph an inexpensive glass of wine?

As to Mr. McCabe's fighting abilities, all I can say is that the priests never had so fierce an opponent. He is a veritable Samson, and is pulling down the pillars of the Catholic church with amazing power and rapidity. If I were the pope I wouldn't let him live.

I ought to have mentioned that a banquet was held under the auspices of the Chicago Rationalist Association and the Daughters of the Renaissance, which was founded by Mangasarian and accounts for the unusual number of women at the dinner. The evening previous, it should be noted, Mr. McCabe lectured on the subject, "The Papacy and the World War." Wm. F. McGee, ex-priest, was chairman, and so there were two live flesh-and-blood ex-priests on the platform at the same time. They have got the Catholic church "on the run" by handing out the truth. Those of the "old guard" of Freethinkers who were present were much pleased to hear McCabe's mention of his old friend Putnam.

It is declared that the English are impervious to humor. Why, you'd think they lived on it by the way Mr. McCabe reeled it off. One couldn't recover from one joke until, like lightning, another one was splitting your sides.

NOTES AT LARGE.

An anonymous writer in the St. George's Magnet explains why he goes to church, and the editors state that they do not necessarily acquiesce in his views, which are admittedly Agnostic. He says in part: "I may be mistaken, but I doubt whether one man in fifty has to-day any certitude of belief in hell or heaven, and for most of us the question of whether we shall live again is answered in the words of Robert Ingersoll, 'Reason says perhaps, while hope still answers yes.'" For those who are thus content to be Agnostics with regard to the unknowable, St. George's church offers a wide range of activity. He goes to church because he believes the assertion so often made that the church is the greatest centre of activity for humanitarianism. A correspondent of THE TRUTH SEEKER tells us that this is the challenge Secularists must meet — that the churches are doing all the humanitarian work. As a matter of fact, the churches are doing very little of it. For what weight it will carry we may repeat the statement of a minister at a Boston church conference a few years ago that nearly all uplift work was being done by societies having no church connections, and that the church did not enjoy the adhesion of fifteen per cent. of the social workers. We might reproduce an article of considerable length from a number of the Biblical World, issued under the auspices of the University of Chicago, explaining clearly the separation of the church from humanitarian endeavor. The philanthropic work of the church is so-called charity supported by appropriations from the public treasury and carried on not in the name of humanitarianism, but of religion. It would be of inestimable value to the church as an alleged humanitarian center if it could truthfully claim that from the beginning of its history, or at any time in its history, or today, it was the consistent denouncer of the institution of war, instead of being obliged to quote Jesus as a belligerent. The article in the Biblical World, to which reference has been made, says that instead of men joining the church in order to do the best work for humanity, they are compelled to leave it. That a man may participate in any of the modern movements for the improvement of human conditions it is wholly unnecessary for him to mumble a creed in which he does not believe.

Billy Sunday, thinking to improve upon the ten commandments as handed to Moses out of heaven by God, has written a like number of commandments of his own, which are supposed to reflect perfectly the character of the age, as well as the discriminating powers of their remarkable originator. Here are some of them: "Thou shalt not tango"; "Thou shalt not have too many beaux"; "Thou shalt not dodge thy debts," and so on. The evangelist's elucidation of the last of these—his ninth commandment—is certainly a unique piece of exegesis, and we recommend it to the professors in the exegetical department of our seminaries, at least to the learned D.D.'s who are zealously supporting Billy Sunday's method of evangelism. Sunday, in his comment on his ninth commandment, says: "Some haven't religion enough to pay their debts. Would that I might have a hook and for every debt that you left unpaid I might jerk off a piece of clothing! If I did, some of you would be left with only a celluloid collar and a pair of socks." Apart from the low-born vulgarity of this picture, we have a distinct recollection of a certain evangelist, Billy Sunday by name, making most generous use in his sermons of the product of other men's brains, without the slightest intention of recognizing the debt, not to speak of his never paying it. We venture the prediction that if the hook were applied to the public discourses of this gospel messenger after his style of using it, barring the slang features, which, of course, are distinctly his own, he would be left intellectually in a more denuded condition than the person of whom he himself speaks. It is a well-known fact that Sunday made use of the meanest subterfuges to escape from the dilemma in which he found himself when confronted with the theft of one of Colonel Ingersoll's orations, which he had endeavored to pass off as his own. It will never be said of him, as a certain spendthrift humorously remarked of a friend less hardened than himself: "He wasted his means in paying his debts."

Slavery was to the Greek mind a law of nature. Aristotle had persuaded himself that some men were "naturally" slaves. His conscience did not prick him when he defined tools as "lifeless slaves" and slaves as "living tools." The Jewish law allowed slavery, though it forbade the permanent enslavement of a native Israelite. Christianity did not abolish slavery. English seamen, like Hawkins, carried slaves to America in ships which were named after Jesus. More than this, even in 1712, by the Assiento Contract in the Treaty of Utrecht, England secured the slave trade of the world. The treaty was celebrated by Te Deums for which Handel wrote the music. Americans, up to the time of the Civil War, practiced slavery with an easy conscience. Public speakers like Henry Ward Beecher and Wendell Phillips were denounced by Christian churches for advocating abolition. What has happened that all at once within the last sixty years slavery has become "wrong," and the conscience of humanity protests against it? It is not the work of religion, of Christianity; it is not the result of a fresh revelation. It is only that with the growth of knowledge, with the advance of economics and the fuller study of anthropology, it has become overwhelmingly clear that the system of slavery does not work. The apparent economic gain to a few is balanced by the most appalling results to the rest, and ultimately to the few themselves. Slave labor is wasteful. A slave population is demoralizing even to the masters. A genuine democracy cannot be maintained on slave labor, because the rights of man become invalid in sight of men who have no rights; and to treat the laborer as a chattel is to make labor degrading. Conscience has at last condemned slavery on the same principle that it originally condemned murder; it is against the good of the whole.

Somewhat more than forty years ago, namely in 1876, a series of articles from the pen of Prentice Mulford, called the "Ichabod Crane Papers," was published in THE TRUTH SEEKER. One of them was a sort of burlesque report of the Moody and Sankey revival then going on in New York, and among its statements was the assurance that means had been provided for removing lunatics as fast as they were developed. What was burlesque as applied to the Moody meetings has become sober fact in connection with the evangelism of the Rev. W. A. Sunday. The following is from the New York Sun of February 2:

"When Billy Sunday was in Boston 620 persons were cared for in the hospital maintained in the tabernacle there. Therefore it has been deemed advisable to equip an emergency hospital in the Sunday tabernacle in New York. There will be beds, surgical fixtures and supplies and drugs, not to mention nurses and physicians.

Attendants will be present from various city hospitals; and:

"Each hospital represented will have charge of the tabernacle hospital for two weeks, sending two physicians for regular duty in the evenings and enlisting volunteer physicians for the afternoon and Sunday morning meetings."

There will be a doctor there from Bellevue Hospital, which has a psychopathic ward, to take care of the hystericals. In Philadelphia the majority of cases were fainting, or collapse, or nervous prostration, or acute hysteria. The number whose minds or nerves were affected insufficiently to warrant their removal to the hospital is unknown. If the performance were something other than a religious revival the Board of Health would probably feel justified in suppressing it as a menace to the sanity of the town.

In an address to the faculty and students of Xavier University, New Orleans, March 2, by James Cardinal Gibbons, this statement occurs:

"I am happy to say that the colored people are deeply and naturally religious. There are some people, some races, that can hardly be aroused to recognize the Christian religion, the religion of Christ, whereas, the colored race are always responsive to it, and I have yet to see or to hear of the first colored man who has ever yet proclaimed himself an Atheist, an unbeliever."

A colored Atheist might not report to Cardinal Gibbons, and if the cardinal omitted to read THE TRUTH SEEKER he might never hear of one. Admittedly they are comparatively few, but they are occasionally to be found. We recall an intelligent colored man, a visitor to this office, who attends Freethought meetings whenever at liberty (he is a sailor on one of our warships), and has stated that the substituting of Rationalism for the tenets of Christianity had an improving influence on his moral conduct. A colored Atheist of some reputation as a speaker has been addressing audiences composed of persons of his own race in this city. We do not know what proportion of his hearers are unbelievers, but there are enough of them to prove that the statement of Cardinal Gibbons needs to be qualified.

Evolution is not heresy, and "there is nothing in the book of Genesis that points toward a disapproval of the doctrine of evolution," are assertions made by Dr. Shailer Mathews, dean of the divinity school at the University of Chicago, before a branch of the Young Men's Christian Association in Philadelphia last month, which the Philadelphia Record reports. Somebody once tried to convince Professor Huxley of the harmony existing between Genesis and evolution, and he would not concede the point. Instead, he said that when instructed clergymen read out the statements that "in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is," they are propagating what they are bound to know are falsities. Regarding the language of Genesis, he said it was hard to understand and harder to believe, and that for those who hold the doctrine of evolution all the Christian verities about the creation of living things are simply false. They cannot admit that man was made suddenly out of the dust of the ground, while "it would be an insult to ask an evolutionist whether he credits the preposterous fable respecting the fabrication of woman." In his opinion, to one who pinned his faith to Genesis as interpreted by orthodox theologians, "evolution is utter heresy," and that was the view held by Christians generally in Huxley's time, but not always so frankly admitted by evolutionists. It is rather late in the day to rehabilitate Genesis, although it may look true to one who declares, as Dean Mathews did in the same address, that "war is one of the greatest arguments for the existence of a God of justice."

Undesirable religious conditions are found in "a Southern Ohio county" by the Rev. C. O. Gill, secretary of the Commission on Church and Country Life of the Federal Council of Churches. This county, he says "has ninety-eight churches in 1883. Since then she has lost thirty-six of them, eight being losses of the last year. Church membership has steadily declined at a much greater rate than the slight decline in population. The sixty churches remaining have a total budget of only $8,000. There are almost no resident ministers in the county, and some of the ministers try to serve as high as ten churches." The churches have been put out of business by revivalism, which made the inhabitants religious at the expense of their morals and general well-being. Here is what the Rev. Mr. Gill reports:

"The religion prevalent in this county is a travesty on the teachings of Jesus Christ, being merely emotionalism and excitement without direct result upon the moral and every-day life of the people. There have been 1,500 revivals here in the last thirty years, and yet disease, ignorance, vote selling and poverty are prevalent, and on the increase."

The county has averaged a revival a week for almost a generation, and the last state is worse than the first. There is no reason to doubt that other localities where revivalism has prevailed have deteriorated in proportion, since it is impossible that emotionalism and excitement can be otherwise than evil, and that continually.

A correspondent of the Kansas City Star claims the reward offered by the Roman Catholic Bishop Enright to anyone who will produce scriptural authority for the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath, which he, of course, maintains was established on the authority of his church. The correspondent says:

"I would cite the instance where Joshua commanded the sun to stand still. No matter what day Joshua stopped the sun, it extended over and consumed the succeeding day. Because of that, the seventh day is now Sunday instead of Saturday."

The merging of two days into one, if accepted as a fact, regarding which point there exists some skepticism among astronomers, would indeed postpone the Sabbath for twenty-four hours, and make Sunday the seventh day. But the sinking of days did not end there, but was practiced in later years whenever it became necessary to correct the calendar. To say nothing about what happened prior to 1751, an act of Parliament in that year ordered that the day following September 22, 1752, should be accounted the fourteenth day of the month, and it was done; hence what is called "new style." Here were eleven days dropped—four more than there are in a week; so that, following the rule of the Star correspondent, the Sabbath ought to fall on the previous Wednesday, and Wednesday would now be holy time.

The New York Bible Society, of which the Rev. George W. Carter is secretary, is considering the advisability of placing a Bible in the dressing-rooms of all the theaters. They have begun the propaganda by placing a Bible in the hand of each of the chorus girls in the Manhattan Opera House to be read by them during the hour that they are obliged to wait before the commencement of the second act in the play, "The Wanderer." Dr. Carter boasts that he has placed thousands of Bibles in countless hotels. It is easy to make a statement of this kind, which will appear very interesting to many pious people, but as to the moral or spiritual results accruing from such a large expenditure of money as a gratuity of this kind must entail, we hear nothing whatever. Familiar as most people are with the lack of interest shown everywhere today in the practice of Bible reading, it seems like a sinful waste of money to purchase and distribute books which no one cares about. This is a very conservative view of the matter. When it is considered that such an undertaking simply adds to the dissemination and maintenance of the grossest form of superstition known to our day, it becomes an educational matter, and should receive a like condemnation with the regulation to read the Bible in the public schools.

That Catholic propagandist paper, Our Sunday Visitor, conducts a department devoted to answering the questions of the faithful, one of whom is sufficiently befogged regarding fundamental honesty to inquire: "How much may a person steal from a man who is earning a good salary and has no one depending upon him for support, without committing a mortal sin, supposing the stealing is done with the full consent of the will?" The editor of the paper warns his correspondent not to spend his life playing on the edge of a precipice, as he is liable to become dizzy and fall too deep. But a circular issued by a Guardian of Liberty quotes the Theologia Moralis of St. Liguori as follows:

"There are many opinions about the amount which may be stolen to constitute a mortal sin. Naver said that to steal a half-piece of gold is a mortal sin; while others hold that to steal less than ten pieces of gold cannot be a serious sin."

The haziness of the church on the sinfulness or innocence of theft permits it to take the taxpayer's money against his protest. Proverbs vi, 30, is interpreted by Catholic theologians as justifying theft in certain circumstances.

The question having been raised by a New York clergyman "whether a lie is ever justifiable," a correspondent of one of our papers points out that Martin Luther permitted lying of three kinds, namely, "necessary" lies (notlugen), "useful" lies (nutzlugen), and "helpful" lies (hilfslugen), and declared that such lies "God would take upon himself." In 1913 Mr. Frank Hill Perrycoste published a work entitled "On the Influence of Religion Upon Truthfulness," showing that truthfulness had been altogether the sufferer through such influence. The statement of the church historian Eusebius, on whose testimony hang so many Christian apologetics, that in his history he would "omit whatever might tend to the dishonor of the church, and magnify whatever conduces to her glory," is an example. It is noteworthy that apologies for lying are almost uniformly of religious origin and have their justification in scripture.

The sentiments of the Rev. Fred A. Agar of Sacramento do him credit. In arguing that churches have no right, moral or legal, to raise money by means of bazars held in them, where merchandise is sold, Dr. Agar declares:

"It is illegal for a church to compete with the merchants. Why is a church exempted from taxation? Because it is supposed to be in the business of God. If any church was used as a place to sell five cents' worth of merchandise and if the assessor did his duty the property would be taxed to the limit. Has a church the right to break a law and then set itself up as a temple of righteousness?"

The churches as civil misdemeanants do not confine themselves to the sale of merchandise in violation of the law. They promote raffles and other deadfalls and brace games to part the unwary and their money. The unlicensed sale of intoxicants at their fairs is not unknown. Calls to reform and repentance have not been heeded.

The report that the former pugilist, Robert Fitzsimmons, will follow in the footsteps of W. A. Sunday and Mr. Al Jennings is not verified; but the Express of San Antonio, Texas, states that Harry Spanell of San Angelo, who shot and killed his wife and Col. M. C. Butler of the United States army in obedience to the higher law, will join the Scoville evangelistic company as a singer. Successful evangelism requires that the evangelist shall have made a record for wickedness or achieved notoriety outside the pulpit, and is not particular whether he is a ball-player, a pugilist, an outlaw or a murderer freed by the miscarriage of justice.

The Christian-Evangelist (Disciples, St. Louis) sees "signs of a vanishing Protestantism" in America. This is due to the superior birth rate among foreigners, of whom "the majority are Jews, Catholics or Freethinkers." The religious paper no doubt has grounds for its apprehensions. An observer who goes about the country a good deal tells us that the Catholic increase by birth comes no more, as formerly, from the Irish, hardly from the Latins, but more especially from the Slavs, particularly the Poles; and that the second generation of these people are not especially submissive and obedient Catholics. We may soon see, if they are not already apparent, signs of a vanishing Catholicism as well. It is an ethnological as well as religious problem. The blond races are not maintaining their proportionate numbers in this country.

In the new statement of Unitarian belief that has been written by Dr. Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard, and sent broadcast, belief is reaffirmed in "a loving God who inspires and vivifies the universe," and God as "a despotic ruler, a judge, just or unjust, or a lord of embattled hosts"—that is, the biblical deity—is repudiated. Where Dr. Eliot gets his evidence of a "loving" God is not readily seen, but such a deity is at least harmless as compared with the Jewish-Christian monstrosity it replaces. The extent of Dr. Eliot's departure from orthodoxy is seen in the tenet: "We believe that mankind would get along better than they do now if it were positively known that the heaven of revelation had been burnt and hell quenched."

After three thousand anti-liquor postcards had been signed at a large evangelical meeting, held on a recent Sunday in East Orange, New Jersey, for the purpose of persuading the Assembly of the state to vote for the local option bill, some one raised the objection that by mailing the cards on that day the Sabbath would be broken, and the point was sustained. For this reason, as one of the newspapers reports, the cards did not reach Trenton "until the Assembly had gone through its annual formality of giving the bill a decisive defeat." It is unlikely that the person who brought up the Sabbath question was a sincere local optionist.

Sentiment in favor of separation of church and state in Panama is denoted by an act of the National Assembly reported in the Panama Star and Herald of February 22, which says: "One of the most important items debated was the sum of $10,000 United States gold which the Panama government has been giving the bishopric yearly for the upkeep of a Catholic seminary in Panama as provided for by the Constitution. Deputy Puyol introduced a motion providing for the elimination of the subvention, the motion being carried."

Michael Mockus of Detroit, whose trial for blasphemy is now pending in Connecticut, was arrested in January on a similar charge at Waukegan, Illinois, where a lecture was arranged by the local Socialists and given in the face of threats of prosecution. He was accused of "disorderly conduct," but after a stormy trial was declared not guilty by a jury. The Waukegan newspapers dated January 31 said that Mr. Mockus would be tried for blasphemy. (Later reports say he was acquitted.)

The Religious Problem in Mexico.

Properly speaking, Mexico has no religious problem. The Spanish system of patronage which was extended to the Catholic church by the Spanish kings gave an almighty temporal power to the clergy, which lasted up to 1860. In this year, owing to the War of Reform, the church was dispossessed of its property, incapacitated to acquire real estate, and deprived of temporal power.

During the long government of General Diaz, the Catholic clergy creeping on from point to point, in concealed form, recovered much of its temporal power and rebuilt part of its fortune. At present some members of the Catholic clergy have a tendency to recover the temporal power which the church had enjoyed previous to 1860. The tendency of the revolutionary government is to render effective the absolute separation of church from state, and to prevent the Mexican clergy from recovering its temporal power, leaving it, however, in the most absolute liberty as regards religious matters.—Louis Cabrera.

The law of the church has created neither the purity nor the peace of domestic life. Back of all churches is human affection. Back of all theologies is the love of the human heart. Back of all your priests and creeds is the adoration of the one woman by the one man, and of the one man by the one woman. Back of your faith is the fireside; back of your folly is the family, and back of all your holy mistakes and your sacred absurdities is the love of husband and wife, of parent and child.—R. G. Ingersoll.

OBJECTS.

It is the object of THE TRUTH SEEKER to educate the people out of religious superstition. It denies the inspiration and infallibility of the Bible, and asserts the human origin of that book. It denies the existence of the theological heaven and hell, but as to the existence and immortality of the soul neither affirms nor denies. It waits for evidence.

THE TRUTH SEEKER upholds the theory of Evolution, believing that to be the solution of the question of the origin, growth, and development of the animal kingdom, including man. THE TRUTH SEEKER believes that the answer to the questions Whence? and Whither? can be given only by Science.

THE TRUTH SEEKER holds that morality and ethics—or man's relation to man—are entirely independent of creed or religion, and are founded on rules developed by experience.

In current politics THE TRUTH SEEKER takes no side or part. In general it holds to the principles of freedom enunciated by the Founders of the Republic.

THE TRUTH SEEKER believes in Free Speech, Free Press, and Free Mails; in full discussion of all sides of all subjects, and affords those having new and worthy thoughts, clearly stated, a generous and welcome hearing, each contributor being responsible for his own opinion. We neither indorse an idea by printing it, nor condemn it by exclusion.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is the recognized medium of communication between the Liberals of the country, and is edited each week for their information, instruction, entertainment, and support against religious error and mental slavery and in maintenance of their equal civil and religious rights as citizens of the United States.

POLITICAL PRINCIPLES.

(THE NINE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.)

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in the Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privileges or advantages shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

AN AGNOSTIC.

From Chas. Henry De Lacey.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

As a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER who enjoys many of the articles appearing therein, the writer craves the opportunity of making a few comments on the greatest of all subjects. In the issue of Jan. 13, the talented editorial contributor, "L. K. W.," under the caption, "The Immortality of the Soul," says, "I am compelled to say that I do not know that I have a soul." This is an honest declaration from an honest man, from one who would, perhaps, not blush to be called an "Agnostic." But will L. K. W. assert, "I know that I have no soul"?

Along in the body of his article, the following is found: "No living person can say that the soul survives the body's death, from knowing such to be a fact." Again: "If we are to live again after we die, it must be because nature decrees it, because there is in our constitution the seeds of a future life." That appears to be sound logic. The question of survival of personality beyond the grave is, indeed, not one of religion. If there had never been a "religion," in the opinion of the writer, men and women—the psychic principle—would have lived just the same. The question of something leaving the body and living on after the funeral services is purely one of psychology and one that may be demonstrated if the proper course be taken by the honest investigator.

Of course, when asserting that "no one knows that the soul survives the body's death," L. K. W. evidently means to say (not to dogmatize as do intolerant theologians), I do not believe that anyone knows the soul survives the body's death. This is his privilege—the commendable position of the honest Agnostic—of whom Professor Huxley was father.

Sir Oliver Lodge, a world-authority in physical science, has recently electrified the thinking public by announcing that he has absolute proof that a son, slain in one of the battles of Ypres, has communicated to him through a psychic, or medium. Will his dicta in psychic science be accredited along with his discoveries in the physical laboratory? If not, why not?

The writer of these lines believes in "liberalism." He doesn't criticize the use of "nature" for "God." He believes in a First Cause, manifesting through Law, not outside of Law. He feels himself a "truth seeker." At present he believes in the immortality of the soul. He thinks he knows that personality continues beyond the gateway of death. One must carefully differentiate between what he knows and what he doesn't know. Knowledge and belief are not the same terms. He got his eyes open twenty years ago to the absurdities of "orthodoxy" through reading Dr. Draper's "Conflict Between Science and Religion," supplemented later by Dr. White's "Conflict Between Science and Theology."

Some years ago Dr. Paul Gibier, director of the Pasteur Institute in New York, published a work entitled "Psychism," in which he stated that, as a thinker and an investigator, he was certain of but three entities in the universe: (1) Matter, (2) Force, (3) Intelligence. Dr. Gibier saw

"spirit materializations over 500 times" before he made this public. True to the admonition of his illustrious preceptor, Pasteur, he was "ever to himself in investigation a vigilant skeptic." Dr. Gibier, Sir Oliver Lodge and Dr. Hyslop, of the American Society for Psychic Research (numbers of men other than these, perhaps equally eminent, can be quoted), began investigating what is commonly called "Spiritualism," with the astounding result that they were converted to "Spirit Return."

Now, is it not strange that individuals of sound logic, without an hour given to investigation along psychic lines, will complacently dismiss the whole subject by according it to the limbo of superstition, along with "faith"?

Those who deny say: "Nothing in it." I say "There is something in it." How do I know? Well, much better and from safer premises than they who deny. Twenty years ago I began investigating "Spiritualism." My first seance was in Columbus, Ohio. I felt absolutely certain that it was clever "sleight-of-hand" and wrote a satirical article anent the night's work. I felt myself "ordained" to expose the fraud underlying spiritualistic phenomena. I am no nearer the modus operandi today than I was in boyhood. I am not a Spiritualist in that I am aligned with their organization. I was present in St. Louis in '94 when Mr. Jamieson challenged the finest mediums of the National Spiritualists' Association to produce "phenomena" under absolute test conditions, and not one of them would accept the challenge, much to President Barrett's regret and chagrin. I have also read Mr. Jamieson's recent article in re Mr. Keeler's supposedly "doctored" slates. I have come into contact with the "fraud element" in Spiritualism, and yet I know I have experienced the "real thing." How do I know? Because I was there and used common sense in "testing" the phenomena and messages obtained.

I do not expect my "recital" to convert the dyed-in-the-wool materialist. May I hope that it will stimulate him to "investigate" before deciding that he knows that death ends all? Just a word of warning here. Be careful. "All is not gold that glitters." All mediums are not possessed of powers who honestly deem themselves so blessed. Auto-suggestion creates mediums, in which the "unconscious" mind performs marvelous "psychic feats." Some mediums are arrant humbugs, fakes, vampires, pretenders. Then, too, one must conform to the "laws underlying the production of psychic phenomena." Why? I can't answer. Why the dark room in producing a photograph?

Will Mr. Jamieson or any other anti-Spiritualist explain how this medium "fooled me?" An Ohio 33d degree Mason told me of her many years before I had the seance. I arranged all the details at least 400 miles from Cincinnati, where she resided, doing so under an assumed name. She was a woman of reputed wealth, of social standing, and did not have to give "sittings" for her daily bread.

On a sunny June day, 1898, my wife and I presented ourselves at her home, having just arrived from the south two hours before. She could not have known any facts connected with our history, as neither of us had ever been in her presence; no one could have "posted" her as no one knew of our plans.

The medium was just saying good-by to some callers who had been given a slate-writing. She bade us ascend the stairway to the "seance room," the first one on the right. Entering the room, entirely vacant, we found the blinds up and a flood of sunshine pouring in. A small table, covered with a thick black cloth, on which was a double four by six inch school slate, stood in the center of the room. We examined it for "pockets." None. Why the dark covering? I'm agnostic.

After ample time to inspect things most thoroughly, the medium, Mrs. P., entered, calling me by the name I had used in making the appointment. She sat opposite my wife and myself and asked me to clean the slate with water and cloth, after which she instructed me to insert between the closed slates a tiny piece of pencil not larger than a grain of wheat. Having done so, she with one hand (the right) took the slate and placed it under the table, using a slit in the side of the covering next to her. Her arm was visible about three inches above the elbow, and as she wore short sleeves, I observed that the muscles of that arm did not move. Being warm, she used a fan with the left hand. Possibly ten minutes passed. While watching very keenly (my wife and I sat opposite Mrs. P. and the room was perfectly light), she said, "I can never definitely promise any results; the 'forces' do not seem to be present. I fear you will get nothing." Just then I saw the muscles of her right arm, the one holding the slate, slightly contract. She smiled and said, "I was mistaken. W—," naming her "control," "is here."

We could hear the writing under the table, the scraping of the pencil, it's being dotted and t's crossed. Three distinct raps sounded on the slate and she handed it to me, and on opening there was a general message to us, in a very legible script. Again, I cleaned the slate. Again, she held it, in right hand, as before. Three raps; on opening the slate there was a message from my wife's grandfather, characteristic and signed by the name we had always called him. We began to get interested; up until this time I had felt like friend Jamieson that all slate writing was faked. Another message came, from another one, with whom we had both been on most intimate terms, and this message was signed by the Christian name of the individual whom it purported to be, and the signature was a facsimile of his official one, with which I had been well acquainted. These parties, claiming to be the author of the messages, had been dead from two to three years.

I now said: "Mrs. P., I have always been skeptical, hence came to you under an assumed name. Can the 'force' doing the writing give my correct name?" Her answer was, "We will try." Not to go into details, while I held the slate, I got a message from a well-known scientist who died in 1888, and he gave my full name as salutation, using the "Charles Henry" in addition to my surname. We both held slate under table; it was closed. Once she took her fingers away and the writing ceased. Instantaneously, on touching again, the writing was resumed. Now, Agnostics, Materialists, I don't know what did the writing; I do know that Mrs. P. did not do it. I was there. I have gotten many messages, under test absolute, fully demonstrating the presence of "force and intelligence." I believe this force and intelligence to be the spirits of the ones I once knew and loved. Let us investigate and refrain from dogmatism.

ACQUIRED DEVELOPMENT.

From E. S. Moser, Pennsylvania.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

In your review of Hugh Elliot's "Herbert Spencer" you say: "He [Spencer] got the facts of evolution right, but gave the wrong reason for them, i. e., the inheritance of acquired characters or qualities." Further on, you note that the Lamarckians "hold that the giraffe has a long neck because its ancestors through a long past had been obliged to stretch after food that hung high; whereas the explanation by natural selection would be that the giraffe survived because its long neck enabled it to reach herbage that grew high where none grew at or near the ground."

By what means other than by the "inheritance of acquired characters," and the transmission thereof, could the genus homo have evolved from a very much lower or primary organism? It is a very far cry from undifferentiated protoplasm to man; quite a long way back when man had not yet reached a point in progressive (evolutionary) development equal to that of the now existing lower ape forms. I find it impossible to accept any theory of evolution without recognizing the essentially inherent and environmental necessity on the part of organisms to (1) acquire additional "characters or qualities," and (2) to transmit them.

The long neck of the giraffe could have been as easily acquired by a process of stretching covering many generations as it could have been held intact in length by its high reaching.

Spencer's "Unknowable" is the weakest link in his great system of Philosophy. The term postulates the existence of something about which nothing can be known; and since nothing can be known about the "Unknowable," the "Unknowable" must be beyond cognition, beyond investigation to fruitful discussion, and beyond acceptance as a basic factor in any system of rational philosophy.

"PAGANIZED" CHRISTIANITY.

From Dwight Spencer, Oklahoma.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker.

I have just received a copy of a little book written by R. A. Dague, a writer of some prominence, in which I find the statement:

"He [Constantine] convened the council of Nicea and compelled all the warring factions to come together and unite on one book as the 'Word of God.' Of the 308 manuscripts submitted, 233 were rejected and burned, and 75 were, after much wrangling, put into one book and labeled 'Holy Bible.' The emperor put a stop to nearly all the communistic practices of the early Christians, and injected into their doctrines most of the creed and many of the forms and ceremonies of paganism. In brief, he 'paganized' the Christian movement, and it has remained pagan in all its teachings and practices until this day." (Page 13: "Is the Bible Infallible.")

Mr. Dague does not tell in his book where he got his information. We would surely like to know where it came from. But Mr. Dague is like many others who feel that they need Jesus to popularize some theory or movement.

Mr. Dague goes contrary to John E. Remsburg, Dean Dudley, Wescott, and to all the authorities I have been able to consult, when he says the Bible was made under the directions of Constantine at the Council of Nicea, A. D., 325. Also, to our mind, Mr. Dague is assuming too much when he says Constantine changed the character of Christianity by paganizing it.

Take the pagan nations of Greece and Rome when they were at their zenith, and then take Christianity when it controlled the state as well as the church: Ah, what a contrast. One the picture of health, intellectually and physically, the other a nightmare of disease of mind and body. Was it the paganism of the creed that strangled intellectual achievement and cowed industrial development in the heyday of Christian supremacy? Was it paganism that inspired the holy inquisition? Can you show anything as cruel, as revolting, as discouraging to freethought, anywhere in the annals of the pagan nations of Greece and Rome?

We fail to see wherein Constantine paganized Christianity. Christianity is not pagan in its fundamental teachings, only insofar as they are practical. "He that believeth not shall be damned" (which is one of the fundamental teachings of the creed) most assuredly did not originate in the minds of pagans. We would like Mr. Dague to cite one fundamental which is pagan.

THE CHRISTIAN'S GOD.

From Rufus B. Freeman, Mexico.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Just a few lines to let you know how the Christian's personal god respected his son's birthday in Mexico. Before the sun rose on December the 25th, the wind was blowing at the rate of seventy-five miles an hour. One could not see ten paces ahead on account of the awful thickness of the dust which had not been rained on for many months. The dust penetrated into every crack and crevice that a seventy-five mile wind could force it. It completely ruined the nice Christmas dinner that the army cooks so diligently prepared. A good many companies didn't eat any dinner on account of it being blown full of dirt. Tents and company shacks were blown completely away, so the punitive expedition had to celebrate the Christian's personal god son's birthday on December the 26th. What do you think about that? An all wise, all-loving, all-powerful, all-knowing God that had no more respect for his son's birthday or the people that were trying to celebrate his son's birthday than to let a storm destroy all the good things that were cooked up to honor his son's birthday, and blow down all the Christmas trees that were brought many miles over the desert and set up with much labor to honor his son Jesus Christ's birthday.

I often wonder why poor Christians had the gall to get down on their knees and pray to a thing they call god. Every day's experience ought to convince them that they cannot get any help from that imaginary god.

And another thing; after a storm or earthquake devastates whole cities, the surviving few Christians who were lucky enough to escape death get down on their knees and thank God that he spared their lives, as if they were any better than the poor victims that were killed. Yes, they will thank God that he spared their lives through the earthquake or storm, but if those same Christians knew that I or you caused the earthquake or storm, they would get a mob and hang us to the nearest telegraph pole or tree. Their god can do almost anything to them and it is fine business, for the Christians say whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth. So if you happen to see a man with a big club beating his wife into unconsciousness, you may know that he loves her dearly. Or if a mother should take a rolling-pin and knock her infant unconscious, and pound him around, beating him without mercy, it is the sign she loves her baby.

O Christian, will you ever see the error of your way?

MY JOURNEY OUT OF SPIRITUALISM AND INTO IT.

From J. W. Thomas, Missouri.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I wonder what kind of a world this would be if everybody believed like Mr. Jamieson and a few others who call themselves Rationalists! The Gods have said (Deut. viii, 3; Matt. iv, 4) that "man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." I take this to mean that man shall not live to eat only; that is, he shall not live for the enjoyment or achievements of this life only, but shall use these to develop his mental and spiritual attributes with reference to the higher spiritual life which continues after this physical life is ended. This is what distinguishes man from the brutes. He has (not all of them) developed his physical, mental and spiritual attributes, while the brute has developed only the physical attribute—the mental and spiritual being only rudimentary or automatic; instinctive as we say.

By the science of teaching we see that human nature is composed of three attributes, viz.: (1) Physical, (2) Mental, and (3) Moral; or more correctly, three Spiritual; because morality is merely a variable in the economy of human nature. Our physical attribute is our physical body. Our mental attribute is our mind or the function of the soul with reference to this physical life. Our spiritual attribute is our spirituality, or religion, as some call it, or the function of the soul with reference to the higher spiritual life, both in this world and the world to come. We see the physical and mental must be developed together; that is why we have calisthenics, gymnasiums and ball games at school. We see the mental and spiritual attributes develop till the physical is developed and begins to decline, and the spiritual continues to develop till death. That is the reason why young people not fully developed physically like to engage in physical exercise. That is the reason why people whose physical organism is thoroughly developed are more suited for mental exercise—such as carrying on the various business of the world or the study of the sciences. And that is the reason old people and middle aged people like to sit quietly in their lonely room and communicate with the spirits of their loved ones and find out as much as possible about the life they know they shall soon enter upon.

There are not seven ages of man, but three. Which, of course, vary according as these three attributes are normally developed. Some people develop much more rapidly than others. And I think that's the reason some people get gray sooner than others—because they develop sooner. But this is merely a guess; there may be other reasons. Now doesn't this look reasonable?

So you see, my rational friends, that religion or spirituality is really a part of our nature. I do not mean it is natural or normal for us to be Christians. Christianity is to spirituality as the husk is to the kernel, or as astrology is to astronomy, or as alchemy is to chemistry; it is merely the rudiments, the paraphernalia.

Religion or spirituality does not consist in worshipping God or anything else. Indeed, spirituality does not know anything about God, unless nature itself is God. Spirituality consists in harmonizing ourselves with nature; not in letting nature have its way, but in assisting nature, controlling nature as it were, to the end that the world may derive the most good. A spiritualized person loves nature, loves everything and everybody because he is in harmony with nature. That which is out of harmony with nature, or opposes nature, is abnormality or disease. Musicians, artists, poets and philanthropists, and in fact everybody who loves something else or somebody besides himself, has religion or spirituality. As Goethe said: "He that has science and art has religion." So you see that even a Rationalist may be religious or spiritualized; indeed, they must necessarily be, for they are reformers, working for the highest good of society. They are the vanguard of progress. Spirituality being a development, or being evolution, is necessarily progressive.

All reformers in past ages were progressive, and were infidels to the prevailing stagnated ideas and religion of their times. But when a man devotes half a century—a lifetime—trying to destroy or retard the progress or development of human nature or society, to say of such an one that he is a mossback or a reactionary, expresses it mildly. He is like a man that would try to sweep back the tides with a broom. Spiritualism is the tides, and Mr. Jamieson represents the old lady with the broom. I told you he is orthodox. He is thoroughly orthodox. His closing remark shows it. He is incapable of progress. He says: "Public offerings of spirit return to the time-worn Spiritualist, fail to satisfy him, and he goes back to the church pew, or becomes indifferent." Ask the preachers. Ask a hundred preachers from church to church how many come back to the church from Spiritualism or anything else. He'll say, "Well, I wish they would!" Mr. Jamieson is "that time-worn Spiritualist."

JESUS AND JOSEPHUS.

From Wakeman Ryno, M. D., Michigan.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

A common Christian argument against philologists who trace Bible names to their mythical source is that all personal names are derived the same as trade names, such as Baker, Cooper, Farmer, Smith, etc., but this is mere Christian sophism and far from the truth.

When we begin to study the Bible we begin to study a worship; and as all worship began or culminated in Sun, Moon, and Star worship, so all Bible names are found rooted in these heavenly bodies, having reference to anything else. If the Bible contained any historical fact, philology must demonstrate that truth. But trace Bible names back as we may, they are always found rooted in Solar, Lunar, and Stellar Worship.

The farther we go back in the history of mankind the more marked becomes man's monosyllabic language. This fact gave rise to a science now known as Philology; or the study of the Radicals; that is, the primitive or underived original words, which when analyzed are found to be essentially the same, and of the same significance in all the languages of the earth. These radicals are always monosyllables; they never require more than three letters, and may be expressed in two or only one. All combinations found with them are merely grammatical and artificial variations of sound, but not of sense; having been introduced in much later times, generally to hide or conceal the original source whence they were derived.

"This fact is strikingly illustrated in the name JESUS, of which," says Dr. Taylor, "the last syllable US is no part of the word itself, but the mere Latin termination added to the real and complete word JES or IES (the one fire—the Sun); thus Jesus Christus in good Latin. But Jesus Christ is neither good Latin, nor good English, nor good sense. For in taking away the Latin termination from Christus, to render it into the English Christ, we should also take away the Latin termination from Jesus and render it into Jes. This is one among the ten thousand proofs that betray the monkish Latin origin of our New Testament: that is, that the Latin and not the Greek was the first language in which the contents of the sacred Diagesis of Egypt was brought to the knowledge of the priests of Europe. The translation was made from the Latin into the Greek, and a Greek original pretended, not however, until it was found expedient to oppose a check to the advance of curiosity, and throw a thicker veil over the mysteries of its origin."

The attempts of the Latin priests to amalgamate the worship of Isis or the Mummy Religion with its plural Gods, and the Hebraic Cult with its single God, was such a transparent imposture, that it became necessary to have some great Jewish authority outside the Bible characters to bolster up their new fiction and make it more acceptable to the people; hence we have the Jesus interpolation in the works of Josephus, and perhaps the great Josephus himself. And no matter how many times the names of Jesus, James, or John are found in the works of Josephus, they were put there by a Roman and not by a Jew.

There is no more reliance to be placed in Josephus than any of the books of the New Testament. Like Jesus he is considered by many students as a fictitious character. His birth and death occurred in unknown years; the name of his father was not Jewish; his mother was a descendant of the Aschemdai or destroying angels; he lived in the desert and became a Pharisee (i. e., a worshiper of Isis and Nephthys, or plural Isis); he was represented as a cowardly Jewish general who deserted his army and gave himself a Roman name; by telling the fortune of Vespasian he saved his own life exactly as did Joseph of old who prophesied for Pharaoh; he is represented as the greatest Hebrew historian, and yet he never wrote one word in the Hebrew language; his works are filled with Roman interpolations. As it now appears his works, including his autobiography, were written by a Roman probably of the priestly class, who followed the rules of the New Testament writers and used Aramaic, Latin, and mongrel Greek. No better evidence is needed to prove him a Roman than the Latin termination of his name. Josephus is Joseph with the Latin US added.

"There has always been," says Massey, "a sort of identity between the names Joseph and Jesus, as shown in the Egyptian radicals Iu, Iu-Su, and Iu-Sif, that is, God, the son of God, and the coming son or he who was forever the coming one (Sun)."

The story of Jesus is a perfect counterpart of the story of Horus. Horus had two mothers, Isis the virgin who conceived him, and Nephthys who nursed him. Jesus had two mothers, Mary the virgin who conceived him, and Mary, wife of Cleophas, who brought him forth as her own. The two mothers of Horus were sisters, the two mothers of Jesus were sisters. Just as Anup was the precursor of Horus, so was John forerunner of Jesus. Just as Anup was baptizer, so was John Baptizer. Set contended with Horus in the desert, on the Ben-Ben or Pyramidion, and on Mount Hetep. Satan contended with Jesus in the Wilderness, on the Pinnacle of the Temple, and on an exceedingly high Mountain. The story of Jesus runs word for word with the story of Horus, which was written thousands of years before. The Egyptian Horus was the sun on the horizon; i. e., the morning and evening sun,—the God of hours. Jesus also represented the sun. Joseph, Mary and Jesus were new names for Osiris, Isis, and Horus. Isis was the Greek rendering of the Egyptian word Iusaas; Horus was a Latin rendering of the Egyptian word Harmachis (Har-em-ankh)—"Horus the giver of life."

To the Bible student who has never found one word of historical fact in the New Testament, such ambiguous and equivocal arguments as have lately appeared in The Truth Seeker, have about as much meaning as they have of sincerity; and if it is laughable to hear a credulous Christian claim all Bible characters as historical verities, it is truly pathetic when a so-called Rationalist testifies to his faith and confidence in these fictitious characters.

CHILDREN'S CORNER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS YOUNG AND OLD

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

Moncure Daniel Conway, March 17, 1832-
November 15, 1907.

We now present one whose writings have added lustre not only to Freethought, but to the literature of the world. Moncure Daniel Conway, whose "Life of Thomas Paine" has caused an entire change of opinion regarding Paine's character and position in the world, was born in Stafford county, Virginia, March 17, 1832. He came of old Virginia stock. He was graduated from Dickinson College in 1849, after which he studied law for a year. His parents were Methodists, an

South Place Unitarian chapel in London. He accepted, and remained in England from 1863 until 1884, when he resigned and returned to America. While in England he wrote much for the London press and occasionally made a lecture tour in the United States. When he came back in 1884 he devoted himself to literary work and an occasional lecture. He ceased to call himself a Unitarian and became a Freethinker. Among his books are "Tracts for To-Day" (1858); "The Natural History of the Devil" (1859); "Testimonies Concerning Slavery" (1864); "Idols and Ideals" (1871); "Demonology and Devil Lore" (2 vols. 1878); "Thomas Carlyle" (1881); "Emerson at Home and Abroad" (1882); "Pine and Palm" (2 vols., 1887); "Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph" (1888), and many others. In 1904 he published his "Autobiography." This is de-unusual thing in those days for an aristocratic Virginia family; and he decided to enter the Methodist ministry. He became a "circuit rider," preaching throughout northern Virginia and southern Maryland, and traveling on horseback. In his saddle bags besides his Bible and Methodist Book of Discipline, was a volume of Emerson, of whom he had become very fond, and which caused him to retire from the Methodist ministry. He entered the Harvard Divinity School, from which he was graduated as a Unitarian minister in 1854. Although his parents were slaveholders, while in Boston he became an Abolitionist. This becoming known on his return to Virginia, he was obliged to quit his home and state. From 1854 to 1856 Dr. Conway was minister of a Unitarian church in Washington, D. C. His anti-slavery views causing dissatisfaction, he was obliged to withdraw. From 1856 to 1861 he had charge of the Unitarian church in Cincinnati, Ohio, where George Hoadly, afterwards governor of the state, and Alphonso Taft, father of ex-President Taft, were among his parishoners. Here, in 1859, Dr. Conway had the courage to preach a sermon in defense of Thomas Paine against the common slanders of orthodox clergymen. It caused a sensation to have a minister of any denomination say a good word for that much-abused man. In Cincinnati he edited a radical paper called the Dial. In 1861 he wrote "The Rejected Stone," and in 1862 "The Golden Hour," both in the interests of the emancipation of the slaves. His radical views had caused a division in his congregation in Cincinnati; and during the years 1862-1863 he made a lecture tour of England in behalf of the cause of the North. While there he was invited to become the minister of the old lightful reading not only because of Dr. Conway's beautiful literary style, but also because of the experiences of his life and the distinguished men he had known during an active life of fifty years on two continents.

But greatest of all his works and greatest of all American biographies is his "Life of Thomas Paine," which, the result of over thirty years' investigation, was published in 1892. For over eighty years Paine had not only been slandered and abused and the facts of his life misstated, but it had been considered little, if any, less than a disgrace to say a word in his defense. Several small biographies in his defense had been published, one by Rickman, one by Vale and another by Remsburg. Still the falsehoods told in the biographies written by enemies were accepted in full by encyclopedias, histories, the church and the clergy. Dr. Conway began at bedrock. He searched original documents concerning Paine in England, France and America. He visited all places in those countries with which the name of Paine had been connected. It was a great labor and a labor of love. His two-volume biography, which was the result, not only refutes every slander, but proves Paine to have been one of the greatest men of his time. Now all encyclopedias and histories, even those issued by the church, treat him, if not with full, at least with a fairness that is commendable compared with what they exhibited in the past. Ministers of intelligence now consider it no disgrace to speak in praise of Thomas Paine. In fact, to repeat the old slanders is considered an evidence of ignorance. Dr. Conway died suddenly in Paris, November 15, 1907, still engaged in his historical research.

Lincoln and Cartwright.

A Lincoln story by Major J. B. Merwin of Middlefield, Conn., founder of the Journal of Education, is published in a recent number of the Century. It goes like this:

When the Whigs nominated Lincoln for Congress in 1846 in the Springfield District, the Democrats, hoping to repeat their triumph of 1832, chose Peter Cartwright, a Methodist preacher, as their nominee. One of the issues of this campaign was religious orthodoxy. Lincoln was looked upon with suspicion because he would not subscribe to creeds. The Democrats thought they could beat him by injecting the religious issue. Joshua F. Speed, Lincoln's friend, took a keen interest in Lincoln's fight and went about with him to various points in the district. Lincoln appointed a meeting for Cartwright's home town.

"Abe," said Speed, "you'd better stay away from there. That town is a Cartwright town. Cartwright's friends will take it as an affront if you go there to speak."

"I've got as many friends there as Cartwright has," replied Lincoln, "and I'm going out there to talk to them."

As soon as the Lincoln afternoon meeting was advertised, Cartwright, not to be overshadowed, advertised a religious revival meeting for the same evening. Lincoln's meeting was very largely attended. Lincoln mixed with the people in characteristic fashion, and made a winning impression with his address.

"Speed," said he to his friend, "I want to hear what Dominie Cartwright has got to say to-night. I think he'll light into me. I'm going to stay over to the meeting to-night."

"Don't do it," cautioned Speed. "The old preacher is a fighter. Your presence at his revival meeting, after what he has said about your lack of religious regularity, will make it seem as if you were looking for trouble. Stay away from the meeting."

But Lincoln was determined to attend, and go he did. He sat in a rear seat, and probably his presence cast a depression over the meeting. Cartwright spoke powerfully along evangelistic lines, warning the unregenerate of their danger. Finally he gave the invitation about as follows:

"All who desire to lead a new life, to give their hearts to God, and go to heaven, will stand."

A sprinkling of men, women and children rose. After they were seated the preacher went on:

"All who do not wish to go to hell will stand."

All the audience responded to this invitation with the exception of Lincoln. Whereupon every one expected something would happen; and it did.

"Sit down," said the preacher.

"I observe," he continued when all was again still, "that many responded to the first invitation to give their hearts to God and go to heaven. And I further observe that all of you save one indicated that you did not desire to go to hell. The sole exception," continued the preacher, his voice growing more impressive, "is Mr. Lincoln, who did not respond to either invitation. May I inquire of you, Mr. Lincoln," said Cartwright, with great earnestness and in a loud voice, "where you are going?"

The tall form of Lincoln rose to its full height, and he replied:

"I came here as a respectful listener. I did not know that I was to be singled out by Brother Cartwright. Brother Cartwright asks me directly where I am going? I desire to reply with equal directness: I am going to Congress."

The reply was so unexpected that it upset the meeting, which Cartwright, in his chagrin, soon dismissed. Lincoln had turned the tables on his adversary.

Sorry for Him.

Fiance—"And will Bobby be sorry when I marry his sister?"
Bobby—"Yes, I will, 'cause I like you."

THE FREETHOUGHT BADGE PIN

Dedicated to all honest men and women—to those who can and are willing to reason—who constitute the grand army of progressive thinkers throughout the world.

An Emblem of Freedom and Progress

Represents no lodge, order or society, but is designed as a token of recognition for progressive minds of every shade of thought.

All claiming to be free from superstition, all who base their belief upon science and reason, should wear this emblem to speed the grand work of emancipating humanity from the thralldom of mental darkness.

This is conceded by artists and the trade to be the most beautiful Badge ever designed. Being a practical jeweler and designer of emblems of every description, as well as an enthusiastic worker in the cause of human progress, Mr. Wettstein has succeeded in combining in this badge the great want of this age and the future. It represents the Burning Torch of Reason, the Rising Sun of Science and Freethought, beautifully enameled in brilliant colors in contrast with the Night and Darkness of Superstition, enameled in black, and symbolizes the evolution of the world from the Night of Superstition to the Day of Freethought, Science and Reason.

"A pin whose torch and golden sheen,
Would grace the breast of Sheba's queen;
And will lend grace in coming time
To queens of beauty more sublime."
(Impromptu by Elizur Wright.)

As a token of recognition among Liberals of every shade of thought, either at home or abroad, it is especially valuable.

Made in two styles and by best workmen in the most artistic and substantial manner.

Considering amount of gold and artistic workmanship in the badge, no other badges in the world are sold so cheap. They will last for generations to come and increase in popularity and value until fear and superstition exist no more.

LETTER BOX.

W. R., Michigan—Here is something in line with your researches that maybe you have missed, being the proof of Houston Chamberlain plus J. L. Reimer that Jesus Christ is of Teutonic origin. The demonstration runs: "The first syllable, 'Jes,' is clearly an altered 'Ger,' the letter 'r' being frequently treated as a vowel, and so dropped altogether, or changed into 's.' The second syllable, 'us,' is only the Latin ending for males, hence equal to the German (or English) 'man.'" So there you have it plain enough for anybody but a non-German to see: "Jes" means "Ger"; "us" means "man"; "Jesus," "German."

C. M. LOVETT, California.—It is not believed that the words "I then and there consecrated myself to Christ," quoted by the Rev. Mr. Harrison of Sacramento, were ever spoken by Lincoln. They appear to have been taken from the contribution of the Rev. John Barrows to the Lincoln Memorial Album and placed in the mouth of Lincoln. The Rev. Barrows, with no authority whatever for his statement, wrote: "When the clouds lifted above the carnage of Gettysburg, he gave his heart to the Lord Jesus Christ." There is no acknowledgment of Christ in the authentic writings or speeches of Lincoln.

PHILIP HALEY, San Francisco.—A copy of that book, "The Crucifixion by an Eye-Witness," was placed in our possession quite a while ago by a Texas friend, and we read it with incredulity. It looks like a piece of fiction of the same character as George Moore's "The Brook Kerith," which is purely imaginative. The letter of Publius Lentulus, the supposed predecessor of Pontius Pilate, at the beginning of the book, is a clumsy forgery, dating back to about 1600. The Death Warrant may be set down as a similar fake. It was thoroughly exposed in a book by W. H. Burr of Washington, published forty years ago by THE TRUTH SEEKER. The air of mystery and anonymity thrown about "The Crucifixion by an Eye-Witness," and the editor's quotation from these faked documents with no hint of their apocryphal character, leave the odor of humbug on the entire performance.

VAN DER WEYDE, New York.—The report you heard that we were interned with a bad attack of rheumatism was based on a long-distance diagnosis. The doctor pronounced it an aggravated case of swelled toe-joint (which he prodded cruelly and called a "bursa"), probably due to wearing a patent shield designed to protect the same against the ardent embrace of new shoes. The trouble produced much expansion, redness and pain. Yet adversity teaches its lessons of piety, for while undergoing this crucifixion we realized as never before man's complete and helpless dependence upon religion for his profanity. What will you give in its place? The doctor who came to see, prescribe and collect swapped us a good story. He told us that the other day Pat Hogan met Father Mulry on the Valley Road cars, and after he had got into a seat beside him and talked awhile, he asked: "Father, what is this here sickness they call lumbago?" The priest thought he saw a chance to lecture Pat on his habits, and said: "Lumbago? It's the devil's own disease that you get from loafing about the saloon and taking too much of the drink, and running with women of loose character. A lowdown disease altogether." "Is that so?" says Pat; "faith, then, I give praise it never troubles me." "What about it, then?" says Father Mulry. "Well," says Pat, "I was just readin' in the papers that the pope has it."

A McCABE PHOTOGRAPH.

An exceptionally fine photograph of Joseph McCabe, the famous English Free-thinker and well-known author of many rationalistic books, who is now in America on a lecture tour, has been made by Mr. van der Weyde, who is an artist of reputation and is known to TRUTH SEEKER readers for his contributions to these columns on the subject of Thomas Paine, upon which he is an authority.

The photograph he has made of Mr. McCabe is a striking portrait—a large head showing the Rationalist thinker and author in characteristic pose. Mr. McCabe, who has been photographed many times in England, Australia, and elsewhere, says of Mr. van der Weyde's portrait of him, that it is by far the best ever made and that it is the only one that is truly characteristic. He thinks many friends in America who would like to have his portrait, will be glad to know this photograph is obtainable. The photograph is artistically mounted, 10 x 15 inches, and is suitable for framing. Copies may be obtained at one dollar each by addressing Mr. van der Weyde, 12 East 15th street, New York.

TENTH EDITION. Crimes of Preachers

A RECORD OF THE CLERGY WHO HAVE COMMITTED CRIMES AND IMMORALITIES.

As was said of previous editions, the record is startlingly instructive and will open the eyes of the people, proving as it does that in thousands of cases the Bible and the Christian religion have totally failed to keep even their exponents from committing acts of grossest immorality and deeds of darkest crime.

Moral Teachings for Real Persons.

Teachers, preachers, and the rest of us, says Current Opinion, appreciate the difficulty of framing a "cant"less code of personal and social ethics. Prof. Franklin H. Giddings of Columbia University addresses a code to "real persons" which seems hard to beat. By "real persons" he means "men and women who have outgrown monkey-mindedness and savagery, who are not dead beats from choice nor professional dealers in 'bunk,' and who cultivate intelligence instead of bigotry." His "simple" code professes only to select and emphasize substantial things that people can teach themselves and their children. It is published in School and Society.

"First among the real duties of real persons," writes Professor Giddings, "I place intellectual honesty. It is one of the corner-stones of character. Don't try to fool yourself. Face facts fearlessly. Try to get at the truth. Demand the evidence. Don't pretend to believe things that you don't believe. You are under no obligation to believe anything until you really do believe it; then believe it with all your mind and all your heart. The product of your thinking should be positive, effective ideas. And tell the truth. When you get into a scrape don't sneak and crawl. Face the music."

A second corner-stone of character is honest living, which to Professor Giddings means a good deal more than paying your debts and keeping "within the law."

"Honest living means putting back into the world as much as you take out of it. You don't live honestly if, being able-bodied, in good health, and of sound mind, you let somebody else pay your way. You don't live honestly if, when you become a business man, you get something for nothing: from the legislature or the city, or from your customers, or from your wage-earners. Put back in some way, in some service, or improvement, or benefaction, above all in a fair price and a just wage, as much as you take out of the resources of the earth, out of the revenues and common possessions of the community, and out of the toil of men. If you don't you are a thief, even if you seem to be respectable, and people are fooled into believing that you are."

Right feeling is the third corner-stone of character in this code:

"Be gentle, be just, be kind. But don't imagine that you ought to crush all anger and hatred out of your heart. Anger and hatred must be controlled, not destroyed. They are indispensable energies, motive powers, like steam or gasoline in an engine. Keep them in hand, as an engineer keeps under control the terrific energies that he directs, and make them work for good ends. Be angry at injustice. Hate cruelty and humbug and muddle, uncleanness and unsanitariness, indecency and ugliness."

Sound personal habits are the fourth corner-stone of character prescribed by Professor Giddings's code. The call to "fair play" between the sexes has the effect of a climax in this exhortation.

"Be careful to perform the little duties of life. Don't make others pick up or clean up after you. Clear away your own litter. If you wash in a public wash-room don't leave the dirty water for the next fellow to be annoyed by and get rid of. Don't grouch, don't crowd, take your turn. Be industrious. Be efficient. Whether you work or play make every stroke count. Make every word count. If you want to be taken seriously don't get into the habit of repeating, emphasizing, exaggerating, 'rubbing it in.' Remember that it is not only foolish to be silly, or ridiculous, or loose-minded, or a 'freak'; it is wrong. It wears away your self-respect, and the respect of others for you. Be fair. Above all, if you are boy or man don't take unfair advantage of girl or woman; if you are girl or woman don't take unfair advantage of boy or man. Girls and women who, from motives of vanity, encourage attentions that they do not expect to reward with affection, are fully as wicked as boys and men who give way to fierce impulses."

Upon such foundations of character the ethical code of Professor Giddings demands that pillars of citizenship be reared: Cooperation, legality, respect for intellect, conservation of beauty. The code for co-operation reads:

"Learn to work with your fellows. It is not enough that you should tolerate them and avoid wronging them. It is not enough that you should mind your own business and be self-supporting. Civilization has been created and is carried on by team-work. Get into the game. Take your part in the great collective struggle to make life more worth while for everybody. Study to combine your efforts with the efforts of others in this great enterprise, tactfully, intelligently and effectively."

By legality Professor Giddings means living lawfully and respecting law even to the point of straining conscience and wounding self-respect; "because there is always a presumption that law is an expression of human experience wider than your own personal experience, of collective judgments less biased than your own personal judgment, and of sentiments of justice better averaged and mellowed than your personal sentiments." But if, as may be, the law is absurd or wicked, brave, open, conscientious, regretful defiance should on no account give way to "the vain-minded daredevilry of the habit-revolutionist." Detest violence and help to suppress it. "Violence is the culmination of planlessness, muddle, and beating the air. Legality is order, economy of effort, smooth running on ball bearings. Given over to violence society is an engine running 'wild'; law-abiding, it is an engine working under control."

Regarding respect for intellect the Giddings code says in part:

"Universal admiration of intellect and respect for it are the secret of the supreme civilization of France. It is intellect that masters the secret of nature. It is intellect that substitutes the tireless work of physical energies for the wearying toil of human muscles. It is intellect that adds the touch of interest, originality, distinction, or beauty to the common products of man's labor. It is intellect that adjusts human relations, as they become more complicated in growing and 'speeding up' populations, fashioning our friction-saving social conventions, formulating the principles and rules of law, perfecting social organization, whether industrial or political, and, in a degree, bringing even international relations under the rule of reason. Only the nation that immensely admires and profoundly respects intellect will be able to hold its own in the coming years. Get knowledge."

Emphasis on the conservation of beauty as a fourth pillar of citizenship strikes an unusual high note of appeal in this code.

"Now, there could be no more pernicious error than the notion, which stupid bigots have inculcated, that beauty has no other function than to afford sensuous gratification to 'pleasure-loving' sinners. Sensuous gratification is the least of the reactions of beauty. The human nervous system does not behave properly and do its work easily unless it is generously fed on beauty. Why? Because beauty is order, proportion, grace, harmony, color, adaptation, adjustment, correlation, coordination; and the opposite things, namely, disorder, confusion, misfitting, awkwardness, jarring, and irrelevance, are to nerves what bad construction, loose adjustments and friction are to mechanism. Beauty in abundance is necessary to health, sanity, accuracy of discrimination, good judgment, serenity of spirit and self-control."

One of the great social tasks, from now on, concludes Professor Giddings, "is to conserve the remaining beauty of the natural world, and to put beauty, in place of confusion and ugliness, into the artificial world. Therefore, do more than enjoy beauty. Recognize the obligation to appreciate it intelligently and to increase it."

THOUGHTS ON LABOR.

The last tilt between friend Martin and myself ended by my assurance that were I, by "divine providence" or otherwise, to become editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER I might be tempted to put some of his contributions in the funny column. His reply to my comments upon the "eight-hour law" is a case in point. Among other things he says my remarks contain a mixture of facts and falsehoods. A falsehood is a lie. We are supposed to be Freethinkers, and tolerance is our watchword, but it is curious how loose some of us get with the word falsehood.

In the nature of things it is not expected that Mr. Martin is going to see anything from the radical angle so far as politics and economics are concerned, but as a Freethinker I humbly ask him not to call those who sincerely disagree with "stand pat" ideas, liars, unless he has the goods. Mr. Martin goes back 400 years for a comparison with modern conditions and produces exactly the same result which my few years of observation has shown me to be correct, i. e., that the relative position between labor and capital does not change. In the end labor is forced to be content with just enough to exist upon, while the rest is the portion of capital.

The funny part of his remarks is to the effect that the farmer, getting to have so much loose change lying around, will not exert himself to produce more commodities. I have always thought that it was a characteristic of human kind to want more money, no matter how much he already may be possessed of.

It is true that thousands of young folks have left the farm for other employment, but it has not been because of the fact that money comes too easy on the farm. On the other hand, it is because the farmer grows tired of working for the profit of the railroad and the rest of the "middle men," whose charges are arbitrary and all out of proportion to the value of their services.

My remarks were intended to contradict the statements of others that the railroad men had used coercion upon the government and the public. They were as surprised as anybody else to find the lawmakers of this nation doing anything for their class, although it is not uncommon for the lawmakers to pass laws for the capitalist class. Had not Professor Ripley made the statement that the railroads had increased their dividends from $96,000 to $15,000,000 in the space of twelve months there might be some excuse for refusing to raise the men's pay; but since the making of that $15,000,000 necessitated the sacrifice of solid hours in unrequited toil by the men, there is no reason why the men should not demand a slice of the "melon."

Were it not for the fact that the railroads are, in the nature of things, a public utility and not merely a private business enterprise, Mr. Martin's objection to governmental monkeying with wages would hold, but the time is surely and quickly coming when the railroads shall pass from the realm of private ownership and simply because their owners believe in the old Vanderbilt philosophy: "The public be damned." Only a few years back the express companies were demanding higher rates. The government went into the express business in a way by establishing the parcel post, and right away the express charges came down, and there was no more pleas of poverty from their boards of directors.

It is common to hear of corporations that are on the road to the poorhouse when they want to make a "touch" somewhere, but if you look in the financial papers you read there how these same poverty-stricken corporations are as solid as a rock. Last year they paid dividends of 30 per cent, and this year is going to be a humdinger for "melon" crops. My personal opinion of the eight-hour law is that if it was a piece of coercion by the government upon the railroads, it was merely offsetting in a peaceful and bloodless way the coercion of the government upon labor in the past by use of the "military arm," an arm which the corporations used to lean upon lovingly, even in far off Mexico. I have not heard that the Republicans who voted for the law were coerced by the Democrats, but judging from the speed with which the law was passed it met with favor by the Congress. Anyhow it was passed as an emergency measure to be in force until a commission could determine whether the men or the corporations were liars. If all wage laws and laws for changing of rates were passed on that basis, I don't think it would be a bad idea to set such a precedent.

Mr. Martin talks about the beauties of competition. He does not realize that the idea of competition is passing, and that monopoly or co-operation must take its place. That's why I am a disciple of discontent. I know that monopoly means master and slave. Therefore, I am for co-operation, and whenever the employers make a melon ready to cut I want the workers, who stuffed the melon with lusciousness, to be on hand for a share.

Mr. Martin's remarks about "short hours" meaning inefficiency, are funny, really funny. Any wise man knows that long hours really result in inefficiency. Mr. Ford demonstrates every day in the week that eight hours with good wages to whet the appetite for work spells profit for Mr. Ford. Personally, I could demonstrate to Mr. Martin that in six hours I can produce more and better work in my line than I can in eight hours or ten hours.

I once demonstrated to a proprietor of a steam laundry that I could save him money by merely offering the thirty girls employed a chance to go home one hour earlier. By so announcing to the girls I had the plant closed down every day at 4.30 instead of at 5.30, and the girls were happy and the next day eager for work. The deliveries were more prompt, and the wagons all in the barns and the horses resting one or two hours earlier each night.

The scheme worked until the fossilized brain of the proprietor concluded that he ought to "dock" the girls for that blessed hour each day, and they were soon back at the old pace dragging out the necessary number of hours which they were being "paid" for.

GEORGE H. LONG.

A BRITISH SOLDIER'S VIEW.

Although not a little ignorance has been displayed by various writers in THE TRUTH SEEKER on the subject of the war, I have not until the issue of Dec. 23 seen anything very absurd in the official paragraphs. However, in that issue in "Notes at Large," the writer unburdens himself of some surprising misconceptions.

In the first place he is under the delusion that we—millions of us volunteers—are forced into war by the ambition of King George. I need say no more than that the king is the kaiser's cousin—to say nothing of Tino's. If our royal family had anything to do with the war it would be that his German relations thought that he would or could keep England out of it.

What the man in the trenches, the English no less than the French, think, is that it would be a dastardly thing to draw back from a struggle for which so many of our best and dearest have given up their lives, just when the victory they died for seems to be assured.

The damn financial considerations which are harped on we are quite conscious of, but they are not going to affect our resolve to stamp out international brigandage once and for all. The way the financial aspect seems to cloud the writer's whole horizon deducts considerably from the value of the beautiful moral sentiments wafted across the Atlantic.

"Should the war end today with France and Belgium evacuated by the Teutons, one nation," you say, "would be as badly off as another." Heavens above us! Has any American ever visited Ypres, Comblès, Verdun? And how about mercantile marine?

"The war holds out no promises to the men who do the fighting"! It holds out promise of what each is willing to give his life for, and that is the victory of international truth and fair dealing over turpitude and brute force raised into a system.

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxies of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

Mrs. Willis—"You must be mistaken. I was talking with Mrs. Highflier only yesterday."

Willis—"Well, I was talking with the mortgagee only this morning."—Puck.

His Plan.—An Irishman who was rather too fond of strong drink was asked by the parish priest:

"My son, how do you expect to get into Heaven?"

The Irishman replied:

"Shure, and that's aisy! When I get to the gates of Heaven I'll open the door and shut the door, and open the door and shut the door, an' keep on doing that till St. Peter gets impatient and says, 'For goodness' sake, Mike, either come in or stay out!'"—Tit-Bits.

He Was Not a Joshua.—Little sister and brother had quarreled. After supper, says Harper's, mother tried to establish friendly relations again, and quoted to them the Bible injunction: "Let not the sun go down upon your wrath."

Turning to Edward, the older, she said, "Now, Edward, are you going to let the sun go down upon your wrath?"

Edward squirmed a little as he looked up into her pleading face.

"Well, how can I stop it?" he asked.

Not Her Job.—He was a young subaltern. One evening the Sister had just finished making him comfortable for the night, and before going off duty asked: "Is there anything I can do for you before I leave?"

Dear little Two Stars replied: "Well, yes; I should like very much to be kissed good-night."

Sister rustled to the door. "Just wait till I call the orderly," she said. "He does all the rough work here."—London Opinion.

Placing the Blame.—A tired business man in New York, coming home after a particularly enervating day, had occasion—or thought he had—to speak sharp words of reproach to his eight-year-old son. He wound up by sending the youngster to bed without any supper.

That night, stealing into the kiddy's room to see whether he had fallen asleep, his mother found him wide awake and very scornful of her advances.

"Why, Jackie," she said, "you shouldn't be surly toward me just because your father scolded you. I'm not to blame."

"Yes, you are too!" stated Jackie. "You married the big stiff, and now I've got to stand for him!"

One on His Honor.—A police magistrate in Cleveland was disposing of cases at the rate of about two a minute, with great exactness and dignity, being judge, jury, and attorney, all in one.

"Then you are sure you recognize this linen coat as the one stolen from you?" he said to a complainant.

"Yes, your Honor."

"How do you know it is yours?"

"You can see that it is of a peculiar make, your Honor," replied the witness.

"That is the way I know it."

"Are you aware, sir," shouted the justice, turning to a closet back of him and producing a similar coat, "that there are others like it?"

"Indeed I am," replied the witness, still more placidly. "I had two stolen."—Case and Comment.

Greek Meets Greek.—A tight-fisted old man, says the Washington Post, who was feeling very ill, asked a friend to recommend a physician. The friend named a certain specialist noted no less for his professional skill than for his wit.

"Is he very expensive?" asked the sick man.

"Well, not so very," was the answer. "He'll charge you four dollars for the first visit and two for each one after that."

The old fellow soon afterward walked into the office of the physician named by his friend, and, upon being admitted to the consulting room, laid down two dollars, remarking, "Well, doctor, here I am again."

The physician calmly picked up the money and put it into a drawer, which he locked securely. The sick man looked on, expectantly awaiting the next move.

"Well, I'm ready to be examined," he said at length.

"I don't think it's necessary," replied the shrewd specialist. "There's no need to do it again. Keep right on taking the same medicine. Good day, sir."

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

THE CHRISTIAN HELL

From the First to the Twentieth Century

By

HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work. Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

JUST OUT ETERNITY

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

All the twenty or more ushers of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian church, New York city, have discontinued their services, following a series of misunderstandings between their organization—the Ushers' Association—and the session of the church. Quarrels in Christian churches are very common nowadays. Moral, keep away.

That loyalty to the United States henceforth is to be a primary requisite for membership in the Columbia University (New York city) faculty is indicated by one of the most drastic resolutions the Board of Trustees of the institution ever has passed. The resolution was made public after the monthly meeting of the trustees March 5.

While the Rev. Dr. Robert M. Moore, pastor of St. Mark's Methodist Episcopal church, at Ocean avenue and Beverley road, Flatbush, L. I., was holding a prayer meeting in the church on Wednesday night, March 7, thieves entered his home, at No. 1,695 Albermarle road, and looted the place from cellar to attic. The thief, like the Lord, is no respecter of persons.

The bills to legalize the dissemination of birth control information in New York state were killed March 6. Fred M. Ahern of Brooklyn, Chairman of the Assembly Codes Committee, announced that the Greenberg-Shiplacoff measures would not be reported by his committee. Mr. Ahern said that the state was not prepared to accept such doctrine, and persons who supported such legislation "were much misguided."

A hard blow was struck at the activities of German secret agents in this country March 6, when the police, acting in conjunction with federal authorities, gathered in two physicians, one a German, the other a Hindu, and with them a large quantity of documents and papers which prove conclusively that agents of the German government have been using the United States as a base of operations in an extensive conspiracy to stir up revolutions in India and other British colonial possessions.

THE WAR.

General von Bissing, Governor General of Belgium, has signed a decree ordering the seizure throughout Belgium of certain articles for removal to Germany when the quantities held by any owner exceed certain specified numbers or weights.

Russian troops which recently captured the Persian town of Hamadan from the Turks have now gained possession of Asadabad Summit, ten miles southwest of Hamadan.

The French troops delivered a powerful attack in the Champagne March 7 and wrested from the Germans the greater part of the salient between the Butte de Mesnil and the Maisons de Champagne lost in the violent fighting of February 15.

The Russian Foreign Office has transmitted to the governments of Germany, Austria, Bulgaria and Turkey a lengthy protest against alleged violations of usages of warfare, citing numerous instances and asserting the right to retaliate in kind.

Two violent attacks made by the Austrians March 6 at the head of the St. Pelligrino Valley were repulsed by the Italians. One cannon was taken by the Italians. An Austrian attack near Ver-toiba was repulsed.

The torpedo boat destroyer Cassini, of the Mediterranean patrol service, was torpedoed by a submarine on February 28. The vessel sank in two minutes, the powder magazine having exploded, and the captain, six other officers and one hundred of the crew perished.

More than 30,000 English women have volunteered to form an auxiliary army corps for service in France.

The Austrian Minister of War has called into service the class of 1920—that is, youths born in 1899 and 1900. The recruits, it is stated, must present themselves on March 10 for immediate service.

Bagdad, chief Turkish city of Mesopotamia, and once capital of the empire of the Caliphs, was surrendered by the Turks March 10.

Bagdad has tenfold the importance to the world to-day that has Verdun. Germany has lost both.

The Belief In God and Immortality

A STATISTICAL STUDY

By JAMES H. LEUBA
Professor of Psychology and Pedagogy in Bryn Mawr College.

The work is the result of an inquiry among men of science — biologists, sociologists, historians, psychologists — as to whether they believe or want to believe in a prayer-answering God and in continuance of life after death. The answer is altogether different from what might be expected in view of the frequent affirmations of the supernaturalists that belief in Christianity, or at least its fundamental dogmas, is held by the majority of the men of science.

It puts into the hands of Freethinkers exactly the information they want on that subject, with the facts and figures verifying it.

As a logical conclusion, founded upon the general aspect of the case, we have held that science leads its votaries to a rejection of such undemonstrable propositions as the existence of gods and the survival of the "soul" when the body is dead. Here we have the evidence, in statistical form, which confirms our view.

To the inquiry into the attitude of the scientists there are added statistics regarding the thought of college students regarding the same religious dogmas.

The author is himself a man of science, an authority in his special branch, which is Psychology, and he knows and sets forth the origin and history of the beliefs with which he deals.

No recent book has attracted more attention from the press, or presented such a serious problem to the supernaturalists.

THE MISSIONARY SPIRIT.

The Freethinker Has It, and It Justifies Him in Disseminating His Views.

BY ATWOOD MANVILLE.

THE missionary spirit impels men and women to convey to others the great truths which have so inspired their minds and hearts that it is impossible for them to remain silent. The audience chosen is naturally hostile, and the usual intense opposition to new ideas makes the work of a missionary an arduous struggle, in the pursuit of which the greatest self-sacrifice must be displayed. Twenty-five thousand Christian missionaries are working in foreign lands to spread their gospel, and during the year 1916, $19,294,000 was expended upon their work in twenty-two countries.

Confidence in the desirability of missionary work is not universal even among Christians. Some say that it is not right to interfere in matters of religion; that the religion known to the heathen (and almost all have some religion) is better for him than Christianity, and that we should not force doctrines upon others nor disturb their faith; but the usual opinion among Christians is that they are compelled to spread the truth. The Freethinker feels the same way. Granting that both are thoroughly sincere, are they not equally justified in disseminating their views, apart from all consideration of expediency, or of results obtained, or of authority, for the one reason alone, if for no other, that they honestly believe that they are doing right? It may be fairly argued that such conviction of justification was the cause of the Inquisition, the persecution of the Albigenses, the massacres, the burning of witches and other atrocities that make the history of the church so unpleasant to contemplate. The answer is that no church now explicitly approves of proselyting by force. The rack and thumbscrew are dim in our memory; the burning of Servetus for a slight difference of opinion does not commend Calvin to us; nor do we think that Philip II was justified in forcing his faith upon the Netherlands. In our comparatively enlightened times, the appeal is made by reason, and each individual is left free to decide whether or not he shall embrace the new ideas presented.

The decision of most fair-minded people will be that the modern missionary spirit is justified, and that if the Christian is warranted in an endeavor to convert the Asiatics, then the Mohammedans, the Buddhists and the Confucianists are warranted in trying to convert Christendom, distasteful as such a reciprocal movement for our salvation would be. If it is right for the Christian to destroy the faith of the heathen, it is right for the heathen, or the Freethinker, to destroy the faith of the Christian. "But," says the Christian, "you overlook the great difference between our position and all others. Our religion is true; all others are superstition, and the Freethinker ignores the spiritual side of life." The right to disturb another's views on politics, or concerning economic and social reforms, provided there is no inciting to crime, is generally acknowledged, but not so readily concerning religion, where indifference to its particular form, or failure to apply its doctrines, is condoned, but an open expression of doubt regarding the tenets of his particular denomination is not approved.

In a "History of Freedom of Thought," the very first book to be read by those interested in this inquiry, the Hon. J. B. Bury says that to advance knowledge and correct errors, unrestricted freedom of discussion is required, and that there is "no subject in heaven or earth which ought not to be investigated without deference or reference to theological assumptions." The lack of that deference seems to arouse an absurd hostility whenever the expression FREETHOUGHT is used, but freedom of thought does not require the acceptance of any ideas; it merely requests a fair hearing for such subjects as the following:

1. Truth in religion, as in all else, is essential.
2. The Bible is, or is not, the inspired Word of God.
3. Doctrines of the churches are either true, or false, or partly true and partly false.
4. Hypocrisy is injurious to character.
5. Superstition is a hindrance to civilization.
6. Christianity may, or may not, produce more happiness and morality than any other form of religion, or than Rationalism.
7. Are Christ's teachings the best for modern times?

Long books have been, or could be, written on each of these subjects, and the attempt here is merely to outline in the briefest possible way some arguments conducive to a fair hearing for the maligned Freethinker. Those who will like them do not need them, and those who need them will not like them.

1. Truth concerning spiritual matters is even more difficult to establish than the truth about physical facts. The greatest philosophers, the most devout Christians are as ignorant as children concerning many realities even in the material universe, and few there be who claim to know more than a moiety of the will of God and conditions of a future life. They have their theories and they may be right, but nobody knows. Concerning most of the divine scheme we are all Agnostic. All have an equal right to state their views and produce their evidence, whether in the form of the authority accepted for ages, or of revelation, or of human experience. There is always the possibility that the advocate of the unpopular theory, the apparently untenable doctrine, may be right about spiritual truths, so all reasonable, or unreasonable, propositions should be given consideration. On the other hand, when we are convinced that a theory promulgated by man is untrue, to the best of our knowledge, after investigation, we should renounce it. We feel assured that the Greek gods were myths, although many of the best thinkers of ancient days believed in them. We do not believe that Buddhism is the true religion, although millions of people are sincere in their worship of Buddha. Mohammed, Confucius, Zoroaster have many followers, and if we had been born in certain lands, we should have been among them, and should have considered Jesus less divine than some other man. Christian theologians may be the only ones who have divined the divine plan, but that is surely open to question. Perhaps the authors of "Androcles and the Lion" and "The Brook Kerith" are right. The Book of Mormon states: "And we know that it is by the grace of God, the Father and our Lord Jesus Christ, that we beheld and bear record that these things are true." But some of us are skeptical about Maroni and Nephi.

As no one living has had an independent revelation of Christianity in its accepted form, its truth must depend on the credibility of history and the narration of human experience during the time that men have recorded events. Refusal to investigate these records in an unbiased manner indicates merely a fear of being irreverent, or possibly an indistinct distrust in one's faith. To obtain the facts, let the Christian read "The Bible" and "The Christ" by John E. Remsburg; "God and My Neighbor" by Robert Blatchford; Paine's "Age of Reason" and "Bible Myths" by Doane, and let the Freethinker read "The New Theology and the Old Religion" by Bishop Gore; "The Bible in the Making" by the Rev. J. Patterson Smythe; "The Origin and Aims of the Four Gospels" by Rev. J. M. Wilson; "A Key to the Knowledge and Use of the Holy Bible" by John Henry Blunt, D.D., and many others by exponents of various creeds.

The Christian often refuses to read both sides on the plea that "we penetrate farther into the secret of things by the heart than by the reason," and is willing to repudiate arguments and facts as inferior in spiritual truth to Faith. This may be a tenable position concerning spiritual facts only, but faith in occurrences upon this earth is dependent upon the truth of those occurrences, and the establishment of those facts is a proper motive for reason.

Faith in what is not true is credulity, and as the truth of many firm faiths has already been confuted, there is fair ground for present skepticism. Even when facts have been ascertained, it is quite possible to draw different conclusions, but they are not apt to be so divergent as when the actualities have been neglected. Cardinal Newman wrote: "I firmly believe that before now, saints have raised the dead to life, crossed the seas without vessels . . . and stopped the operation of the laws of nature in a multitude of ways." The Agnostic is not satisfied with this and similar evidence, and it must be clear that in the willingness to seek "whatsoever things are true" along the lines of logic, the Freethinker has the better position.

2. The Bible is said to be the Word of God, but it is difficult to understand why the creator of all men should have revealed himself in only one book delivered, so far, to less than half his children. However, if that book were perfect, there might be some extenuation for such egotism. The orthodox affirm that the men who wrote the Bible were so guided by God as to keep them from error; and the unorthodox believe that, admitting the errors, it is a history of man's communion with God and struggle for righteousness. What proof is there that Moses was more to be believed than Homer? Is it because he worshiped only one God? "And the Lord God said: Behold the man is become as one of us (Gen. iii, 22). Among the Gods there is none like unto thee, O Lord." Other verses also indicate that Jehovah believed that there were other gods: "I am the Lord your God; fear not the gods of the Amorites." "Thou shalt not revile the gods," etc.

Critics have shown that the 66 books of the Bible were selected by vote from about 250 Jewish and Christian writings and are chiefly anonymous; that there are thousands of inaccuracies, incredible contradictions and misstatements, and that it is not all a good moral guide. This viewpoint is shocking to some, no doubt, although proof has existed for over a hundred years; but careful reading of the Bible, with Mr. Remsburg's books, will convince many that the reverence we have been told to feel for the "holy" book has warped our judgment. Man created God in his own image and depicted Jehovah as a being with the main failings of men who lived in 1450 B. C., whereas if God had been revealing himself to man, he would have represented himself as a perfect being. Jehovah's character is that of a vindictive God who did not disapprove of lying, cheating, murder, adultery, polygamy, slavery, cannibalism, obscenity, etc. This seems like a blasphemous statement and certainly should not be made if untrue, but each person can read for himself. Leviticus xxvii, 28, 29, and Deut. xiv, 21, are among the hundreds of verses that bear out the assertion that the Bible God is not a loving Heavenly Father to all men.

No fault should be found with accounts of immoralities unless they are represented as meeting the approval of God, but, after reading the books of Moses, can we not, in 1917, imagine a more moral God?

Is the Bible God unchangeable? Even in those times he was fickle and often repented of his actions. Should not a believer in a true God repent of allegiance to a God with the character ascribed to "The Lord" in the scriptures?

The authors of the Old Testament had the presumption to claim that they knew God in his person, and their writings have been accepted as God's message to man instead of man's idea of God. With ample proof to the contrary in those writings themselves, is it not strange that such belief should continue?

With so little intelligence is the Bible read that many have not noticed that the first and second chapters of Genesis contain contradictory accounts of the creation. Most critics now admit that the Old Testament is not literally true, but still cling to the prophecies that have been discredited, and refer to God's communion with men as if it had really occurred in ancient times more directly than now. The Bible language is so different from any other that there is a strong appeal from the very beauty of it, which may be largely due to those who translated it into English.

The greatest shock to the believer is to find admissions on the part of authorities of his own church that the Four Gospels were not written by four of Christ's apostles shortly after his death, but by men whose identity is uncertain and who wrote in 63 A. D. to 90 A. D., or even 150 A. D. The Encyclopedia Britannica says: "It is certain that the synoptic gospels took their present form only by degrees." The Rev. J. Patterson Smythe, who affirms that "God made the Old Testament" and that both Old and New Testaments are inspired, admits that thirty years after the ascension, not one of the gospels had been written; that Paul was dead, and that the last part of Mark's gospel cracked off and caused confusion.

As Paul's epistles were written before the gospels, and as his testimony of Christ is based on visions ("I knew a man in Christ above fourteen years ago, whether in the body, I cannot tell" (1 Cor. xii, 2) is it not possible that the authors of the gospels used Paul's doctrines in forming Jesus' character and sayings? Can anyone write an accurate account 30 to 100 years after the event, when there are no written documents to consult?

The Rev. J. M. Wilson, D.D., says that "the gospel according to St. Mark is then the parent of the other three that we know," and was written 63 to 70 A. D. So, instead of four separate accounts, one man furnished most of the data for the life of Christ, according to this clergyman.

In the "Twentieth Century New Testament" Mark's gospel appears before Matthew's and the last portion is referred to as having been interpolated. Almost everyone agrees that the epistle to the Hebrews is anonymous, but positively not by Paul. In describing Christ's life, why does no one quote Josephus or Tacitus, both of whose writings have been made to mention Christ, or why did forty other contemporaneous historians omit any reference to him? Professor Husband of Dartmouth, referring to part of John's account of Jesus' trial, in his book just published, says: "The whole passage must be rejected as spurious." Many others admit that the synoptic gospels and John's can not both be historically correct. Great scholars are now two to one against the claim that the apostle John wrote the fourth gospel as we have it.

Few people have ever noticed the difference in the genealogies of Jesus in the first chapter of Matthew and the third chapter of Luke. Both cannot be true, but both name Joseph as his father in the descent from David. Yet the authors of these two gospels are the only gospel authorities for his virgin birth. Some claim that Luke's genealogy is Mary's family line, and that women's names are not used in Hebrew genealogy, so that Joseph's is substituted and Mary thus imparts to him her royal claims. The discrepancies even about such important events as the time and place of Jesus' birth, ministry, crucifixion, resurrection and ascension are too numerous to mention here, but have escaped the average Christian and are not often referred to by the clergy. The unorthodox admit that these historical accounts err as all other histories do, but if the Scriptures are not sufficiently inspired to avoid errors, how can they maintain authority for belief in supernatural events?

Are any three consecutive chapters of the Pentateuch true or morally uplifting? Certain passages like Genesis 38, if printed separately, would not be permitted in the United States mail.

The Christian discredits the Vedas, Zend Avesta and Koran, and the Freethinker discredits the Bible. The Golden Rule requires equal consideration for others, and if Christian ministers advise searching the scriptures, they should not object to the publication of what is found there. Instead of singing "My soul, be on thy guard," they should demand and meet the proofs offered, which have convinced many of the world's best thinkers. If the Bible is God's word, arguments of man will not destroy it, and if it is not God's word, then Christian and Freethinker should unite in informing the public that it is merely interesting early literature, intensely "spiritual" in parts, but without authority to maintain as true the passages that are immoral and false. The New York Bible Society distributed 320,715 Bibles during the past year, and no warning was given that children should not take it literally.

If the inspiration of the Bible is disproved by the preponderance of evidence, is it not possible that those who wrote of Christ's life, so many years after his death, may have only recorded the traits and acts that, in their opinion, were compatible with a divine nature?

3. Doctrine is "whatever is laid down as true by an instructor or master." Based largely on the Bible, doctrines have been formulated by the churches that are almost incredible and often immoral. Creeds have been formed proclaiming belief in facts so inconsistent with the laws of nature as to warrant skepticism, and so unpleasant as to inspire hope that they may not be true. Babies have been damned unless baptized; millions have been forever lost because they did not believe what the church said was true; and many supernatural horrors have been taught about a personal devil and place of eternal torment. What would the inhabitant of a superior planet think of the doctrine of vicarious atonement, or of the geographical heaven, and its chosen few?

Whether these doctrines be true or false, the Christian has a perfect right to teach them, if he believes them, but if it is the Christian's duty to tell the Buddhist that Buddha was not divine, is it not the duty of the Buddhist, or the Unitarian, or the Agnostic, to show that the virgin birth of Jesus, or the immaculate conception of his mother, is also very doubtful? If the Christian is justified in teaching the heathen that the true God is the Jehovah of the Old Testament, was not Thomas Jefferson justified in referring to the passages that represent Jehovah as "a being of terrific character—cruel, vindictive, capricious and unjust"?

If Billy Sunday, whose revival is approved by such conservative bodies as the First Presbyterian church of New York, is justified in saying: "When the consensus of scholarship says one thing and the Word of God another, the consensus of scholarship can go plumb to hell for all I care," is not the Rationalist justified in showing that the animals could not all have reached the ark nor have been contained therein? If the Christian is justified in telling the heathen that God created the earth and all creatures thereon, but soon found that, in some mysterious way, there was another strong force, Satan, who caused men to sin, and that, to expiate for man's sin, God sent his son upon earth, to be a willing sacrifice, that man might be saved from the wrath of his heavenly father; is not the Deist justified in stating that he has a higher idea of God than the anthropomorphic being in a geographical heaven who permits the voluntary sacrifice of the innocent to atone for the sins of the guilty?

If the most prominent Christian sects, among those now maintaining their true creeds, teach as facts the Trinity, transubstantiation, immortality of the body, eternal punishment and infallibility of the pope, is not the Rationalist justified in asking for good authority on which to believe these dogmas? Should anyone object to criticism of false doctrines? Is not the Freethinker's position as regards this third point at least equal to the Christian's, as it was in the first two? He is willing to accept the good teachings of Jesus and of all other men, but not the teachings of anyone unless convinced of their morality.

4. Hypocrisy—the dissimulating of one's real belief—cannot be commended by an honest man. Does the Atheist who denies the existence of God believe what he claims? Does the Christian who teaches that baptism is essential to becoming a Christian, or that the various doctrines of his creed are true, believe what he professes? That is the great test. We cannot approve of anyone, whether Infidel or Christian, who is hypocritical on any vital question; and acquiescence in what we believe to be false is almost approval. This is a difficulty to be considered seriously by members of various churches, and their pastors, who profess orthodoxy but are at heart Unitarian.

A recent canvass made among some average men and women, church goers in New York, produced the following results: 33 per cent. refused to discuss the question or even listen to any criticism, or read any unorthodox book; 42 per cent. admitted privately that they no longer believed the doctrines, but protested against disturbing the faith of others; 25 per cent. no longer believed and tolerated discussion, but thought it unimportant. Not a single one has read an adverse criticism of the Bible.

The Rationalist sometimes takes undue pleasure in the long list of clergymen who have fallen from grace; but failure on the part of a few individuals to live up to high ideals is not so heinous as the general failure of most church members to be true to themselves. A system that discourages a man from thinking out his creed to a conclusion, and prefers to have him profess what he does not really believe, is more at fault than the Infidelity which braves all to be true. In most churches, disbelief is no great offense if kept to oneself, so we might infer that their God prefers to have them worship him hypocritically rather than not at all. Is not the secular advice better? "This above all: to thine own self be true, and it must follow, as the night the day, thou canst not then be false to any man," nor to any God. (To be continued)

The Insidious Exemption Evil.

The enormous growth and monstrous injustice of exempting from impartial taxation the huge private corporations doing business as charitable institutions has been dealt with in an address by Senator George A. Slater before the joint legislative committee of New York state on taxation and retrenchment. The larger number of the institutions illustrating the exemption evil are religious and sectarian; but under whatever control or for whatever purpose, unless the property of the community, their relief from the common burden of taxes is but a survival of that abuse which had its sinister beginning in the corrupt exemption of ecclesiastical property.

BY THE HON. GEO. A. SLATER.

Beginning with our state government, the policy of sharing the care of the dependent wards of the state with private corporations was established. Likewise the state recognized the value of the churches and the charitable, benevolent, educational and other eleemosynary corporations to society by permitting them to enjoy real estate exempt from the burdens of taxation. This right was created by statute and may be limited or destroyed in the same manner. The business of this form of partnership has continued and grown and the growth of the classes so exempted and privileged has increased in excess and in larger proportion in the tax districts than has the amount of the taxable real estate of the state.

Inception of the Graft.

The first exemption was created soon after the formation of the state government. In 1799 the real estate of places of public worship, colleges, library, state and federal property was exempted. In 1801 lands of ministers of the gospel were added. In 1823 houses of industry, later held by the courts to include orphan asylums, were likewise added. In 1827 land of literary and charitable corporations was included. The law was further extended in 1859. In 1875 lands of the cemetery corporations, toll companies and of the New York Hospital were included. Land of fire companies was added in 1879, and in 1896 the law was generously amended so as to include the very numerous present exempt classes as follows: The real property of a corporation or association organized exclusively for the moral or mental improvement of men or women or for religious, Bible, tract, charitable, benevolent, missionary, hospital, infirmary, educational, scientific, literary, library, patriotic, historical or cemetery purposes, or for the enforcement of laws relating to children or animals, so that the property of all such shall be exempt from taxation.

An Attempt to Check Its Spread.

The Constitutional Convention of 1867 proposed a section requiring uniformity of taxation. In 1901, under section 18, Article III of the Constitution, further exemptions to any person or corporation were prohibited. The members of the late Constitutional Convention of 1915, fully realizing that the foundation principle of organized society, the right to compel each citizen to contribute equally to the governmental burden, was being invaded by excess of land tax exemptions, placed in that Constitution the clause which states: "Hereafter no exemptions from taxation shall be granted except by general laws and upon affirmative vote of two-thirds of all members elected to each house." This was as much as could be obtained by those desiring relief from land tax exemptions in the face of the determined and open opposition of the exempt and privileged classes.

Privately Owned Exemptions.

The total assessed value of the real estate in New York in 1915 was $11,328,994,973, total exemptions $2,521,705,003, including exemptions of land "privately owned" $660,668,720. The total of exempt real estate in 1915 amounted to about 20 per cent. of the total real estate assessed. Of all exemptions, 25 per cent. is real estate "privately owned," being 5½ per cent. of all the real estate assessed.

In my county, Westchester, in 1914 the total real estate assessed was $377,979,288. Of this the aggregate amount of exempt property was $60,892,378, and of this amount what is known as "privately owned" exempt was $32,286,533. Of all exemptions about 50 per cent. is property "privately owned" and the "privately owned" exempt class is over 8½ per cent. of all the real estate assessed in my county.

Enormous Increase.

In the last decade the exemption of real estate from taxation in New York has increased nearly twice as fast as the assessment for taxation. Between 1905 and 1915 the increase of real estate exemptions was 81 per cent., while for the same period the assessment of real estate increased 48 per cent. In 1914 the Board of Supervisors of my county, Westchester, complained to the legislature of the excessive exemptions and a joint legislative committee was appointed to investigate into the affairs of the Society of the New York Hospital and Bloomingdale Hospital, a branch. A report was made to the legislature January 29, 1915. That legislative committee reported and recommended to the legislature:

"First. That a law be passed authorizing the different political divisions of the state to enter into an agreement with the charitable institutions proposing to locate in such political division whereby exemption from taxation is granted upon payment to the proper authorities of a sum to be agreed upon, and in case no such agreement is made then the real estate owned by such institution shall pay taxes in the same manner as real estate owned by other property holders.

"Second. That a law be passed providing that all property of charitable institutions located in counties or subdivisions other than that in which the main institution is located shall be taxed in the same manner as property belonging to other property holders."

This finding was the result of the labors of the joint legislative committee and is the real basis for these proposed laws now under consideration.

Remedial Measures Proposed.

In view of the ever increasing burden of the insidious exemption evil two bills were introduced in the Senate in 1916 to effect a change in the policy of the state. One bill required all of the exempt classes to pay a tax of 2.5 per cent. upon their real estate toward the support of government and for the protective arm of the state cast about the exempt classes, while the other bill affected my county, Westchester, and authorized the Board of Supervisors of my county to give or withhold its assent for any exemptions. The first was objected to by the exempt classes as revolutionary and hostile to their long continued enjoyment of a special privilege, while the latter was claimed to be local and not of general application.

Long enjoyment of the special privilege has dulled the minds and sense of right to the general public of those in control of these corporations and they now believe that they should continue to have an easement of privilege and right because of its long continued enjoyment. Consequently in 1916 they appeared in large numbers to protest against these proposed laws.

Changed Conditions Demand Change of Policy.

The conditions that permitted the beginning of the policy of tax exemptions do not longer exist. These corporations beginning insignificantly with the country's birth have expanded with the country and are now full grown, strong, alert and peculiarly aggressive. These are the days of stupendous affairs that start large. The Andrew Freedman, the Isaac F. Rice, the Rockefeller and the Sage foundations and other similar charities started with millions of assets and still they exist and enjoy exemptions under our laws. In fact, if these corporations wanted to pay taxes they could not do so by reason of the barrier created by our laws. They are exempt. The community has been prohibited by the state from being permitted to receive money from these classes.

Under the present law the exempt classes have the privilege to locate in any place and purchase and acquire lands to an unlimited amount. They act under no restrictions. The Constitution under Article VIII, sections 9 and 14, withholds state aid from and commits the care of the state dependents through the legislature to any county, town or village.

The Grants Outgrow the Population.

Prior to 1874 the state had granted subsidies to private charities. The Constitutional Convention of 1894 found that appropriations by cities, counties and towns had grown to enormous proportions and appeared to be still growing at a rate vastly in excess of the increase of the population of the state. The convention of 1894 placed the institutions securing public aid under the control of the State Board of Charities. The legislature has authorized the counties to make payments for the care of the dependents or wards of the state. A particular county is required to look after the dependents of that county. New York, Albany, Erie and all the other counties are charged with the care of their own dependents. But what happens?

The corporations participating in the exemptions located in New York county go into my county, Westchester, and the other nearby counties and locate branch or summer homes, as well as at times remove the entire institution to such other county.

The people of this state cannot submit to this palpable injustice. A public wrong exists. Public opinion does not support a law which permits this wrongful placing of a burden. The present law permits the people's property in one county to be charged to help maintain charitable institutions used for the people of another county.

Who Is Authority?

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Feb. 17, Mr. Eccles tells us that now the Jesus controversy is exhausted we will go on to something else. Maybe Mr. Eccles has exhausted himself, but to me the subject is by no means exhausted of further Rationalist possibilities. There are two kinds of teachers in the world, viz., the dogmatic or religious asserters of their own authority and opinion, and the truly scientific teacher using the scientific method, which appeals to the reason and allows reason to be the final authority, arbiter or judge. Professor Drews and the others named in previous articles use the scientific method, but I am afraid that our modern David is inclined to the religious dogmatic attitude. He writes of me as being "another worshiper of authority," intimating that because Dr. Wakefield and myself prefer Drews and the others, we are worshipping false gods of Secularist authority, and therefore are wrong in our conclusions. Now, if because one quotes another as authority he is thereby made a worshiper of such authority, we would ask Mr. Eccles if he worships Judge Waite because he quoted him in his article, "Questioning the Authorities." Did he worship Herbert Spencer when several years ago he gave a course of Rationalist lectures on the ideas of this great English philosopher and no doubt quoted him extensively? No Rationalist worships his authorities, but uses them and puts them in their proper place in the educating of his mind. Dr. Wakefield and myself quote Drews, Dr. Hardwicke, Prof. Wm. Benj. Smith and the others because we think we have in them competent authorities upon this subject of the historicity of Jesus. I would accept Thomas Edison as an authority on electricity and Luther Burbank as one who knew how best to grow fruits and flowers in California, but I would not recognize the assertions of either Edison or Burbank in political economy, unless agreeing with accepted authority or my own reason, or preferably both.

Mr. Eccles writes (concerning the Josephus quotation):

"Taylor in his 'Diegesis' could assign no more substantial reason for its rejection than that it was suspicious; but he said, even if valid, it might refer to any one of a number of Jesuses among the Jews who took unto themselves the title of Christ. I once thought thus myself."

I am glad that Mr. Eccles once thought so. As the human is capable of changing his mind, he may think so again. He holds that my opinion is not worth the paper it is printed upon. But my opinion is the same as the authorities I quote, or I should not quote them. Therefore, the opinions of these authorities, ripened scholars and higher critics, are not worth the paper they are printed upon! But the proof of the pudding is in the eating. These authors and critics have had books issued by publishers who were keen-eyed business men. If the opinions of his writers were not worth the cost of paper, Mr. Publisher would certainly not continue to publish their books in this commercial age of great business rivalry.

Mr. Eccles only partially quotes, as in the case of Professor Smith: "The words have been regarded as spurious." He leaves off the last three words, thus giving the sentence a different inflection. I quoted Smith as follows: "The words have been regarded as spurious—we think correctly." I acknowledge that the first part of this remark may be considered inferential, but when Professor Smith adds, "We think correctly," he makes it positive and gnostic. Also, if Professor Smith and my other authorities, by doubting the authenticity of this second passage of Josephus, "think correctly," then by implication Mr. Eccles in standing by its genuineness most certainly thinks incorrectly. Nor do I see in what way these same authorities "purposely avoid" reference to this second interpolation of Josephus.

Again, Mr. Eccles doubts if I have ever read Josephus in the original; yet which were better—to read the correct translation of an author by another or to misinterpret it for oneself? I leave the intelligent reader to decide.

And still again, Mr. Eccles is afraid that if we omit reference to "the brother of Jesus who is called Christ" from the second Josephus passage it will not make sense. Why not? Why could it not read this way?—

"But this younger Ananus, who, as we have told you already, took the high priesthood, was a bold man in his temper and very insolent; he was also of the sect of Sadducees, who are very rigid in judging offenders, above all of the rest of the Jews, as we have already observed; when, therefore, Ananus was of this disposition, he thought he had now a proper opportunity. Festus was dead, and Albinus was but upon the road; so he assembled the Sanhedrim of judges and brought before them one whose name was James, and some others; and when he had formed an accusation against them as breakers of the law he delivered them to be stoned."

As further evidence in this contention I quote more authorities. The Rev. Dr. Hooykaas of Holland, in his "Bible for Learners," vol. iii, page 27, writes as follows:

"Flavius Josephus, the well-known historian of the Jewish people, was born in A. D. 37, only two years after the death of Jesus; but though his work is of inestimable value as our chief authority for the circumstances of the times in which Jesus and his Apostles came forward, yet he does not seem to have mentioned Jesus himself. At any rate, the passage in his 'Jewish Antiquities' that refers to him is certainly spurious, and was inserted by a later and a Christian hand."

Dr. Alexander Campbell, one of America's ablest Christian apologists, writes:

"Josephus, the Jewish historian, was contemporary with the Apostles, having been born in the year 37. From his situation and habits, he had every access to know all that took place at the rise of the Christian religion.

"Respecting the founder of this religion, Josephus has seen fit to be silent in history. The present copies of his work contain one passage which speaks very respectfully of Jesus Christ, and ascribes to him the character of the messiah. But as Josephus did not embrace Christianity, and this passage is not quoted or referred to until the beginning of the fourth century, it is, for these and other reasons, generally accounted spurious."—Evidences of Christianity, from Campbell-Owen Debate, page 312.

According to this, there are probably copies of Josephus extant which have only one interpolated passage. But after all is said and done, Hugh M. Martin hit the nail squarely on the head when he wrote:—"About the best evidence of the reality of the existence of a Jesus that I have found is the testimony of some of my neighbors, ordinarily veracious but of rather unrestrained imaginations, who depose that they have found him very precious to their souls."

JOHN A. MORRIS.

Ordeal by Battle.

The superstition, started in mediaeval times, according to The Independent, that an appeal to God was superior to the judgment of fallible human beings has persisted to the present day and is a subconscious potent cause against discussion of peace terms until the decision of victory is made. "It ought to be possible, however, to destroy this hampering superstition of the past because a moment's calm reflection shows it is a fallacy." Victory for either side will not prove that God approves their actions.

That is the strange part of religion. It casts a pall over the intellect which prevents an otherwise rational being from seeing clearly. No matter how often it is proved that prayer to the Almighty produces no result, they continue to hope that the next time will demonstrate that the ancient theories are correct. Even in Biblical records "the Lord could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron"; so it may be that it is the heavy guns of the present war that prevent him from accomplishing the downfall of the side that is not his chosen people.

Ah! well I mind me of the days,
Still bright in memory's flattering rays,
When all was bright and new;
When knaves were only found in books,
And friends were known by friendly looks,
And love was always true. —John G. Saxe.

Just the Truth.

All that we want is the truth. We want persons to tell the truth and stop lying. Clergymen are like a nation's diplomats; they lie as long as they can, and admit the truth only when they are caught. It looks to me like a simple matter to tell what you know and what you don't know, but when you try to get a Christian to do this you discover that it is a very difficult matter. A Christian wishes to substitute faith for knowledge and to pass what he believes for what he doesn't know. We have had enough of this kind of substitution. It misleads and confuses the searcher after truth.

I wish to know what facts a Christian clergyman has which I have not. I wish to know why he says there is a God, when all Nature says there is not. I wish to know what he has seen or heard during the past year that he regards as a divine manifestation. If there is a God in the universe he must do something; he must reveal his presence in some way. What that has taken place in the earth during the year 1916 was a revelation of God?

What does a Christian minister pray to when he stands in his pulpit and talks to God? Is this God in the church? Has this God ears to hear? What is the sign of divinity? I can get no answer to these questions, but am told to have faith. Religion is more or less a flimflam game. A man is asked to believe in a Father in heaven, but he never sees this Father or hears from him in any way.

Now, what I want is just the truth. If a Christian minister knows nothing of God I want him to say so frankly from his pulpit. I want him to be honest and acknowledge his ignorance, and not damn me for refusing to be a hypocrite by professing to believe what I know to be a religious lie, that the Lord God of the ancient Hebrews is the divine Providence of the universe. The only God that the Christian can show is the brute—God of the Old Testament, the creation of the ignorance and superstition and barbarity of the writers of the Pentateuch. But what a God!

There is something doing in the world of man to-day, something horrible to think of, something worse to realize. Human beings are being sent dead to the bottom of the sea; are being killed by shot and shell in scores of battlefields; are being butchered in their homes, men, women and children alike; are starving and dying by inches where war's cruel and fierce cry is heard. A flood of death covers Europe, and no Ararat shows its peak of safety. Is God in sight anywhere in Europe, anywhere in the world? Is he where mothers and their babes lie dead in Armenia, left to die by starvation by men who call him Allah? Is he in the submarine which is peopling the bottom of the ocean with the strong and brave of earth? Is he in the zeppelin that drops death on innocent human beings? If God is in all this cruelty and wickedness, would not the world be better without God?

What we wish to know is the truth. Is God in the world to kill men, or to save them—to destroy nations or to preserve them? Is God behind the man who declares war, or the man who tries to prevent war?

What we wish to know is the truth, just the truth. What have all the prayers of men to God accomplished? How has God answered these prayers? Let the Christian ministers of the country show wherein their God has answered their prayers for peace. Let them tell the truth. We are tired of their lies. If we have had God for the last two years and eight months, how much worse could the world have been without him?

Real Heroes at Home.

Men are to be found in every generation, who never lifted a hand against one of their fellows, quite as brave and enduring and self-devoted as those who have had their home in camps or trenches, and chose the battle-field for their grave.

They are essentially men of peace. Their weapons are arguments, entreaty, persuasion, remonstrance. The world's praise they do not covet, and often do not win; for their business is to stem the current, to proclaim some forgotten truth, to stand up for the victims of oppression when tyranny is strongest, to wake up to some new enterprise in the cause of humanity the crowd who prefer slumber and self-indulgence to generous and manly effort.

They do not look for present reward, but sow for a distant harvest, often laying the foundation on which others are to build, often braving the storm, that their successors may sail over tranquil seas; often falling on "evil days and evil tongues," while a later generation of feeble champions win an ovation at small cost. They walk by Reason, and are content to wait the day of the crowning of Truth while they do the work of Truth. Struggle they must, because their vocation is to contend with ignorance, and prejudice, and selfishness, to confront power when allied with injustice, and to arrest the multitude when they are rushing madly forward in some dangerous path.

But contention is not the element they love. Many a time they are forced on to some public stage, from which they would retreat if they dared, but on which it is the need of the age that they should testify for the truth, or do battle for suffering or oppressed humanity. One thing is specially characteristic of this oft-forgotten type of heroes—they are in advance of their age, and have to do the rough work of pioneers. At their own risk they clear a way for more timid or less discerning men, through tangled forests or pathless deserts.

The man who wants to use other men for his tools and drudges must fall in with their humors, and either share their blindness, or make them yet blinder for his own purposes. But the grander man is he who sees further than the crowd, and then confronts them for their own good; who takes his stand on some undying principle, as on a rock, and struggles on in full assurance that the time will come in his day or after it, when it shall be owned that he was right, and his revilers all wrong. Peace has its heroes, as well as victories, no less renowned than war.

Puppet and Paranoic.

Felix Shay of the Fra, who has heretofore contemplated the Rev. W. A. Sunday as a mountebank and grafter, changed his mind after hearing the evangelist preach in Buffalo, and now views him as a paranoic or parietic. Sunday is the puppet, and Rodeheaver is the man who pulls the strings. We quote Felix Shay's impression of the individual the clergy have invited to New York for the salvation of the metropolis:

"Soon his time came to speak. Rodeheaver motioned him, signaled him. He stood, tottered, and then ran the fourteen feet that separated the chair and the pulpit, on his toes, tilted forward. Oft I have seen men drunk and men heavy in drugs make progress like this. I could not believe my eyes. I dare not look at my companions—what were they seeing?"

"Rodeheaver knows. He stands by Sunday every minute. He permits Sunday no duties but the sermon. He sustains him; holds him together. 'Sunday announced the text: 'God commanded all men to repent!' 'Get that!' he squealed. 'Not me! God! God commanded—not Billy Sunday—God!'

"Some one to my left murmured, 'Egomaniac!'

"But 'twas more than ego!"

"His poor emaciated body served simply to hang clothes on. His long, thin shanks failed him as he walked. His physical deterioration is marked. His nerves are gone. His brain cannot remember more than one paragraph. He may never get more than three feet from his notes. Yes—he talked with notes!"

"For one hour and ten minutes he excited himself, raved, stood on one leg, shook his fist, made faces at the Devil, talked to God, exhausted his voice—shrieked with diabolical laughter that sent shivers along the spine. 'Oh, Felix,' whispered the young woman next to me, 'he is crazy!'

"Aye, poor man, he is!"

"Unbalanced! Deranged! Obsessed! Gone—his mind gone! No wonder he attracts crowds! And not by what he says—I assure you that. He said not a single memorable word—not one. Not a thought. Not a joke. Not a vulgarity. Not a story. Not an apt illustration. Not a word-picture, nothing!"

"He ranted and he tore his body for physical reinforcement! His body lacks virility to help him. He was flat! and dull! He is flamboyant without force, erratic without originality, jocular without humor. He talked from his vocal cords. He never went below them for power. Imagine the condition of his voice—hoarse, wheezy, disagreeable. Imagine the agony of his facial expression as he tried to reach 14,000 with a worn-out voice, a sick mind, a wandering will—and a body that stumbles."

"Applause seems to surprise and delight him. In mid-air he stops his harangue, retires behind the pulpit; walks up and down; rubs his hands together; smirks and gibbers to himself—apparently oblivious of his audience."

"Twelve words he mispronounced—either through mental lapses or ignorance. Five times he started sentences, and when half through lost his thought—and never recovered it."

Long ago Dr. Henry Maudsley, in his "Responsibility in Mental Diseases," pointed out the difficulty of distinguishing between insanity and the prophetic, that is the preaching, mania. Dr. William Hirsch, in his "Religion and Civilization," went still further in the identification of the preaching mania with paranoia. The other day—March 4, to be exact—Mayor Louis Franke of Johnstown, Pa., happened upon a "tabernacle revival" that was being carried on in the Seventh ward of the city, and having observed the conduct of Samuel Miller, the evangelist, caused his arrest as an insane person. A girl who was assisting in the exhorting and praying protested against the arrest, saying that the man was "just religious." The Rev. Sunday may be "just religious," but that condition is reconcilable with his also being just crazy.

Clergy and Laity.

Among the many invidious distinctions which have been established by the Christian church since its appearance in history, none has been farther reaching in its influence or more detrimental to the highest interests of a progressive people than the well-known separation of mankind into clergymen and laymen. This distinction appears not only in an inability on the part of laymen to perform ecclesiastical functions, but also in a certain inferiority of intellect attributed to the laity, which has given rise to the term "uninstructed laymen," as contrasted with the expression, "learned clergy."

The plain truth is that the assumption of an instructed clergy and an uninstructed laity is a purely imaginary one; and in the fact that this line of demarcation is imaginary lies the substantial justification of all works written by laymen against the absurdities of the Bible and the incredible dogmas of the Christian church. It is, indeed, only through the laity that the task of instructing the clergy can be accomplished. It is only by appealing to the populus that the clerus can be made to open their eyes or to guard their lips.

In this country there is a great analogy between the only effectual course of proceeding available to reformers in theological and in political matters. Every one who has tried has been compelled to admit, with bitterness and indignation, that if he desires to bring the government to abandon a mistaken system or to adopt sounder views, it is not to the members of the government that he must address himself. Time so employed is usually thrown away. He must convince the public—not the officials; and when the public is enlightened and persuaded and grows noisy, then the officials follow tardily, reluctantly, and grumblingly in its wake.

Ecclesiastical tenacity in adhering to old ideas, established formulas, obsolete errors, and exploded routine is at least a match for bureaucratic immovability, and (to coin a word) unconvinability. As long as listeners are uninstructed, preachers will continue to enunciate, with the same security as heretofore, the drawling platitudes, the innutritious ethics, the unbelievable legends, the startling narratives, the unedifying commentaries, the repellant dogmas, with which it is their inveterate custom to regale their audience,—and will call these things the saving truth of God. Does any one suppose that if the mass of the people, the rational but “unlearned laity,” were once conversant with the untenable nature of the doctrine of biblical inspiration, the unhistoric character of many of the scriptural narratives and personages and the thoroughly human origin of the Christian doctrines, the pulpits of the land would dare to resound Sunday after Sunday, from our cradle to our grave, with the dreary, shallow, unprofitable, misleading verbiage, which the clergy now deem good enough for hearers who know no better? Does any one believe that till the people are thus enlightened there is any prospect of this discreditable and injurious state of things being amended? The “accredited teachers of religion” must be forced to teach truth and sense and edifying doctrine, by the augmented moral and intellectual capacity of their flocks, so that the ministers cannot, for fear of being put to open shame, do otherwise.

The times are no longer propitious for silencing the voice of the intelligent layman as he declares his judgment in the presence of the “learned clergy.” This fact is well-known to all religious teachers today, who are not as promptly disposed to condemn the new thought as formerly, but are anxious rather to make it harmonize with the old faith as being a more complete expression of the church’s teaching. The new ideas, being the true ones, must somehow or other, they feel—“insensibly” if possible—be introduced into, and made to harmonize with, the theological belief of the people. But it must not be done by proclaiming these new ideas, by arguing for them, by demonstrating them, before the assembled intelligence of the nation. It must be done by some undescribed mental effluvia, some subtle intellectual emanation, homœopathic, and therefore at once harmless and penetrating. It must needs be, say the orthodox clergy, with a sigh of mingled candor and resignation, that enlightenment come; but woe to that man through whom it comes! And the woe is not prophesied for him as an imprudent man, but denounced against him as a dangerous and noxious one.

This first beginning of the influence of the thoughtful laity in matters ecclesiastical is making itself felt everywhere in the world today. Religious investigation is no longer the sole possession of a clerical class. The response of the cultured layman to the impertinent teachers of an uninstructed church is no longer a plea of ignorance or an air of indifference, but a “Pooh, pooh! I know how to distinguish the building from the rubbish. I know wherein religious truth consists and where religious life lies. Don’t choke ME with your regulation loaf of fossil sawdust, and tell me that is the Bread of Life.” The greatest books being written today in connection with religion come from the mind of the lay class. In fact, it is due to the new and interesting phase which has been given to the subject by the publications of eminent laymen, that the hope has been revived that a rational solution of the many metaphysical conceptions involved in creedal religionism may be reached once and for all time. Speaking from our vantage ground of truth, we have no desire whatever to disparage the intellectual attainments of many of the clergy, who have arrived at no little distinction in the world of thought; but nevertheless we adhere tenaciously to the idea that the hope of the world, as well in matters religious as in scientific investigations, rests with the instructed lay folk.

The instructed and conscientious man, whether clergyman or layman, ought to be committed to no other objective in the investigation of truth than the truth itself. This does not seem to be the case with most of the clergy; and herein lies the marked distinction between the clerical and lay mind. As long as a body of men called clergymen are pledged in advance to the support of a traditional type of thought which they have inherited but never investigated personally, all hope must be abandoned of the world’s ever learning the “Riddle of the Universe.” The ultimate result of such a plan cannot be other than disastrous for the standing of the clergy. The old-time distinction between clergy and laity, which reached its final emphasis in the middle ages, no longer obtains anywhere in the world today; nevertheless, the line of demarcation is as apparent now as at any time in the history of religion, and it is one which is bringing yearly more honor and influence to the lay people of the world, who have at last acquired their right to think on all subjects irrespective of a so-called clerical class. The future of the world belongs to the educated layman.

A Bill to Be Defeated.

A drastic Sunday law for Missouri has been proposed by the introduction in the general Assembly, by Mr. Huston, of an act to amend the revised statutes on “Crimes and Punishments” with a section that prohibits theatrical, dramatic and outdoor sports and performances on Sunday. It appears to be an extremely bad bill, and Secretary Reichwald of the American Secular Union has sent from headquarters at Chicago a protest in which he says:

“We desire to say it is regrettable that in this enlightened age, or supposed enlightened age, a people of any state in this Union, or in any nation, should attempt by law to curtail the harmless moral and progressive development of the people by obnoxious measures, which seek to suppress the spirit of liberty and freedom among them. While it is true that even in modern times there are some still dwelling in the Medieval Ages, yet it is to be hoped that in the United States there will not develop what we call a state among the States to be classed as the Medieval State. What creeds, religious malice and prejudice influenced the conduct of men and law-making bodies, the obnoxious measures which they passed did not even then go as far as this measure introduced in your legislative body. The present bill finds no parallel among all the bills upon the subject it seeks to deal with, introduced into the legislative bodies in this country since the days of the Connecticut blue laws. It is not a Pagan, Christian, Jewish or Mohammedan measure. It is a measure prompted by bigotry, intolerance and defective education, and it is an evil and wicked measure. There is not a Christian, Jewish or Mohammedan devotee who understands modern thought, freedom, liberty and enlightenment, who could endorse this obnoxious measure.

“If this measure were submitted to the people of Missouri, it would be found that at least ninety per cent. of them would oppose it as contrary to the spirit, laws, constitution and institutions of this country.

“There is no rightful power inherent in the legislatures of this country to prevent citizens from pursuing their own happiness and selecting their own mode of being entertained, instructed and amused, so long as they do not interfere with the rights of others. By what right do the law-makers of any state set themselves up as censors to regulate the moral, social, religious or harmless and healthful amusements of citizens? Sunday is not the Sabbath Day in all the Christian world; and as for religion, it is a private matter and not a public affair.

“In conclusion, we appeal to your good legislative judgment and sense to repudiate this obnoxious bill and place the stamp of legislative condemnation upon a measure, which is of a kind and character that has not met with favor in an intelligent legislative body for one hundred years.”

The bill, numbered 4801, was introduced by Mr. Huston “by request.” The identity of the trouble-makers who are behind it is not revealed. Any protest against it which may be sent to legislators by citizens of Missouri will have weight, for it is not believed that the Assembly would pass such a measure were the members provided with good reasons for defeating it; and such reasons may be found in the assurance that the people of the state do not want it imposed upon them.

One of those impertinent go-to-church advertisements that have come under our notice holds out the inducement that is good business to be seen at church and a guarantee or testimonial of moral character. This species of argument irritates us into making a reply. For months there has been in our collection of clippings a report of the charges made by a New England clergyman against members of his own congregation. The charges range from intemperance to immorality and adultery among men and women of good standing in the church. Said the minister, speaking of his congregation as he found it:

“1. A man was retained in good and regular standing as a member of the church, though it was known that he had deserted his wife and eloped with another woman.

“2. A married man was retained in good and regular standing as a member of the church, though it was known that he had been summoned into court on a serious charge. He was still retained as a member of the church after his wife had secured a divorce from him.

“3. An unmarried woman has been retained in good and regular standing as a member of the church, though it was known that she was found in another city in a hotel occupying the same room and bed with her employer, a married man.

“4. A married man was retained in membership, even though it was known that he was excessively profane, that he was brutal to his wife and family, and for years guilty of indiscreet conduct with an unmarried woman.

“5. An unmarried woman was retained in membership, though for years her indiscreet conduct with a married man was the subject of gossip and the well known cause of unhappiness and misery in the man’s family.

“6. A married man, occupying a prominent position and accused by a former pastor of a very serious offense, still retains his office.

“7. A married man stands accused by a member of the church with causing excessive unhappiness in the latter’s home by being too attentive to his wife during her husband’s absence.

The congregation here concerned is that of the Dewey Street Baptist church of Worcester, Massachusetts; the clergyman, the Rev. John C. Breaker; and his charges were set forth in the Boston Herald of Wednesday, November 8, 1916. We know of no reason for not accepting this congregation as typical of the rest. All the charges are not here given. They involve no less than ten persons, every one of them a church member and communicant, whose offenses against good morals are in most cases a matter of court record. The fact is that the general run of members of the churches and of church-goers do not stand higher in point of moral character than men and women who never join the church or go to meetings. Clergymen have themselves confessed that the people who take no interest in religion or the churches are the best in the community. To judge by the sentiments and conduct of church members daily met, one would not suspect that the church imposed any moral requirements upon them.

A “fool bill” is the title given by Dunbar’s Weekly, Phoenix, Arizona, to a measure passed by the Arizona House authorizing Bible reading in schools. “We have churches and homes,” says the editor, “where the Bible ought to be taught, but for conscience’ sake keep this trouble-making regulation out of our public schools. There are about 186 different dogmas preached by the various denominations, and every one of them takes its authority from the Bible. This is all right as long as it is confined to congregations of individuals who believe their pastors, but it must be remembered that children from all of those denominations attend public school, and no matter what provisions there are in that bill, there will be bigots as teachers who will try to impose their personal beliefs upon the pupils. Anyway the measure is an improper one. The home is the true place for teaching children Christianity and the Bible, and it is out of place in the public schools.”

EVOLUTION BY INHERITANCE

Some Affirmative Observations Concerning the Transmission of Acquired Characters.

On page 132 of THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 3, 1917, appears a splendid article entitled "We Stand by Spencer." This article is well calculated to arouse renewed interest in one of the world's great subjects, Evolution, and one of the world's great men, Herbert Spencer, and deserves a careful rereading.

However, there are several statements and quotations contained in that article which require some elaboration to make them available for those readers who are not thoroughly acquainted with the best standard writings on the subject of evolution. For instance, we read:

"He [Spencer] got the facts of evolution right, but gave the wrong reason for them, i. e., the inheritance of acquired characters for qualities. For example, he had small hands, and attributed the peculiarity to the fact that his ancestors for generations had done no manual labor." . . . "We understand that there has never been discovered, by observation or experiment, a single fact to show that acquired characters are transmitted; and yet the theory looks reasonable and is hard to abandon."

This "theory" does not only "look reasonable" to me, but it appears to me that the transmission of "acquired characters or qualities" is a fact that is as well established as the fact that size, color, or mental peculiarities are transmissible, is established.

As an illustration of my contention I will take the known evolution of the horse. If we may judge from somewhat meager accounts of ancient history, the average weight of the horse, at the time of the building of the pyramids, must have been some 900 or 1,000 pounds. The speed of the fleetest specimens must have been far below that of those we know today. By careful feeding, grooming, training and selection, certain varieties of the horse have been developed that weigh a ton or more, others for exceptional speed, others for especial beauty of form and grace of movement, etc. Much of this has been accomplished during the lifetime of men now living.

If these are not acquired characters or qualities, what are they? That they are transmissible admits of no doubt, for do not men pay in some cases almost fabulous prices for exceptionally fine individuals because they know that their exceptional qualities will be transmitted to a portion of their offspring at least. I might make similar observations in regard to most of the other domestic animals, including poultry and field and garden vegetation as well.

It also appears to me that the human body furnishes a number of illustrations to show that Spencer was right in his deductions and conclusions. We will consider for instance the fact that we have several pairs of rudimentary muscles attached to the base of each ear in a manner similar to those of the lower animals who are able to move their ears at will. We may therefore safely assume that the ancestors of the human family could move their ears, and in fact there are a few rare specimens among the human family even now who can "wag their ears" at will. However, in the great majority of human beings, by continuous disuse for ages owing to greater development and agility of arms and hands or some other cause, the muscles of the ear became atrophied and dormant and are today merely rudiments.

But surely this peculiarity is also transmissible. Then why not the smaller hands resulting from many generations of very light work or "no manual labor" as Spencer put it?

We read further from the article under consideration: "He [Spencer] would perhaps agree with the Lamarckians who hold that the giraffe has a long neck because its ancestors through a long past had been obliged to stretch after food that hung high; whereas the explanation by natural selection would be that the giraffe survived because its long neck enabled it to reach herbage that grew high where none grew at or near the ground."

As stated in part above, for the benefit of those readers who have not had the time or opportunity to study this subject more thoroughly, I wish to add the following: To understand natural selection one of the things we must keep in mind is the fact that while, as the common saying runs, "Like begets like," yet there are no two individuals of either mammal, fish, bird, plant or any other living thing that are exactly alike. There is an endless variety of individuals and no matter how much alike two individuals may look to us at first appearance, on closer examination and accurate measurements, a difference will be found. It is no more possible to find two individuals of any species of animal or plant exactly alike than it is to find among all the hundreds of millions of human beings that inhabit the earth, two that are exactly alike. It is not even possible to find, in a great forest of trees covered with millions upon millions of green leaves, two leaves that are exactly alike!

Now as the giraffe with its long neck and extended forelimbs is a favorite subject for discussion among the pros and cons of evolution, we will try to apply in a measure the above-named facts to his case. In the first place the individuals of the ancient species of animal from which the giraffe has been developed, differed from each other as we have seen that all individuals do. Some were slightly taller than the others, but none were extraordinary in their height. There were no doubt plenty of smaller animals such as sheep and goats to consume all the herbage near the ground. In periods of extreme drouth and famine such as come in all countries on account of the vicissitudes of climate and weather, the smaller and weaker specimens would naturally succumb and die of starvation. Those individuals that happened to be a little taller than their fellows could reach just enough additional foliage for food to keep themselves alive till a better season came. These taller specimens lived to propagate their kind. This had a tendency to heighten the creature which was developing the giraffe, for all the lower specimens had died during the famine. Future periods of drouth and famine had a tendency, for the same reasons, to still further heighten the creature, for when there was not food enough for all it was only the tallest ones that survived, until after the lapse of many thousands of years we have the extraordinary creature under consideration.

This is the method of natural selection, applied in a multitude of ways, to the evolution of species. It is going on at least in some species today right before our very eyes so unobtrusively that it is unnoticed excepting by the most careful students and the keenest observers, and has gone on in the world with some irregularity ever since the first cell was developed from the primeval protoplasm.

It is not only the species that is best fitted to cope with its surroundings that survives, but rather those individuals which vary from their fellows in some slight way which gives them an advantage in the struggle for existence, that live, propagate their kind and thus modify and maintain the species whenever it becomes necessary on account of changing climate or conditions. In the past those species which did not possess the variations and vitality to change to meet new conditions have become extinct. The history of many such tragedies is written in the rocks and has been deciphered by the geologist.

I am sorry to note that during recent years the more crafty and dishonest or the "blatherskite" kind of preachers are taking courage and boldly denouncing the well-known facts of evolution as falsehoods, depending upon the ignorance of their audience to carry the bluff through. I am also aware that there are too many Freethinkers who are not thoroughly posted in this matter and therefore liable to be imposed upon.

Evolution of species by natural selection is not a theory. It is a fact that is as well established as the revolution of the earth on its axis. It is a fact, however, not so plainly evident and so well known by every one, and is therefore seized upon by that crafty element among the clergy and held up to ridicule before their ignorant congregations.

In conclusion let me therefore urge every reader of this valuable journal, who has not already done so, to procure at once a copy each of the "Origin of Species" and the "Descent of Man" by Charles Darwin, and never rest satisfied until both are carefully read through. Then the works of Draper, Huxley and Spencer may follow.

Do not be alarmed if some "smarty scientist," harmonizer between science and theology, jumps up and announces that he has found an error in Darwin. The chances are that he is subsidized by the clergy and just throwing dust in your eyes to save the preacher's business. Just get those books and read them. They can be had in good bindings at a moderate price from THE TRUTH SEEKER.

THE JESUS COMPOSITE—II.

Encyclopedists and Higher Critics Furnish Few Identifying Marks of a Single Individual.

Prof. P. W. Schmiedel, of Zurich, in the Encyclopedia Biblica (vol. ii, p. 1869), admits that the oldest manuscripts of the gospels exhibit latent evidence of many examples of transference from the text of one gospel into that of another. He (ibid p. 1859) quotes Wernle as assuming that before the Logia were used in Matthew and Luke, they had undergone additions, alterations, and transpositions. The same author (ibid p. 1842) says: "Just as in Luke, Ebionite and Pauline ideas are found in juxtaposition and contrast, so in Matthew are universalism and Jewish particularism."

E. A. Abbot (ibid p. 1832) points out that Marcion's gospel was the equivalent of an incomplete Luke, and in the passage of scripture, "I have not come to destroy the law, but to fulfil it," he transposes "fulfil" and "destroy." From this we may conclude that, Marcion being older than Luke, the original version of Jesus' words were: "I came not to fulfil the law, but to destroy it," but as revised to fit the messianic idea in Luke it was conformed to Judaism.

According to Abbot (ibid p. 1792), Luke more perfectly describes the fall of Jerusalem as the result of siege and capture than Mark or Matthew. It was undoubtedly fabricated later when the Messianic craze was in full swing.

According to Mark viii, 27-30, Jesus never said he was the Messiah to any one and forbade the preaching of his messiahship. Biblical scholars appear to be agreed that Mark is the oldest gospel, and that both Matthew and Luke borrowed from it. The borrowed items are necessarily in more or less agreement, yet even these are not in complete correspondence. Professor Schmiedel (Encyclopedia Biblica, vol. ii, p. 1767) states that neither Matthew nor Luke borrowed from the other, yet with the exception of some thirty verses they both contain all of Mark, or an original Mark, possibly the Logia. Thus they are essentially the same material.

Of Mark, Professor Schmiedel wrote (op. cit. p. 1874): "The whole sum, however, of separate events in Galilee (miracles, discourses, and the like) has so comparatively little that is characteristic, and their order—for a writer who wrote only for the glorification of Jesus and not for a laboriously exact account of his biography—was of so comparatively little importance that it would not be safe for us to rely on them with any confidence whatever." We therefore must conclude that the other parts of Matthew and Luke, and those that so diverge from each other, are the reliable gospel materials of the Christians.

Following this, let us quote from Prof. H. Usener of Bonn, (Encyclopedia Biblica, vol. iii, p. 3344): "In spite of all the revisions which the gospels received before they became canonically fixed, they still not infrequently preserve references to conditions which are irreconcilable with the later additions and owe their preservation, as a rule, to their being inseparably bound up with weighty utterances of Jesus which the church could not willingly let die. The remark has long ago and often been made that, like Paul, even the gospels themselves know nothing of the miraculous birth of the savior. On the contrary, their knowledge of his natural filial relationship to Joseph the carpenter, and to Mary his wife, is still explicit."

The above suggests that probably this composite Jesus, as a historical character, is based on the Jesus son of Ananus of Josephus, while the elusive Mary is derived from the mythical virgin mother Mai, as pointed to by other evidence.

The Jesus of the Christian scriptures is not a unit, but a composite of concepts of many writers extending over centuries. The assemblage of holy writ is not a case of ordinary gathering of isolated fragments of historical facts into historical unity, but a vain endeavor to bring heterogenous, incompatible, and irreconcilable alleged facts into an impossible unification.

If Christian documents are creditable at all, Professor Drews has certainly gotten to the bottom of the origin of the "words of the Lord" in Matthew and Luke, as the sayings of the Jesus historical. Significant is Papias's authority that Matthew wrote the "Words of the Lord" in Hebrew (Primitive Matthew), together with the "Teaching of the Twelve Apostles" and the Epistle of James. He implies that the "words of the Lord," which are quoted not as the words of Jesus, but as of the God of Israel, were the sayings collected from the utterances, probably, of several individuals, and put in the mouth of Jesus in the second century.

Professor Drews' theory is that the present gospels of Matthew and Luke have independently taken their account of the acts of Jesus from the present or a primitive Mark, but have taken the words attributed to him from another source, as above.

An element of the Jesus of the New Testament, that has not been so far prototyped in the Old Testament, is the moral philosopher, the Jesus of the Unitarians and some Gnostics, who was neither divine nor a political messiah. Many semi-Rationalists who have easily rejected the divine and messianic aspects, cling tenaciously to the Jesus they love, the teacher and moral philosopher, who, according to some writers, has not been accounted for in any Old Testament character.

To meet this, let us review what little we know that is apropos to the moral philosopher Jesus, son of Sirach (Yeshua Ben Sira), who lived in Jerusalem and was author of the Book of Ecclesiasticus. This is one of the books of the Greek Bible, called by the Greek church fathers "the all virtuous Wisdom," and though a Hebrew apocrypha, was held in high esteem by the early Christian fathers, according to the Jewish Encyclopedia (vol. xi, p. 389). This authority, which places its date as the first third of the second century B. C., says of it:

"The Wisdom marks an epoch in the history of Jewish thought, on account, both of what it teaches and of what is silently ignored." The evidence shows that this author, who alone of all Jewish scriptural writers signed his name, was characterized as Jesus, son of Simon, son of Eleazar ben Sira (Sirach).

This Palestinian sage and philosophical observer of life, Jesus ben Sira, was an ardent Israelite and devoted lover of the Torah, but was neither a priest nor in the narrower sense a scribe. His vocabulary was based on the Hebrew sacred writings, with which he was familiar.

Prof. C. H. Toy, of Harvard (in the Encyclopedia Biblica, vol. ii, pp. 1164-79), writes: "There was a second collection entitled the Alphabet of Ben-Sira apparently compiled late in the Talmudic period, in which, along with genuine material (cited in the Talmud), there are sayings that seem not to belong to Ben Sira. The translation of some of his proverbs into Aramaic and the spurious additions to his work show the estimation in which he was held by his co-religionists. The Talmud seems not quite sure of the work, placing it sometimes among the external and forbidden books, sometimes among others. He was not less esteemed by the early Christians." "It is clear that the Hebrew and the versions have suffered in the process of translation. In various passages one or another of the texts shows additions or omissions. . . . By some the Greek translator is supposed to have made additions to his text in the interests of Jewish Alexandrian philosophy; others show Christian interpolation. The evidence for these is not distinct."

Neither the Talmud nor other historical record gives us the least knowledge of what became of Jesus ben Sirach, yet entirely independently the Talmud does chronicle the death by hanging after stoning, at Jerusalem, of a Jesus ben Pandera, who was put to death for (perhaps anti-Judaic) teachings now lost, and as suggested by Robertson "there might have gradually clustered the survivals of an ancient solar or other worship of a Babe Joshua son of Miriam."

Jesus ben Pandera, according to the Talmud account, was hanged on a tree for blasphemy or heresy, on the eve of a Passover, in the reign of Alexander Jannæus (B. C. 106-79).

A scholarly Hebraist, Dr. Löw, concludes that this Jesus was the founder of the Essene (or Jessean) sect, whose characters so closely resemble those of the early Christians, and have so deeply bothered Christian speculators.

Of Jesus ben Pandera, no teachings, and (like Jesus ben Sirach) no biography, are preserved to this day, subject to our comparison. The Talmud, however, does ascribe to Jesus ben Pandera five disciples, named: Matthai, Nakai, Netzer, Boni, and Thoda, which correspond in number with the five primary disciples of our Jesus, as named by John.

Mr. John M. Robertson directs our attention to the fact that the Talmud passages alluding to Jesus ben Pandera, have been omitted from the present printed editions of the Talmud, which is significant of a motive for their suppression.

Various confusions have arisen through the Talmudic Jesus ben Pandera becoming identified in the Babylonian Genara with a 'character—Ben Sotada or Stada or Sitda or Salda—who by one doubtful clue is put in the period of Rabbi Akiba in the second century C. E. This individual is also reported stoned and hanged on a tree on the eve of the Passover, but was said to have been executed at Lydda instead of Jerusalem. The story of Ben Stada is bound up with the name of Mary Magdala.

Another confusion arises in the possible analogy between the Bar Asira (for Ben Sira) of some manuscripts and Barabbas of the ancient reading of Matthew xxvii, 16, 17, which, according to Robertson (Pagan Christs, p. 153), was the accepted reading of the ancient church as gathered from Origen. Robertson asks: "Is not the proper presumption this, that the preservation of the name 'Jesus Barabbas' tells of the common association of those names in some such rite as must be held to underlie the gospel myth—that, in short, a 'Jesus the Son of the Father' was a figure in an old Semitic ritual of sacrifice before the Christian era?" The first allusion to the book of Ecclesiasticus among New Testament writings is found in the Epistle of Barnabas.

Further difficulties arise in identifying the Jesus Pandera of the Talmud with the Jesus ben Panthera, the illegitimate son of the Roman soldier Panthera, as narrated by Celsus, in his "True Discourse" against Christianity, which was answered and thus preserved by Origen. According to Celsus, Mary was divorced from her husband, and wandering about fell in with the Roman soldier Panthera, who was the father of Jesus. To quote the Encyclopedia Britannica (9th ed., vol. v, p. 296): "Jesus being needy went down to Egypt and there learned all the tricks by which he could work apparent miracles, and on the strength of this knowledge he claimed to be God when he returned to Judea." Practically all other Christian-made claims for Jesus of his time he refutes. No dates of this drama are given.

The question now arises as to the identification of Pandera with Panthera. The difference in English spelling is so slight that we are warranted in searching for a philological unity, and asking whether the Hebrew of Pandera is the equivalent of the Greek of Panthera. But this inquiry will introduce another article.

The Situation.

Der Schweizer Freidenker, official organ of the Federation of Monists and Rationalists in Switzerland, whither the International Bureau has fled, in one of its late numbers gives us a summary of the situation in the Freethought movement.

The statements, made from close observations, and the inferences drawn, coincide with like statements made by G. W. Foote a few years before his death in regard to the movement in England, and also with our own experiences here in the United States among English, German, Bohemian and Slovenian Monists, Rationalists and Freethinkers.

The reasons why Rationalists do not exert a greater power and influence 141 years after the Declaration of Independence; after Thomas Paine, Thomas Jefferson and Benjamin Franklin; half a century after Darwin, Abraham Lincoln and Robert Ingersoll—the reasons why the philosophy that is in agreement with the established facts of nature is downtrodden while medieval superstition and ignorance still rule supreme—may be mainly three.

1. Freethinkers, Rationalists, and Monists all over the world, with the structural condition of cerebral cells inherited from innumerable generations through the time of mental darkness during the rule of superstition, have still some diffidence in accepting a philosophy in accordance with the scientifically established facts of the universe, and are shy of "principles," "demands" and "platforms" of new Rationalist or Monist's organizations, because they say: "We have not become free from church dogma in order to become subscribers to new Freethinkers' dogmas. We want to be entirely free; we want the liberty to believe anything we wish to."

But this mental attitude of the period of transition from superstition to Monism must be changed. A Rationalist is not a man or a woman seeking freedom to believe anything according to whim or sentiment. A Rationalist strives to have his mental activity in harmony with facts. The Dualist thinks he can believe anything, whether it is in accord with nature or not. He may believe that three persons are one. The Rationalist can believe such a statement as little as a fine musician can agree to a discord; the tone of his mental consonance is tuned after the eternal universal symphony and will not yield to a dissonance. The Catholic may believe in purgatory, birth from a virgin, or the healing power of bones. The Lutheran may believe that on the third day of "creation" trees were green, and flowers blossomed before Jehovah ever thought of hanging that lantern in the skies which he did the fourth day. The Rationalist is not free to think anything he feels like; but his thinking is strictly defined by nature's facts and order. The philosophy of his life is firmly built on the eternal rock of universal life.

Now, then, when a lecturer on Monism expounds the teachings of Monism, shows you the mental vista of the harmonious unity of the Universe, the evolutionary unity without break of all beings, "organic" or "inorganic" (so-called from lack of close observation of hyper-microscopic living organisms), the unity of the human physio-psychic being, the unity in natural harmonious ethics, economics, etc., you should not shrink as from "new dogmas." When an organization asks your agreement to principles, platforms and demands, you should not feel as though you were again bending your neck under a yoke of a new authority. Your agreement is the natural confluence of your mental tendencies with those of fellow-thinkers.

It is highly profitable for any man to combine and associate with men and women of like interest and form a strong organization for the furtherance of common aims.

It is only through organization that any nation, any political or religious group of men, any society, has ever gained power and influence to shape conditions according to its own interests—economic interests, ethical interests, political interests or any other interests.

But no organization has ever succeeded without strictly definite aims and principles and application of those aims and principles. All indefinite moves are lost.

Open Forums where any indefinite thinker and crank may unload his mental garbage will never lead to the final victory of Rationalism in this country.

We must have a definite program, and boldly assert it.

2. Furthermore, Rationalists, Freethinkers and Monists in this present stage of transition from superstition to Monism utterly fail to encourage propaganda work, or make it possible for the exponents of their cause to live and keep up the propaganda.

They have fought the holy graft of the propagandists of superstition and now suspect every exponent of their cause who might possibly make a few cents on literature, or on the delivery of a lecture, of working for selfish monetary objects. This suspicion leads to the state of affairs where no exponent of Rationalism can be long in the field. After a few years of constant worry over how to support himself and his family, pay railroads, hotels, printers, advertisers, etc., he breaks down, and spends the rest of his life in vain attempts to pay off the debts caused by the "foolishly idealistic period of his life."

Now we shall admit the possibility of one or two saving propagandists among thousands succeeding in making a few hundred dollars or even securing a free home for their old age, in the event of better encouragement from their fellow thinkers. But what of it? Who would be hurt by it? Shall we continue to discourage—yes, make nearly impossible—propaganda work for our cause, only to prevent an exponent of Rationalism from finally reaching the stage where his energy can be turned from constant worry and entirely bent upon his work for a wiser and happier humanity?

It is absolutely necessary that we establish a bureau of extension and propaganda if we want ever to have that position in the structure of our society which our cause deserves.

3. Finally, the third cause of our lack of progress is narrow, small, selfish cowardice—the fear that we may not succeed in gathering dollars, powers or honor if we do not dissimulate. It may ruin the business, the political prospects and forfeit the esteem of our fellow citizens, neighbors and relatives.

Robert Ingersoll and other famous exponents of Freethought were not afraid that the propaganda might hurt them. They shouted the truth from the house tops and still succeeded in life.

It is just because we are so shy that people disrespect us. If we boldly asserted ourselves in great, strong organizations we should be more respected than even the Catholic church, which rules simply by her organization, not by the mental merits of Polish, Italian, Slovenian, German and Irish Catholics.

While the powers of darkness are working day and night, employing thousands of propagandists—Rockefeller now financing Billy Sunday's campaign in a city where he reaches as many people as elsewhere in seven states of medium size; while all energy of the superstitionists is at work to again impose upon the civilization of the twentieth century the stunting hypnosis of the medieval ages, the Rationalists seem to be satisfied with looking on, thus the progressive mental current again is stagnated, and to our children is left the fetid atmosphere of a mouldering and decaying civilization arising out of graves that should be well covered.

This is the situation to-day. Shall this situation remain?

A Blasphemy Prosecution Fails.

The Daily Gazette (March 3) of Waukegan, Ill., reports the acquittal of the defendant in a notable blasphemy trial just held there. The accused was defended by Frederick Mains, Esq., who was formerly associated with W. H. Maples in the publication of the Freethought Beacon in Chicago. The Gazette report says:

Michael X. Mockus, Freethought lecturer, whose arrest some weeks ago after delivering an address at the Lithuanian hall on the South side attacking the ethics of Christianity, stirred the city, was released unconditionally from the charge of "blasphemy" in the county court through the decision handed down by Judge Perry L. Persons today. The charge had been filed by State's Attorney James G. Welch and the case as a whole was one of the most unusual ever tried in a court in this state.

County Judge Persons based his decision on the privileges of free speech and religious thought. He sustained the motion to quash the case, put by Attorney Frederick Mains, representing Mockus, on the grounds that the common law offense of blasphemy is not an offense subject to punishment or prosecution.

Assistant State's Attorney John Welch in a statement today inferred that the case may be brought to the attention of the grand jury. When asked by a reporter as to the stand of that office, he said:

"Judge Persons has spoken; the grand jury for the March term meets Monday next."

The decision in the case in part is as follows:

"This motion, while admitting for the purpose of the argument, the allegations stated in the information, questions the sufficiency in law of the information in this case as now amended, by which the defendant Mockus is charged with the offense of blasphemy, so called. It is conceded that no legislative inhibition against blasphemy exists in this state; that this information is based on the common law of England in force in so far as not abrogated by constitutional limitation or statute; that in this state no governmental or state religion exists as such; that the separation of church and state is absolute; and that this case both in the charge made and as to the facts alleged, is without a precedent in our Appellate courts and Supreme court.

"The court has carefully considered the exhaustive argument of the defense and the able reply of the assistant State's Attorney, and the very nature of the offense charged involves the consideration by a court of the question of religion in its relation, if any, to the commonwealth, and I have been aided in arriving at our conclusion as to the merits of this motion by certain expressions of our Supreme Court in its opinion, in the case of the People vs. Board of Education, 245 Illinois. The court says, on page 340, concerning the religious freedom enjoyed by all citizens of the commonwealth: 'The enjoyment of religious worship includes freedom not to worship,' and again on page 341, continuing, reference is made to an act at one time pending in the Virginia legislature: 'In the very nature of things religion or the duty we owe the Creator is not within the cognizance of civil magistrates; to intrude his powers into the field of opinion and to restrain the profession or propagation on the supposition of their ill tendency, is a dangerous fallacy which at once destroys all religious liberty,' and again, 'It is time enough for the rightful purpose of civil government for its officers to interfere when the principals break out into overt acts against peace and good order.'"

"In these two sentences," says the Supreme Court of the United States, "is found the true distinction between what properly belongs to the church and what to the state." Again on page 349, in the same opinion, our Supreme Court continues: 'It is true that this is a Christian state; the great majority of its people adhere to the Christian religion, but the law knows no distinction between the pagan, the Protestant and the Catholic. All are citizens; their civil rights are precisely equal; the law cannot see the irreligious differences because the Constitution has definitely and completely excluded religion. In considering men's rights there can be no distinction based on religion. All sects, religious or even non-religious, stand on an equal footing.' Again, on page 346, the court says: 'The importance of men's religious opinion and difficulties is for their own and not for a court's determination; with such difficulties, whether important or unimportant, the courts or governments have no right to interfere; it is not a question by the court what religion or what sect is right; that is not a judicial question; all stand equal before the law, the Protestant, Catholic, Mormon, Mohammedan, the Jew, the Freethinker, the Atheist. Whatever may be the view of the majority of the people the court has no right and the majority has no right to force that view upon the minority, however small.'

"If our Supreme Court is correct, would not the Jew, lawfully, honestly and freely expressing his opinion that Christ was an impostor, in the language of this opinion subject him to the same charge of blasphemy now against this defendant?"

"The exact offense with which the defendant is charged in this case is that he spoke certain blasphemous words, which I do not care to repeat, maligning Jesus Christ, and notwithstanding his conduct in so doing, reprehensible as it may seem to many of us, in the use of the scurrilous language attributed to him, under the law, in our judgment, the defendant cannot be held for trial on the charge of blasphemy standing alone, unaccompanied by acts of violence or other breach of the peace. From my earliest recollection, my environment has been such that I cannot refrain from saying that I regret that this is true, but the common law offense of blasphemy under the law in this state is not an offense subject to punishment or prosecution, and the judgment of the court is that the motion to quash is sustained, the defendant discharged, and the sureties on his bond released."

The Love of God.

Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth: which is one of the things I like least about God. If I love anybody especially well, I try my best to treat him especially well. I want to see him enjoy himself. I want him to be happy. Not so with God, and not so with the Godly. I wish there weren't so many godly people on earth and we could have a lot better time. God loved Job so well that he sent him a cargo of boils. He loved his only begotten Son so well that he had him crucified. All of which is strictly God's business, and I do not presume to interfere. But can't He make us miserable enough without our having to play the same game on each other too? "This hurts me more than it does you," sainted parents used to say, as a prelude to whaling the tar out of their offspring. I liked the attitude of the children far better. Uniformly, in my observations, they were broad-minded in the matter. They were willing to accept the statement at its face value and call the whole proceeding off. That, doubtless, was because of their being totally depraved. Like me. Like all of us who want to see everybody happy. I wish everybody were totally depraved: Sanctified people are such nuisances. They love their neighbors as themselves: but they hate themselves, and it doesn't take much higher mathematics to see where the neighbors get off.—C. W. Wood.

What Makes a Man.

A truthful soul, a loving mind,
Full of affection for its kind;
A spirit firm, erect and free,
That never basely bends the knee;
That will not bear a feather's weight
Of Slavery's chain for small or great;
That truly speaks from good within;
That never makes a league with sin;
That snaps the fetters despots make,
And loves the truth for its own sake;
That honors righteousness alone,
And bows with pride before its throne;
And trembles at no tyrant's nod,
Or man or angel, priest or god;
And thus can smile at curse or ban;
This is the soul that makes a man.

To Harrisburg Freethinkers.

Mr. Franklyn H. W. Hollenbaugh of 1820 No. Third street, Harrisburg, Pa., would like to hear from Freethinkers in his vicinity with a view to organizing a society.

The Freethought Badge Pin gives ardor to the sentiments that inspire Freethinkers. Mr. D. L. McCabe of Seden, Kansas, who recently procured one, writes that he cannot help expressing his great satisfaction and appreciation of it. "Even to look at it," says Mr. McCabe, "is an inspiration to keep fighting for the truth." So the pin carries its own recommendation.

NOTES AT LARGE.

Although it is stated that 90 per cent. of the people of Mexico are Roman Catholics, the new constitution of the country contains some extremely radical provisions against the encroachments of the church. Correspondence of the Cincinnati Enquirer from the City of Mexico tells how freedom from ecclesiastical oppression is safeguarded:

"Strict government regulation of the church is provided for in the new constitution. All ministers of whatever cult must be Mexicans by birth. This regulation will cause removal from their pastorates of about 2,500 Spanish priests. There are few American ministers in Mexico at the present time, probably less than ten. English and German clergymen are equally few, but there are quite a number of Frenchmen among the Catholic clergy of Mexico.

"No minister of any cult will be permitted to teach in the public schools, and only may give instruction in the higher grades of the private schools, nor may any religious sect be permitted to establish or direct schools of primary instruction.

"The constitution states that the state cannot recognize any compact which will tend to lower, lose or sacrifice the liberty of man, either through work, education or religious vow, and that therefore the law will not tolerate monastic orders nor permit the establishment of such by any denomination for whatever object.

"Every man will have the liberty to profess the religious belief of his desire and to practice the ceremonies and devotions of that religion in the churches or in his private house, and this shall not be considered a misdemeanor punishable by law. All public religious observances shall be celebrated within the churches, which always shall be under the vigilance of the authorities.

"Marriage is to be regarded as a civil contract. The simple promise to speak the truth and assume the obligations is sufficient to constitute marriage. The law will not recognize the personality of any sect. Ministers will be considered as professional men and subject to the laws and regulations governing professional men. The state legislatures, according to local needs, will regulate the maximum number of ministers of each cult within their states. Ministers in public reunion or formal private meetings or in the acts of the cult or in religious propaganda shall not criticize the fundamental laws of the country, the authorities in particular, or the government in general. They shall not have the right to vote or to be voted for, nor the right to associate themselves in political affairs."

The constitution is in harmony with the constitution drawn in 1857 by Jaurez, who first attempted the establishment of religious liberty in Mexico, with modifications which President Rojas of the Assembly says are the result of the mature experience of Carranza. The church in the past has overreached itself, and now loses all as the result of trying to grab too much.

The ideas which the meandering mind of Scott Nearing impels him to voice, and which led to his removal as an instructor at the University of Pennsylvania, have proved harmless to his career as teacher in the University of Toledo, Ohio, where the faculty gave him all the academic freedom he wished to exercise. Nevertheless Mr. Nearing has resigned from the Toledo University. The resignation, in some way connected with what Nearing chose to say regarding President Wilson's international policy, would have passed off peacefully if the Rev. Father O'Brien had not seized upon the event to advertise himself as a patriot. We quote from a Toledo dispatch dated March 10:

"Let Scott Nearing or any other pacifist insult the flag and I, a priest, past threescore and ten, will knock him down."

"That challenge from the Rev. Patrick O'Brien was credited to-day as the indirect cause of Nearing's resignation. Nearing had been conducting peace meetings, declaring the 'right of the people to alter or abolish the government if it no longer represented the people.'

"Father O'Brien's challenge was delivered in an address welcoming home Toledo's cavalry troop.

"I challenge Scott Nearing to a debate or a fight on the question of patriotism. God forgive me—it is un-Christian—but I feel like taking him by the nape of the neck and hanging him to the nearest tree!" cried Father O'Brien."

The Rev. Father O'Brien's harangue is a manifestation, not of the spirit of patriotism, but of lynching. The Catholic has become so accustomed to attesting his loyalty to his church in this way that he has no other method of expressing himself.

It is impossible that man should become much better than the God he really worships. But the popular idea of God to-day is not so good as the highest type of man. His thoughts are not so high as our thoughts, nor his ways so loving as our ways. Men are perpetually wishing that he was better, and praying to him to be better and kinder than he is. Humanity stands back to the light, looks towards the past, and bends in worship before a crystallized and mummified ideal of barbaric times. No good man would think of defending the God of the popular creeds if he were found in any other religion than Christianity. Tradition has sanctified him, and made us afraid of him.

But he is only an idol. Man's true god is his own best nature, sublimated and idealized, which is constantly beckoning him on and up along the living ways of this living universe. To be a friend of this god is to be an Atheist towards the lower and imperfect deistic-ideals of the past. This is the glory of Atheism: that, at the cost of contumely and persecution and the scorn of the time, men have dared, and still dare, to listen to the word that comes to every honest investigator of truth, "Speak to the children of men, that they go forward!" Thus, it has come to pass that almost all the greatest and best men of history, those whose names stand for new advances, have been cast out by their age. It seems strange that the world does not learn the lesson. As Peschel once said: "The true creator, because he had acted on the plan pointed out by Copernicus rather than that of Ptolemy, was placed on the Index in the person of those who had made known his system of worlds." And once more to-day the true creator is scouted and ridiculed in the persons of Darwin, Huxley, Haeckel and others, because he did not make the world and man after the fashion that an unknown, barbaric Hebrew laid down for him.

The lawyer, or "barrister," who defended the persons—two women and one man—convicted in London of conspiring to murder the British prime minister and another official by the use of poison, astonished the court by demanding for the defendants a "trial by ordeal." The court did not seriously entertain the proposition. Trial by ordeal was abandoned in England in the thirteenth century. Its usual form is described in a "History of Crime in England" by Luke Owen Pike, which we find quoted in the Sun, as follows:

"When the test was to be applied the prisoner was conducted into the church. The spectators were divided into two lines, in which the numbers were equal. One line was ranged on one side of the church, the other on the other, one representing nominally the friends of the accused, the other the friends of the accuser. Between them, in the centre of the church, blazed the fire which was to purge or to blacken. All who were present were expected to be fasting and in a state of chastity. The priest passed up and down, sprinkling each with holy water, giving each holy water to taste. To each he offered the Book of the Word, and the Holy Rood, to kiss. Meanwhile the vessel of ordeal, filled with water, had been set over the fire. Four arbiters, two chosen from either side, pronounced in due time that the water boiled—that the hour was come. The rest of the congregation, who had hitherto preserved a solemn silence, now joined in praying to Almighty God that he would make known his will in the issue. The accused advanced to the place of trial, his arm and hand swathed in fold upon fold of cloth or linen. At the bottom of the vessel, at elbow depth, was a stone. This he had to snatch away unscathed himself, if he could, when perhaps he was half blinded by the smoke from the burning wood, by the steam from the seething caldron, and by the fears which must have oppressed him, whether innocent or guilty."

The guilt or innocence of the accused was determined three days later, when the bandages were removed from the hand and arm, "Any trace of the scald doomed him to punishment, which was usually death." It does not appear that the ordeal took place outside the church, and the church itself was impelled formally to abolish it, finding a substitute for its atrocities in the continued torture and burning of heretics.

A great disappointment has come to our contemporary, Mr. Windle of Brann's Iconoclast. Mr. Windle has long championed the Roman Catholic church against the anticlerical Menace and Yellow Jacket, and has at the same time run the hottest antiprohibition journal in the United States. And yet here comes Colonel P. H. Callahan, high in the Knights of Columbus and chairman of that Catholic organization's Commission on Religious Prejudice, and remarks:

"It is with keen enjoyment that I read the Yellow Jacket or the Menace as compared to my mental feelings when I read the Iconoclast, and realize how Catholics are having their legs pulled. This paper is an organ of the liquor interests, living on the reputation of Brann, its former editor, who boasted of infidelity. It fights Prohibition, and throws a sop to Catholics occasionally in the form of criticism of the Menace, just to keep them on the side of the liquor interests."

That must be very painful to Mr. Windle, after he has alienated many liberal-minded persons who might put up with his antiprohibition if he would not try to boost and vindicate the Catholic church. In fact, he does not try to conceal his chagrin, but devotes pages of his paper to showing that he has served the church and its cause when he serves the liquor interests. Here is his declaration:

"A. P. Aism and prohibition go hand in hand. They mean intolerance. They stand for intolerance. Catholicism means liberality of opinion, sentiment and practice."

And after that, and even before that, Colonel Callahan, a representative Catholic, says the Iconoclast is more offensive to him than the Menace. We have always said that Rome never shows gratitude for favors. It uses and punishes, but does not reward.

A Catholic newspaper quotes the following:

"Let me ask if it is not allowing too much freedom to Roman Catholic priests to allow them to say that persons married by anyone but a priest of the Roman Catholic church are not married at all, but are living in concubinage?"—TRUTH SEEKER, New York.

Then the Catholic paper says:

"As a seeker after truth, take it from us that Catholic priests say no such absurd things."

They do say such absurd things, however. We received some time ago a letter from a man living in New Jersey who had married a Catholic woman without the services of a priest and who said the local priest had told his wife that she was living in concubinage and that their children were illegitimate. The paragraph from THE TRUTH SEEKER was written by Mr. Washburn. He did not affirm that all persons not married by a priest are regarded by the church as living in concubinage; perchance the marriage of baptized persons by a Protestant clergyman is conceded by the priests to be binding. Absence of baptism nullifies the marriage, which the church can only pronounce an illicit union. It is on this ground of no baptism that the pope, who divorces nobody, pronounces marriages invalid. We recall the San Francisco case where a Catholic girl who had married an unbaptized Protestant was told by her priest that she was only her so-called husband's mistress, and the bridegroom went and gave the priest a thrashing. The actual teaching of the church regarding marriage is as absurd as anyone could make it appear by misrepresenting it.

The birth control bills introduced in the New York legislature were killed in the Assembly Committee on Codes, "on religious grounds," it is reported. "The chief opposition to the bills," said the Evening Sun reporter, "has been voiced by Roman Catholics." The State Medical Society was also represented in the opposition. Dr. William Robinson, of this city, who was there to advocate the measures, said that "physicians were opposed to birth control because it would reduce their incomes." He might have said the same of the priests. Former President Roosevelt sent a letter expressing the hope that no bill to legalize the dissemination of birth control literature would be passed. He is afraid there will be a shortage of cannon fodder. That devout worshiper of the past and its abuses of freedom, Canon William Sheafe Chase of Brooklyn, was present to say that "birth control is a materialistic philosophy that ignores God"—which we believe is the objection urged by Mr. Gladstone fifty years ago against acceptance of the doctrine of evolution. The same argument was used aforesaid against raising an umbrella when it rained. Most reforms are, like this one, turned back "on religious grounds." There are still, however, a considerable number of reformers who profess to disbelieve that religion retains any influence, and who think that time and energy devoted to lessening such suppositious influence are wasted. Their delusion remains fixed even when their own publications are kept off the newsstands "on religious grounds."

We may have been overhasty in acquitting of anything worse than unthinking zeal the Rev. Frederic A. Gould of the Mount Washington Methodist Episcopal church, Pittsburgh, Pa., of whose unfortunate experience we made note on March 10. The Pittsburgh police raided a disorderly house occupied by colored women and found the reverend gentleman on the premises. To his family and congregation he explained that he was seeking first-hand evidence of vice with a view to suppressing it, but the acting police lieutenant, one James L. Hoban, who took the Rev. Gould into custody, reported to headquarters: "I found this man in a bedroom trying to hide in the rear of a trunk. I pulled him from the rear of the trunk. He was then putting on his coat. I said to him, 'What are you doing in this place?' and he said, 'The same as any other man. I gave one of these women a dollar.' I told him the sergeant would notify his friends, and he said, 'I do not want my friends to know about it.'" A wrong inference might be drawn from the Rev. Mr. Gould's statement that he was only an amateur sociologist in search of atmosphere.

As the discussion over the permissibility of lying proceeds, more divine authority for the practice is adduced. A newspaper correspondent cites the thirty-eighth chapter of Jeremiah, where it is related that "the prophet Jeremiah had urged the king to surrender Jerusalem to the Babylonians, a most unpopular course, but best under the circumstances. Zedekiah was afraid of having his words known, and required of Jeremiah a promise to give an untruthful answer if questioned. Jeremiah apparently made no objection, and when afterward questioned did plainly and unmistakably lie. Moreover, the scripture does not appear to condemn it. The untruth prospered, 'for the matter was not perceived.' 'So Jeremiah was there when Jerusalem was taken.'" The permission to lie when the truth will not answer the purpose seems to countenance the clergy in maintaining what they know is not true, which is a necessity to the religious propaganda. They justify a falsehood if they think it contains a moral lesson—as though a lie could be moral, or morality dependent on lying could be sound. Men support the church, although they do not believe in its religion, because, they say, it is "doing good work." But the man of perfect integrity will no more excuse and palliate the false because it is associated with good works than he will condone a crime because the criminal makes charitable use of a fraction of the goods got by theft or false pretense.

Last year, whenever an anticlerical orator was allowed the exercise of free speech, or when the government declined to interfere in behalf of the priests of Mexico, "sixteen million" Catholics were "insulted." This year the affront will be felt and resented by seventeen millions plus, that being the number of Catholics in the United States according to the Official Catholic Directory just published. Confidence in these figures is withheld by Dr. H. K. Carroll, who compiles religious statistics for the government census. But figures are said to lack the gift of lying. The number of so-called secular priests and the number of Catholic parishes in the country are practically the same, some fifteen thousand; and as a consequence, according to the veracious figures of the Official Directory, the average number of Catholics to the parish is above eleven hundred, and the average priest must care for the same number of souls. It is presumed that the parishes and priests have been correctly counted, but the adherents are likely to have been numbered in about the same way that political parties cast up their majorities before election.

A bill before the New York legislature at Albany proposes to repeal the charter of the Rockefeller Foundation, which has funds amounting to more than one hundred millions of dollars ostensibly set apart for educational and kindred purposes, and untaxed. It has been alleged that the funds are bestowed in such a way that they may be withdrawn at any time and restored to the Rockefeller interests, and suspicion is expressed that the vast sum was given the name it bears in order to evade taxation. The administration of the concern is secular or Protestant, and the Foundation is attacked frequently by the priests. The names of the sponsors for the repeal bill in the legislature—Boylan and Callahan—suggest that it has been framed as a Catholic measure and is so inspired.

The Boston daily papers gave generous space to the golden wedding celebration of our friends Mr. and Mrs. Michael T. Rush recently had in Paine Hall, Boston. The reports in the Evening Record, the Globe and the Herald are embellished with photographs of the venerable and respected couple. When Mr. Rush posed for the likeness, he held a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER in his right hand, as the photographer's specimen shows, but the newspapers cropped the picture too high to get us into their illustrations. The golden wedding was a memorable affair, and Mr. Rush did not permit the reporters to leave out the fact that he tries to be one of the foremost workers in Dr. Bland's Freethought Society.

When the war spirit is aroused in Christians, the non-resistant doctrines of Jesus are suppressed, and the opposite are popular. "Think not that I come to send peace" is sure of applause at a preparedness meeting. "He that hath no sword, let him buy one," is also a favorite, while "They that take the sword shall perish with the sword" has lost its warning. It is strange that the people who are quoting Jesus, as they think, cannot perceive that these contradictory doctrines were not uttered by any sane man, and that they are of such uncertain origin as to carry no authority to anybody at any time.

All love is sweet, given or returned
They who inspire it most, are fortunate,
But those who feel it most, are happier still.

POLITICAL PRINCIPLES.

(THE NINE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.)

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in the Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privileges or advantages shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

MONISM AND GRAVITATION.

From J. R. Perry, Pennsylvania.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Our friend, Chas. W. Russell, after a long absence, makes his appearance again on the subject of advanced Monism.

It seems to me that he has partly abandoned one of his primary propositions, advocated a year or so ago. He and Mr. Schwalm ascribed gravitation to the "push and pull" resident in the universal ether, which is constantly in "violent motion" of tiny portions in the form of a whirl, which creates the unit of material substances, the electrons, and that all matter forms are nothing else than electrons, in their composition.

If all matter forms are derived from the primal ether, I suppose there must have been a time when no matter forms existed; and hence, there may be immense spaces where no matter forms as yet exist, as an eternity was not a sufficiently long time to evolve or whirl them into existence.

Mr. Russell has not improved in the line of logical clarity of reasoning. He says: "Only motion offers resistance to motion, and it is in this fact that we find the solution of the great problem of gravitation."

Such a statement is opposed to fact and observation. If a dog and a cart are standing still, there is no motion of either; but when the dog pulls the cart, motion is the result. They move along to another part of the street. Motion is a resultant of the push, pull, or energy in moving matter, and not a cause. In what sense can one motion offer resistance to another motion? A substance and its impelling force or energy may and does resist other substances and energies, but motions, never. Motion is an effect of a cause, or causes, but in itself has no power of resistance. Substance produces motion, motion produces no substance. Motion cannot exist without something moves.

He asserts again: "Gravitation is a push or a pull. You cannot see that the ether substance alone can transmit either a push or a pull. How can it? To transmit a pull, since it is a fluid, it will have to shorten up, or occupy less space between any two objects." Again he says: "The ether substance cannot flow and it cannot shorten up." How does he know this? The tides of the ocean flow by attraction, and shorten up, and sometimes are flattened out and forced apart, when sun and moon act in conjunction or the contrary. And does the earth and moon in order to exercise gravitational force, or that of any planetary bodies, "shorten up"? It is more than probable that the momentum of plastic revolving bodies flatten their polar axis, and extend their equatorial dimensions until momentum and solidity are equalized.

I would like Mr. Russell to show us how any motion can take place, unaccompanied by material substance. And if a motion can exist unless something is being moved. The hypothesis of modern Monism, that an electron is the result of a tiny whirl of ether, that the ether is the primal universal substance, and that all material matter forms are composed of electrons, and nothing but electrons, and yet that an electron is the unit of matter, but is not matter in its essential qualities, are all contradictory assumptions. If the primary substance is the universal ether, and ether is the cause of the electron by some violent motion of this substance, then why in the name of logic and common sense is an electron not matter also? If an electron is not matter, how can all matter forms be composed of electrons and of nothing else? Where in the process of evolution from ether to matter forms, does this universal substance become no substance, and then magically change into all kinds of material and organic matter forms? Will somebody in plain common language elucidate this Monistic conundrum? If modern advanced Monism ever becomes a popular doctrine, the contradictory statements, as now made, must be eliminated, and the brain-racking propositions reconciled into a logical harmony to be easily comprehended.

Mr. Russell has concluded that, as the ether substance cannot flow, or "shorten up," there must be something else in the ether, stored up, which is the cause of gravitation. So he says it is the "motion or energy" stored up that causes gravitation. Whoever heard of "stored up motion"? There is no doubt of stored up energy, such as electricity stored up in storage batteries. This energy or latent force, having been put there by an equal quantity of frictional energy; but who since the reign of Julius Caesar has ever heard of "stored up motion"? Is there no difference between energy and motion?

Mr. Russell proposes to publish a book which he has named "The World Riddle and Its Solution." I would suggest that he first of all expound how motion can be stored up; and if the process is not too costly, it might furnish for us what all the combustion of matter forms, and chemical forces, have thus far failed to accomplish, a motive power. He says: "The motion stored in the ether substance offers resistance to every phase of motion with which it is in step." Here we have motion, a resultant of matter, and not matter in any sense, offering resistance to every phase of motion with which it is in step. Motion is not matter, it is not energy. You might as well argue that the boxer's motion of his fist knocked his antagonist to the ground instead of the force of his blow.

Again he says: "The space filling substance, both in its primary phase and in its secondary phase, as matter, is in violent motion everywhere."

From this statement we must infer that substance is not matter, as in the ether, but it becomes substance by a violent motion. It is thrown into electrons, and then all substances, or matter forms, are composed of electrons, and yet strange to say electrons are not substance, and yet in spite of this statement, he declares that which no one will dispute, that "something cannot be derived from nothing." And in the same paragraph he says that "motion is known to be as uncreatable as substance." This is a queer statement, when we see that every animate thing, and every inanimate thing, or substance, is constantly causing motion. The fact is that motion is being created continually, by everything that moves, and as motions vary, no two being exactly alike, there is not a thing that moves but what is creating new and different motions.

If the ether is substance, primary or of any sort, then the electron must also be substance of some sort, and if all matter forms are substance, and composed of electrons, the electrons must be substances, or somethings do come from nothings; there is no getting away from this logical deduction. The ether must be substance in a primary state, substance in its second state as the electron, and substance in its third state as matter forms. It cannot go from substance to no substance as an electron, and then by some hocus pocus transformation, go into all matter forms and compose them, if matter forms are substances. Is it not logical to say that the ether is a primary form of matter, the electron a secondary form of matter, and every variety of matter forms, are the third and general forms into which the primary ether has been transformed by means of the inherent energy resident therein.

Upon such a basis, the proofs of modern and advanced Monism might stand, if the evidences of such transformations can be established, or sustained by experiments, and facts, otherwise it must fail as a philosophy or scientific deduction.

To assert that the ether is substance, the electron derived therefrom, not substance, and matter forms composed of electrons are substances, is just as incomprehensible and illogical, as to say that matter was created from nothing, or that something can come from nothing.

The materialist claims that all forms of matter are substantial, are something, are eternal, always existed, in some form, and this is in exact opposition to the phenomenal theory of matter. Mrs. Eddy asserts, and all her predecessors have, that there is no such thing as matter, or materiality; that all is but an expression of God, and that we are simply ideal and not real. A hypothesis may be true or false, but by all means it should rest on a logical basis.

The electron is substance, for the reason that it gives out light and burns, and becomes dissipated or absorbed by the earth, which is a magnetic body. The ether, if it had violent motion and were substance, in some form, would generate heat and light, and yet, if we exhaust a glass tube of all, or nearly all of its air, will be filled with ether. This ether passes directly through the glass. When we take it into the light, we can see through it, but take it into the dark, and this tube of ether becomes invisible. Take it into an ice house and it becomes as cold as ice, put it into a hot house or a furnace, and it becomes of equal temperature, all of which facts do not agree with Mr. Russell's statements. The truth is that heat, light and electricity affect the ether as much as they change other forms of matter. Ether is quiescent, but permeates all forms of matter, and is changed by them.

CHRIST IN THE TRENCHES.

From D. F. Sweetland, Chicago.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Frank Comeford recently lectured at the Anthropological Society; subject, "Christ in the Trenches." Frank is said to be a Catholic; anyway, he takes the church position as to reforms economic. That is, make men religious and moral and they will work out the desired reforms—a sort of indirect action. This side tracks the necessity of having a definite plan or program for the accomplishing the reform needed. This kind of a speech gets the bacon among church people, but is no good for real reformers who demand a definite plan, such as collectivism, full land value taxation, government railroading and banking, etc. Being good gets one but little; being good for something will get you much.

Frank also maintained that if the Christ spirit reigned there would be no trenches. Frank was turned out of the Legislature for calling the other members thieves and liars. Christ called the teachers that went before him the same names—not a very good spirit for a man to exhibit who loved peace.

As to fighting in the trenches, a far better place for him to be would be in the navy. If he could do what the New Testament writers claim, he could locate the submarines, still the waters when a fight was on, or produce a storm to overwhelm the enemy.

He would do better in the commissary, as he could multiply the loaves and fishes and other foodstuffs, which just now are in such great demand.

He could be exceedingly valuable collecting horses for the cavalry with his free method of just sending a man after the horse without money. If there was nobody around, just take the horse; if the horse had a custodian, stand him off with the remark that the boss had need for the horse, and take him without arranging for payment. Most any department of the service would be preferable to trench work for Christ!

SOCIALISM DESTROYING RELIGION.

From Dwight Spencer, Oklahoma.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

There are Socialists and there are Socialists. Some Socialists believe that all that is necessary, to bring about the great change in our social structure, which will usher in the era of peace, health, prosperity and happiness, is just to "get the votes and elect our men." These Socialists don't mind stretching the truth a little sometimes, to gain converts. The following is a pretty good example of what can be done with a mere statement and a bunch of sophistry. The editorial below appeared in a recent issue of the New England (Boston) Leader:

"At an address delivered before the Holy Cross club a week ago, Cardinal O'Connell astonished his hearers with the report that in American schools and colleges today less than 50 per cent. of the educators believe in God, and only 35 per cent. believe in the immortality of the soul.

"Not that we are particularly interested in what people believe or do not believe. That is their individual concern, especially in matters religious or anti-religious.

"No. What we want to ask Cardinal O'Connell is this: We thought it was Socialism that would destroy religion. So Catholic speakers have been saying for decades. And now it appears, does it not, that all the time they have been warning about what Socialism might do, CAPITALISM HAS BEEN DOING IT!

"There is no way out of it. For this immense loss in religious belief Socialism can not be blamed; we haven't Socialism. But we have capitalism, and have it bad. The war is a proof of it. The sordidness of the age is a proof of it. And the terrible figures that the cardinal threw like a bomb into the midst of his hearers are but a symbol of capitalism's work."

Now, let's put aside our zeal for "party victory at the polls" and see if capitalism is the guilty one. Belief in God and in the immortality of the soul is the result of what? Why it is the result of ignorance—ignorance, fear and the tyranny of the vast unknown. Where knowledge begins belief ends. As man carves out of the unknown, the wondrous facts of nature, as he gains courage, conquering slowly the forces in nature, and learns to cooperate with what he can't control, he ceases to need a big papa beyond the stars. The hope for a golden harp and a pair of wings likewise goes the way of the belief in the big papa as man's knowledge and capacity for knowledge increases.

Where is the brain of man developed and the facts of nature taught? In the mills, mines, factories and markets of capitalism? No, not that anyone knows of. It is in the public schools—the socialized schools, that this is done. Was it not here that more than 50 per cent. of the educators lost their belief in God? It was in the public schools that the foundation was laid for the 65 per cent. of the educators to build a real material basis of life upon which totally ignores the "land of spirits." The public school system of this country is not a capitalistic institution. It is not operated for private gain, but rather for public good. It is the most socialistic institution in existence at this time. How can one lay this "great crime" of "destroying religion" on poor old capitalism, if this is true?

SOCIETY IS ALL WRONG.

From E. E. Kusel, California.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

All expressions are merely individual opinions. Mr. Eshleman says my remarks on VIRTUE are the morals of the tenderloin. Did he not see that I uphold purity in girls and unmarried women. I do not want to see the fair sex lead an immoral life (precisely as Mr. E. would have it), but that does not hide the truth contained in my TRUTH SEEKER article. If the editor had not changed a few of my strong points to a more permissible diction there would have been an awful uproar from the galaxy of readers. I most heartily thank the editor for having used the blue pencil.

I never could understand why people condemn the sex nature as immoral and yet uphold the killing of sentient creatures for food. I have always contended that if there ever was a sin it is the eating of flesh. Now, because I criticize the sham of morality as society upholds it, some, of course, will find fault, yet the truth is bound to prevail in spite of my displeasure to opponents.

If Mr. Eshleman really thinks my letter on Morality is ethics of the tenderloin let him kindly turn his mind to the slaughter house where sentient creatures are murdered, and then if the gentleman thinks my letter unmoral he will see that the entire society, with its God, Morality, and Love stuff is very wrong. My hobby for ten years has been to expose the farcicality of religion which talks of purity, modesty and virtue while upholding flesh-eating which involves the slaughter of creatures which have as much right to live as we. The fault is not Kusel's tenderloin ethics but the miserable inconsistency and false ethics in all of us.

Regarding my assertion that a child born out of wedlock is legitimate in the sight of God (Nature), I will state that many a poor girl who has made the sacrifice has grieved over her act and the result on account of the false ideas of society. So long as a father has lovely virtuous daughters he feels exalted and does not want them to read as I had written, but should that father happen to hear of a daughter's mistake which blackens her character, he must look at the moral problem from another angle.

Society is all wrong; it's all wrong, brother.

I now regret having sent in the article even though it was much modified by THE TRUTH SEEKER editor. I am very sorry that Mr. Eshleman took offense.

IS MIND IMMORTAL?

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Is the mind of man immortal?

Can we answer yes or no?

Reason here is all that guides us,

In the way that we should go.

Is the mind of man immortal?

Is the question frank and plain?

Ask the wise man or the foolish,

And the answer is the same.

Is the mind of man immortal?

Come the questions thick and fast;

But you'll find there is no answer,

To the last.

Is the mind of man immortal?

Ask your comrades gone before;

They will answer just in silence,—

Nothing more.

Is the mind of man immortal?

All the world has tried to know;

But the proof is sadly lacking,

As it was long years ago.

Is the mind of man immortal?

When the body's underground?

Ask the hills that seem eternal,

But no answer—not a sound.

Is the mind of man immortal?

Who can penetrate the gloom?

Every effort meets with silence,

Just as silent as the tomb.

Is the mind of man immortal?

Ask your friends or ask your foes;

But the power that rules above us,

Is the only one that knows.

AN OLD SOLDIER WRITES.

From J. N. P. Lee, Tennessee.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Comrades of THE TRUTH SEEKER—

Greeting: Several of us old comrades in Company A have great fun all to ourselves, principally, and to all we can get to look at the paper in general, and hear and see and feel the run of expressions the old boys utter at the ludicrous side of Christianity that the present phases of it express. It's a great side show. The movies are not in it, spectacularly. Sure enough, the old TRUTH SEEKER is at once the most amusing, instructive, and generally educative newspaper in existence. How the preachers do hate it. Yet all of them praise such jumping-Jacks as Billy Sunday.

I wonder if the God-fearing folks of New England are any in advance of their great grandfolds who tore down forty rods of prime chestnut rails, built a pyre of them, caught a fine rooster that had been egregiously accused of being possessed of witches, and set fire to that pyre of fine rails, burnt them, and the innocent rooster tied on its summit.

INGERSOLL'S REVIVAL.

There was a child born on the earth,

Who made sky-pilots fall;

They failed to comprehend his worth,

So damned Bob Ingersoll.

When his rich voice at last was stilled,

By Death's relentless call;

Their hearts were with rejoicing filled,

For dumb Bob Ingersoll.

He speaketh yet, by printer's ink,

To such as read at all;

He makes the pews wake up and think,

And praise Bob Ingersoll.

Recanting priests have changed their tune,

They've lost most all their gall;

Sent half their taked book "up the flume,"

And quote Bob Ingersoll.

The people now more clearly see,

And sing in chorus all,

"The Declaration of the Free,"

By Robert Ingersoll.

Then let this fact be understood,—

Tho' there's no God at all;

Keep Truth and Love because they're good.

Like Robert Ingersoll.

JOHN PRESCOTT GUILD.

INTELLECT AND SEX EMPHASIS.

In your issue of December 9, 1916, Miss Mary Monico seems to think that celibacy has an injurious effect on the mental abilities of men and women. "They are incomplete, and their physical needs being unsupplied, their mental abilities accordingly suffer," she says. I am of opinion that men like Immanuel Kant, Herbert Spencer and Sir Isaac Newton did not waste much, if any, time in the way indicated. In what way did their mental abilities suffer. As I understand it from those who are considered competent to give an opinion, Sir Isaac Newton was the greatest scientist the world ever produced. Herbert Spencer's "Synthetic Philosophy" has to some extent influenced the legislation of the civilized world, and Kant was the greatest thinker the world has ever seen. I am not a well read man by any means, but I think it is H. Campbell-Black in his "Human Anatomy and Physiology" who says that the sex impulse is more psychical than physical. Lester Ward in his "Pure Sociology"—I think it is in chapter XIV—says in effect that amorous men are not very well fitted for business, amorous women cannot perform social duties, and both are unfitted for intellectual pursuits. (I quote from memory, and apologize if I have quoted wrongly.)

Can it be that some of us men who abstained from marrying because we did not relish the idea of bringing children into the world to face the merciless, ever present competition, have been doing ourselves, and perhaps society, an injustice, or an injury? There are other very prominent scientists alive at the present day who, if we reason by analogy, did not attach much importance to sexual intercourse. Did "their mental abilities accordingly suffer"?

I have traveled somewhat extensively in different countries in the old world and the new, and as far as I could observe it was always the people who did not abstain who seemed to me to be mentally and physically inferior. I can name one place where if a girl is not married when she is 20 years of age, she is practically an old maid. As these people have knowledge of "good and evil" at an early age, one would imagine that they would be complete, as their physical needs would be supplied, and their mental abilities would not suffer.

Such is not the case, as the people I have in mind are among the "dumbest" on the face of the earth; and although they are surrounded by a great many natural resources, they are either too indolent, or too ignorant, or both, to take advantage of them.

KAIKOURA.

GOLDEN WEDDING ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION OF MR. AND MRS. MICHAEL T. RUSH.

An event of great interest to Boston Freethinkers was the golden wedding anniversary celebration of Mr. and Mrs. Michael T. Rush, held at Paine Memorial Hall on the evening of Thursday, March 1.

The hall where Mr. Rush has attended Freethought meetings for the last thirty-four years was gaily decorated with flags and bunting, and presented a festive appearance befitting the joyous occasion. An orchestra on the platform supplied charming music, and the celebration was a success from start to finish.

The banquet itself, which was greatly enjoyed by all, was followed by speeches. Mr. Edwin M. White officiated as toastmaster, and in the course of the evening called upon many of the friends of Mr. and Mrs. Rush, among whom were: Mr. Alfred Williams, Mr. James A. Beatty, Mr. Ballou, Mr. Fraser, Dr. Rufus K. Noyes, and Miss Mosher. Mr. J. J. Sullivan extended congratulations as representative of Ford Hall, and letters were read from Rationalist friends from coast to coast.

On behalf of the guests, Mr. White presented Mr. and Mrs. Rush with a purse of $200 in gold, Mr. Rush responding.

The host and hostess were born and married in England, coming to Boston in 1883.

Among those present were: Dr. John D. Taylor, J. P. Bland, Dr. Elizabeth Abbie, Mrs. Russell, Miss Ford, Mrs. G. W. Coleman, Miss Smith.

LEVI G. BARNES.

From Franklin Steiner, New York.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Levi G. Barnes died at his home, 1032 E. Sixth street, Des Moines, Iowa, on January 20, 1917. Had he lived until next August he would have been ninety-one years old. Mr. Barnes was perhaps the oldest subscriber on THE TRUTH SEEKER list, he having taken the paper while it was yet published in Paris, Illinois, and with the exception of one or two issues, has received every number since.

My last interview with Mr. Barnes was held early in April, 1916. I found him with a mind as clear as that of any man of fifty years, and he could read THE TRUTH SEEKER without glasses. An accident a few years ago prevented his going about, much to his regret. He was a native of Illinois, where, near the town of Geneseo, he owned a large farm. For over twenty years he spent a large part of his time in Des Moines, where he had property interests. A widow survives him. There were no children. A Des Moines paper said: "The floral offerings of the neighbors was an expression of the approval of a life well spent."

Mr. Barnes was buried at Le Claire, Iowa. There was no religious ceremony, but his nephew, R. M. Barnes, of Lincoln, Illinois, delivered a eulogy at the grave. Mr. Barnes was a reader and had a well selected library. On all proper occasions, during his long life of over nine decades, he never failed to openly take a stand for Freethought, which he not only advocated, but lived. As one who knew Levi G. Barnes well, I will say that an acquaintance with him was to be greatly prized and will not be forgotten.

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

Stephen Pearl Andrews, March 22, 1812—
May 21, 1886.

A Freethinker who led an active life that reads like a romance was Stephen Pearl Andrews. He was born in Templeton, Mass., March 22, 1812, the son of a Baptist minister, the Rev. Elisha Andrews. He received his education at Amherst, after which at the age of nineteen he went to Louisiana, where he studied law, supporting himself by teaching Latin and Greek. In 1839 he removed to Houston, Texas, and, entering upon legal practice, soon stood at the head of the bar. Being an Abolitionist, in 1843 he was mobbed at midnight, and told that he would be hanged if he did not leave the town within an hour. He went to England and there tried to interest the British Anti-Slavery Society in an effort to free the slaves of Texas by purchase. He was unsuccessful, however, and returned to Boston. Here he soon became an anti-slavery leader. In England, Mr. Andrews learned phonography, then in its infancy, and was the founder of the present system of shorthand reporting. Here he perhaps rendered his greatest practical service to the world. In 1847 he removed to New York city where, in conjunction with Augustus F. Boyle, he published two books and edited two journals in the interest of phonography and spelling reform. He understood thirty-two languages, some of which he spoke fluently, besides being a master of Latin, Greek, Sanskrit and Hebrew. When he published "Discoveries in Chinese" in 1854, he obtained the reputation of being the best informed man regarding the Chinese language in the United States. He devised a system of teaching languages and published a "French Instructor" which had a large circulation.

While a young man he conceived the idea of a union of all science and philosophy, which included a universal language. His plan was published in a large book called "The Basic Outline of Universology." His system was neither Communism nor Individualism, but a system of cooperation which he called "Pantarchy." He called the universal language "Alwato." Among the numerous books published by Mr. Andrews not above mentioned are: "Comparison of the Common Law with the Roman, French, or Spanish Civil Law on Entails and Other Limited Property in Real Estate" (1839); "The Constitution of Government in the Sovereignty of the Individual" (1851); "Love, Marriage and Divorce" (1853); "The Great American Crisis" (1863-1864); "The Labor Dollar" (1881); "The Church and Religion of the Future" (1886). He left unpublished works that would fill several volumes. Mr. Andrews was a member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences and the American Ethnological Society. While teaching in a young ladies' seminary he married Mary Ann Gordon, one of the students. They had four sons. Mr. Andrews died in New York city, May 21, 1886.

Other events of which the past two weeks are the anniversary are:

March 11, Charles Sumner died, 1874.
Benjamin West died, 1820.

OTHER DAYS.

Tonight I would be a boy again, care free as the nesting birds,
And hear at eve the tinkling bells in the trail of the homing herds.
Oh, the thrill of the truant swim, and the grapes that hung in the wooded dell,
Where the scholars played through the noonday shade till the sound of the teacher's bell,
When the road of life stretched far away and the skies seemed fresh and fair,
The ardor of youth had never cooled and the call of the world was there.

Forgot are the trials of childhood days, remembered the hours of play,
As a picture lacking the artist's touch looks good from the far away.
But we turn awhile with a cheerful smile to strike a balance fair,
Of the good old days with our present ways in the ledger of Here and There.
We strive in currents of deeper streams, 'neath fruit that hangs full high.
We have larger dreams and greater schemes than we knew in the days gone by;
"So much to do, so little done," in hours that are never long;
Ambition's star shines bright and far and the lure of life is strong.

The golden hours lie not behind, but away toward the setting sun,
And the spirit fills with the eager thrills of a race to be lost or won;
So turn not backward, O Father Time, on the wings of your hasty flight,
But sit awhile beside the hearth in the genial firelight,
While we look through the haze to the olden days, the days that come no more,
But swing with life's pack on a willing back up the road that lies before.

Boys and Girls.

The difference is apparent early: A boy has as much fun in stoning a cat as a girl has in hunting for violets. A boy's curiosity is directed to the ice box; a girl would like to see what is in the top bureau drawer.

A girl can give the impression when away from home that her parents are wealthy; a boy cannot.

Every boy is old enough to be welcome to sit in the neighbor girl's parlor many years before his sister thinks he is old enough to sit in the parlor at home.

A girl is never so young that she will reveal to guests at a party that the spoons are borrowed; a boy child never grows so old that he fails to.

Give a boy a dollar and he will eat it; give his sister one and she will wear it.

A brother and sister may have hair of the same shade, but the boy's is called red and the girl's auburn.

When brothers fight, it is over the larger share of pie; when sisters quarrel, one has worn something belonging to the other without asking permission.—Youth's Companion.

An Accommodating Beau.

Abner was driving to the county fair with his sweetheart when they passed a booth where fresh popcorn was for sale.

"My, Abner, ain't that nice," said the girl.

"Ain't what nice?" asked stupid Abner.

"Why, that popcorn, it smells so awfully good," replied the girl.

"It does smell kind o' fine," drawled the youth. "I'll jest drive a little closer so you can get a better smell."

So Julius Retired.

There are husbands who, among their male companions, like to have it supposed that they are just a little tyrannical at home. One such man, who had two or three friends at his home one night, remarked, as they were smoking and chatting together at a rather late hour:

"Yes, I do what I like at home. My wife, she has to bend to my will, I can tell you. In my own house I'm something of a Julius Cæsar."

His wife came into the room in time to hear this last sentence. The tyrant of his household looked a little uneasy, but his wife neither frowned nor, apparently, paid any attention to the remark. But after a moment she said very positively.

"Gentlemen, it is late, and Julius Cæsar has got to go to bed."

Whereupon the husband arose, stammered his excuses, and retired, leaving his guests to make their way out as best they could.

An Animated Hat.

The following account of a nearsighted old gentleman who lost his hat in a sudden gale appears in the Tatler. The old gentleman started in pursuit of his fast-disappearing headpiece, and finally thought that he saw it in a yard behind a high fence. Scrambling over with great difficulty, he started to chase it, but each time he thought he had caught it it seemed to move away. Then a woman's angry voice broke on his ears.

"What are you doing there?" she demanded shrilly.

He explained mildly that he was only trying to retrieve his hat.

"Your hat!" she said. "Well, I don't know where your hat is; but that's not a hat you're chasing; it's our little black hen!"

The Draft in the Range.

American people have a very high appreciation of the humor of Englishmen, and have been specially tickled by a story Colonel Cody used to tell. He said that some years ago an Englishman who had never been in the West before was his guest. They were riding through a Rocky Mountain canon one day, when suddenly a tremendous gust of wind came swooping down upon them and actually carried the Englishman clean off the wagon-seat. After he had been picked up, he combed the sand and gravel out of his whiskers and said:

"I say! I think you overdo ventilation in this country!"—Tit-Bits.

Not a Adept.

Johnny B—, who has seen eight summers go by, not very long ago developed a fondness for playing "Hookey" from school. After two or three offenses of the kind he was taken to task by his teacher.

"Johnny," she said, "the next time you are absent I want you to bring me an excuse from your father telling me why you were not here."

"I don't want to bring an excuse from father," protested the boy.

"Why not?" asked the teacher, her suspicion plain.

"'Cause father isn't good at making excuses. Mother finds him out every time."

Effective.

Pa—"At last I've found a way to make that young scamp of ours stop winking his eyes."

Ma—"Really?"

Pa—"Yes; I'll show him the article in this science magazine where it says that every time we wink we give the eye a bath."—Buffalo Express.

Helpful Suggestion.

"I haven't noticed Tootles playing in your orchestra lately."

"No; he slipped on the icy sidewalk and broke his clavicle."

"Well, couldn't he get another from the musical instrument dealer?"—Boston Transcript.

Recovery Paid.

In times of peace Smith might have been an author who had drifted into some useful occupation, such as that of a blacksmith, but just now he is cook to the Blankshire officers' mess. Smith sent Murphy into the village to bring home some chickens ordered for the mess.

"Murphy," said Smith, the next day, "when you fetch me chickens again, see that they are fastened up properly. That lot you fetched yesterday all got loose, and though I scoured the village I only managed to secure ten of them."

"'Sh!" said Murphy. "I brought only six."—Tit-Bits.

Structure of the Cow Forbade.

An English militant crusader strolled into a barn when a young man was milking a cow. With a snort she asked: "How is it that you are not at the front, young man?"

"Because, ma'am," answered the milker, "there ain't no milk at that end."—The Ladies' Home Journal.

Lively Grandma.

Grandma said she dropped a stitch;

I didn't see it fall—

I've hunted for it everywhere

And can't find it at all.

Grandma says she's picked it up;

I didn't see her do it.

I guess old folks are pretty spry

If only we just knew it.

—Margaret Mason.

Did Her Best.

Teacher—"Do you know the population of New York?"

Mamie Backrow—"Not all of them, ma'am, but then, we've only lived here two years."—Puck.

THE FREETHOUGHT BADGE PIN

Dedicated to all honest men and women—to those who can and are willing to reason—who constitute the grand army of progressive thinkers throughout the world.

An Emblem of Freedom and Progress

Represents no lodge, order or society, but is designed as a token of recognition for progressive minds of every shade of thought.

All claiming to be free from superstition, all who base their belief upon science and reason, should wear this emblem to speed the grand work of emancipating humanity from the thralldom of mental darkness.

This is conceded by artists and the trade to be the most beautiful Badge ever designed. Being a practical jeweler and designer of emblems of every description, as well as an enthusiastic worker in the cause of human progress, Mr. Wettstein has succeeded in combining in this badge the great want of this age and the future. It represents the Burning Torch of Reason, the Rising Sun of Science and Freethought, beautifully enameled in brilliant colors in contrast with the Night and Darkness of Superstition, enameled in black, and symbolizes the evolution of the world from the Night of Superstition to the Day of Freethought, Science and Reason.

"A pin whose torch and golden sheen,
Would grace the breast of Sheba's queen;
And will lend grace in coming time
To queens of beauty more sublime."
(Impromptu by Elizur Wright.)

As a token of recognition among Liberals of every shade of thought, either at home or abroad, it is especially valuable.

Made in two styles and by best workmen in the most artistic and substantial manner.

Considering amount of gold and artistic workmanship in the badge, no other badges in the world are sold so cheap. They will last for generations to come and increase in popularity and value until fear and superstition exist no more.

Address, The Truth Seeker Co.

THE LETTER BOX.

K. V., New York.—No; a brother's relict.

B. LARSON, Wisconsin.—We would not touch a pencil to so perfect a production, but give it as it was revealed to you.

J. D. TAYLOR, M. D., Massachusetts.—The Study of O. W. Holmes by David Eccles was as good a piece of work as ever contributed to the excellence of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and your use of it as a contribution to the Medical Times shows the best of judgment. The article could not be done over and done better.

J. JOHNSTON, Connecticut.—For the best way to get from Waterbury to the Ferrer colony at Stelton by auto, we must refer you to the map, the Blue Book and Motor Life. From New York the way lies through Jersey City, Elizabeth, Rahway, Metuchen, and so on. Thomas Paine was buried in New Rochelle, N. Y., in 1809 the date of his death; but some ten years later the remains were taken to England by William Cobbett, and their final resting-place is unknown.

C. H. BETTS, Lyons, N. Y.—We have fed our mind on your Washington's birthday address at Canandaigua. You rightly hold that Socialism is not Americanism; it is rather internationalism. And what we define as Americanism would undoubtedly fail to survive the introduction of Socialism. It has been said that the great contribution of the American mind to political theory is the doctrine that there are rights and liberties which should never be subject to abridgement by law; and that the essence of Americanism is the separation of civil and religious interests.

WILLARD BALLAM, Utah.—We have no controversy with readers who do not agree with us regarding the protective function of government; and when a pacifist is still unsatisfied after our reiterated statement that we are for peace at any price, we do not know how to pacify him. Let us stick to our ideals and hold the thought of peace, and if discomfited in circumstances over which we have no control, let us be good losers. There is a time for everything, and the present moment does not seem to be auspicious for aiming at ends not our country's. The trouble will be over the sooner if we all face one way as it approaches.

DONALD McLEAN, Ohio.—Prof. Franklin H. Giddings of Columbia University has written a work on "Democracy and Empire," and while we have not read it we can recommend Professor Giddings' works with confidence. It is to be had for $2.75 by mail. Should this be a more elaborate work than you care for, you might write the professor and inquire where you can get something shorter and easier. We hear that Mr. James F. Morton, Jr., contemplates writing a work on elementary economics, and if he does so you may be sure he will give us also the fundamentals of democracy. Your question as to the meaning of the Greek words "Panta rei ouden menei" does not tax the resources of erudition in this office. They mean that "all things change; nothing remains fixed." The Latin parallel is "Omnia mutantur, nos et mutamur in illis"—all things change, and we change with them.

FLORENCE M. IRVING, North Dakota.—If as your Methodist minister tells his class in sociology the Darwinian theory of the descent of man is not taught in any college, the omission is due to religious prejudice and not to the rejection of the theory of evolution by men of science or the greater number of college instructors. Darwinism is not taught dogmatically in the colleges, but the theory is presented with others and pupils are left to use their own judgment about accepting it. Probably no student leaves any college in this country, except some of the narrowest sectarian institutions, without a knowledge of the Darwinian theory of the descent of man. Does the Methodist minister mean his class to understand that our colleges teach that man was created by God from the dust of the ground, and woman from the rib of the man? Unless he can show that the biblical theory is inculcated by the college instructors, he gains nothing for his faith by stating that Darwinism is not. The part of the Darwinian theory that is questioned by men of science is the adequacy of natural selection as he expounds it to account for the origin of species. Skepticism on this point has been seized upon by the supernaturalists and made the basis of their false claim that Darwinism, or even evolution as a whole, is an exploded theory.

DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

Military Conscription—Why Not Civil?

A year or so ago, Lord Roseberry declared that it would be a horrible result of the European war if conscription should find its way across the Atlantic and take root in the United States. Such a thought was horrible in the eyes of the British earl, but it seems to be acceptable to one ex-President—Taft—and presumably to that other—Roosevelt—to whom the American people owe the sphinx which now adorns the White House.

The conscription feared by the nobleman and desired by the American Ex's is military conscription. For this is the iron age, a war age, a ruthless age. Now what is war? It seems a conflict of cultures. Germany, at least, declared its own culture the needed stimulus for the rest of mankind, and that its aspirations and ideals should dominate. The allies think differently. Hence, the European slaughter of today.

It may be granted that a military spirit strengthens a nation, but military dominance is sure in the long run to ruin it. The captain can train soldiers to deeds which as civilians they would run from. The soldier bears pain, fatigue, blows, wounds, and death, while the same man in civil life will shun them all. During these past three years, we have become accustomed to such soldierly deeds in Europe, Asia and Africa. The war age, however, is not the normal status of mankind. Nor should it become normal. For the military spirit rather fosters servility than obedience. The submissiveness of the soldier is far other than the cheerful yielding of the citizen. Again, the military spirit in all lands and at all times, cultivates caste. When in uniform, the soldier regards himself sui generis—a creature apart. Lastly, the military spirit fosters not that social feeling, which is the bond of good citizenship. A short time ago, these three reasons led the legislature of New Jersey to reject a bill calling for military training in the high schools of that state.

Now there are features in the military system which should be welcome in every human status: the esprit de corps, the absence of the money craze, for it is an old proverb that a soldier carries a lean pocket; whole-souled devotion to duty; and no doubt many others will occur to my readers.

Hence then comes the question: Why not engraft into civil life the best features of the military? It should be done, and this is why this paper was written as an appeal for that end. There is nothing in civil life like the machine work of military life. The organization needed for such is lacking. There seems little reason why a conscription for civil purposes should not be encouraged. We are growing used to the many noisy advocates of military conscription, who differ in details, but unite in insisting on its need. Why not similar hues and cries for civil needs? Surely, the civil needs of any country are paramount to its military needs. In fact, the latter can not be met without first providing for the former. Civilian work is intelligible without any soldier. The citizen can stand alone, but not the soldier. Today, public works are looked upon as huge centres of graft, which must be paid for by the citizens. Take the great needs of our land: reforestation, irrigation plants, great highways, ship canals, government coal mines, oil fields and numerous others. Add to such national needs, those of states and cities, such as capitol, court houses, public gardens, hospitals, schools and so on. Under civil conscription, these works might be wrought without much burden on the citizens.

Why should we have military conscription and it alone and not civil conscription? The army is for rare occasions. Civil matters are as many and as lasting as are the state itself, its needs, and its wellbeing. Nor, as a rule, is the soldier uppermost in our minds. Just now he is because of the European slaughter. But in ordinary times he is out of sight. The citizen, however, is to the front, ever and always, by day and night. Why not then train him?

I am not advocating Socialism, which has another end in view. The Socialists would have the government run every business. I propose merely to apply to civil life the conscription so much demanded for military life. All business would go on as usual, save that youths of certain age and for a specified time would be devoted to civil service under competent authority. How often public works are held up because of state debts. Loans, loans, loans is the eternal cry of legislators. The only way the citizen is concerned in is taxes. He is not consulted, but rather ignored; he is forced to accept the action of men in power, who often know little about what they are doing. Witness the closing session of the last Congress. There we find $533,000,000 appropriated for the navy and $25,454,000 for agriculture. About twenty times as much for the navy, of which sum more than half will go for warships that in a few years will be thrown into the junk heap. The agricultural needs, permanent and eternal, much more pressing than warships, must stand aside. Here in New York, the action of the Board of Estimate, some seven men or so, will settle the question of the N. Y. Central's grab of the Riverside Park. Right or wrong, the Board of Estimate will act of its own sweet will, and five millions of New Yorkers will bow to it. Under civil conscription such things would be avoided. How? By citizens doing the work themselves.

The sons of the rich, moreover, would share with poorer boys in such civil work. That companionship would help to impress on both common standards. A wholesome touch would follow, which in some cases would last into sterner years. It would do good to all. In the army, a regular wage is paid. The same should be done under civil conscription. About twenty years ago, in company with the Roman correspondent of an American newspaper, I visited Perugia, Italy, where I was introduced to the archbishop, who was the immediate successor of Leo XIII. The barracks was the topic of conversation, as also its influence on the conscripts. The archbishop regarded them as a blessing to the Italian boys, because during their time of service they learned how to read and write. On returning to their ordinary life, this acquisition proved a great help. No doubt from civil conscription like benefits would follow. The civil quarters would become nurseries, in which youths would acquire trades or professions. The fear that the steady succession of youths would soon fill all open places and leave few openings is trivial. Today, men succeed one another in the many avocations of life. Civil training will not add one youth more to the number; it will merely fit them the better for life's struggle. So every soldier, when his time is up, returns to civil life and soon sets aside his military ardor. Youths trained in civil barracks would engage in various employments. And as all will be trained, the chances rest even. Lastly, many mothers would see an opening for their boys to master livelihoods, which, if left to the parental resources, would be out of all question.

Here, then, is a new field of preparedness. It is not to spill blood or to slaughter one's fellow men, but to maintain the peaceful labors of everyday life. Men should be prepared for civil life, that is for the ordinary lot of humanity. In a measure, the civil barracks would amplify the work of our universities, colleges, schools, and similar training places. All such would harmonize. Only war, desires of war, fear of war can be advanced as the occasion of military preparedness. "Violentum non durat"—violence never lasts. The professional soldier is an insignificant figure as regards the rest of the population. The armies in the European Armageddon number perhaps 20,000,000, while the populations of the warring nations and their subjects run up close to a billion. About one in fifty is the proportion. The fifty are the ones to be got ready in civil preparedness.

Now all this may sound utopian. Is it any more so than military conscription was to Americans before the Civil war? In that internal turmoil, conscription first saw the light; and so did that wild outburst of graft, which still throttles America. At least, there seems ample reason for pondering this universal civil training and agitating for it. Happy for us, if such a movement would grow, expand, and sweep the hydra of military conscription into the surrounding seas. SIDNEY GRAYSON.

GIVE HIM A HAMMER AND SAW.

Don't buy him a sword and a gun,
Whose purpose on earth is to kill;
Don't teach him that murder is fun,
Or something the bosom to thrill.
Don't send him to valley or hill
To slaughter the dove or the daw,
A lesson in youth to instill,
Just give him a hammer and saw.

Just give him some lumber of pine,
Just give him a bundle of boards
And teach him to follow a line,
And teach him a builder's rewards
Oh, better than rifles or swords,
Than stilling a song or a caw,
The thing that he fashions affords
The boy with a hammer and saw.

He'll work like a beaver, the boy,
He'll learn like the wisest again
The tree of the woods to employ.
He'll fashion a house for the wren,
He'll make you a trinket, and then
He'll figure and study and draw—
He'll learn all the lessons of men
If you give him a hammer and saw.

So teach him to work and to plan
The pleasure that laboring brings.
So make him a builder, a man,
And not a destroyer of things.
For closer the artisan clings
To family, country and law
Than soldiers or swordsmen or kings—
So give him a hammer and saw.
Douglas Malloch in American Lumberman.

POLITICAL INJUSTICE AND ECONOMICS.

May I be permitted to continue the discussion, on the subject of "Economic Cranks" as set forth by Franklin Steiner in The Truth Seeker Feb. 24? Not that I wish to dispute what Mr. Steiner asserts or step into the defense of the pests who annoy him, but have the purpose in view of trying to establish, if possible, a clear and distinct dividing line between the two subjects, viz.: mental freedom and industrial freedom, or, in other words, Free-thought and Economics.

I will grant the assumption that both organized religion and the present distribution of the products of labor are diseases on our social body. But, to my mind at least, both are distinct, clear, and easy to discern and require separate treatment. Also it must be true that the majority of the masses suffer, either consciously or unconsciously, from point of fact it doesn't matter which, from the evil effects of both diseases, and it would be not at all unlikely that a person in such a condition should attend a Freethought lecture. While suffering from an acute attack of political injustice, their mind has slipped down into their stomach, and they waive all parliamentary rules and shout "Economics." In such a case they should be gently informed that they are in the wrong pew. But a person who insists that economics should be given preference in a Freethought lecture and that they are not suffering from religious causes, why they should go into some Christian church and after the sermon is over inform the preacher that "Christ is dead. What we ought to hear is a lecture on economics."

There is no doubt but what there is a sharp line, and it should be plainly drawn, between the two subjects. But like the temporal affairs of the Church and the secular affairs of the State, one always, and in some cases purposely, overlaps into the other, followed by conflict and confusion. Like oil and water, they never mix. The extreme and vital difference between Freethought and Economics is analogous to the difference that exists between Church and State. Just where the border lies, or how to be able to discern when one subject encroaches on the other's territory, seems to be hopelessly lost among the majority of radical people. The path of economics seems to always lead into the Freethought camp; sadly, the converse is also true. No one seems to know when the line is crossed, it is only after a person is found roaming around in the other fellow's camp that a clash occurs. Then the censor gets busy and the confused party is silenced. Result is a censorship argument between two classes of radicals, who, by the way, have got all they can handle fighting their respective enemies.

A prominent lady-radical, editor, author and agitator was delivering a lecture on "Censorship" lately. After describing how everybody wanted censorship—for the other fellow; the Democrats want to censor the Republicans, and Republicans the Democrats; the Socialists want to censor both; she brought her picture to a climax by saying "the Freethinkers want to censor everybody."

Well, for my part, I don't want to censor anybody, but it seems to me that these forces should be divided. I have hopelessly and helplessly wandered in and around fifty-seven varieties of economic theories without ever finding a beginning or an end, but it is plainly evident that all of these theories are directed against our political organism or the State, while the activities of Freethinkers are directed against organized religion or slavery of the mind, and should be separated so that no one could be mistaken. Perhaps Mr. Steiner can point out the dividing line.

CIVILIZATION AND ALTRUISM.

In connection with the present war much has been said about religion and its bearing upon hostilities in general, but there are other phases of human life that have been affected by the war, and are showing a counter influence upon it, even more important in their way than religion. The chief of these is civilization. Men have always found it very difficult to give a definition of religion. If the essential nature of a thing be unknown, it is well-nigh impossible to define it accurately from its qualities. It is equally difficult to define what is meant by civilization. While it is true that there has appeared thus far no definition of civilization that has proved fully adequate to the subject, as in the case of religion, we have come to know, however, what civilization is not. The steady rise in the cost of living just at this time, and the resolute purpose on the part of produce growers and financial agents to become wealthy at the expense of the poorer classes, means the bankruptcy of art and science, and a retreat of civilization. For what purpose is civilization? What is it trying to do with its immense paraphernalia of science, art and engines? Is it trying to demonstrate propositions in law, in divinity, or in speculative philosophy? Is there any sense or purpose in the ships, the mines, the smoking mills that does not end in the hope and intention that infants may be swaddled, tables spread, hearths kindled and fatalities forestalled? It is an utterly false conception of civilization that cherishes the idea that business exists for the sake of ledgers and banks for the maintenance of a gold reserve. If the present war has made the old-time religionist stop and weigh his religious professions anew, it has equally arrested the attention of the thoughtful Secularist, and led him to investigate, as never before, the grounds upon which our boasted modern civilization rests. That a privileged class in the community should "corner" the market to such a degree that the workingman cannot buy the necessities of life for himself and family, is a condition of human affairs that would disgrace the worst days of paganism. If enormous wealth held in possession by a few individuals or corporations is to be looked upon as the real evidence of a highly developed civilization, then it must be said that our country is the most civilized on earth. If the war has compelled men to look to their religion it is also compelling them to look to their civilization, which at present is largely dominated by the spirit which actuates Christianity. If altruism be the essence of a true philosophy of religion, it is even more the essence of a true civilization; and a nation that exists mainly for the exploitation of a wealthy or highly educated class, is destined to constant revolutions and to ultimate loss of national honor.

MARTYRDOM OF MAN. By Winwood Reade. Cloth, with portrait and biographical sketch, $1.00.

A synopsis of universal history, showing what the race has undergone in its rise to its present plane. It shows how War and Religion have been oppressive factors in man's struggle for Liberty; and the last chapter, of some 150 pages, describes his intellectual struggle from the animal period of the earth to the present. Winwood Reade's reputation as a writer of fine English for deep study and careful reasoning, needs no word of praise.

SEVENTH EDITION — REDUCED PRICE

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxes of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

Fixing the Blame.—A glue-factory stands near a certain railway. Its charms are not for the nose, and therefore a lady often carried with her a bottle of lavender salts. One morning an old farmer took the seat beside her. As the train neared the factory, the lady opened her bottle of salts. Soon the whole car was filled with the horrible odor of the glue works. The farmer put up with it as long as he could, then shouted, "Madam, would you mind puttin' the cork in that 'ere bottle?"—New York Tribune.

Demoralizing Influence of Teetotalers.—Pat was brought up before a magistrate for being drunk and disorderly, according to Everybody's Magazine. Asked what he had to say for himself, he replied that he had come up in a train with bad company. The magistrate asked who were his bad companions. Pat replied, "Four teetotalers." "Well," said the magistrate, "I think that teetotalers are the best companions you could have." "Oh, they're not," replied Pat, "for I had a bottle of whisky with me, and I had to drink it all myself."

Free Speech.—An old negro woman, according to Harper's, had lived with a family in the South for many years. One day her mistress had occasion to reprimand her quite sharply for something that had gone wrong. The negress said nothing at the time, but a little later her voice could be heard in the kitchen in shrill vituperation of everything and everybody, with a rattling accompaniment of pans and kettles. So loud became the clamor and so vindictive the exclamations that Mrs. C. went hurriedly down to the kitchen.

"Why, 'Liza," she began, in amazement, "who on earth are you talking to?"
"I ain't talkin' to nobody," the old negress replied, "but I don't keer who in dis house hyars me!"

Scripturally Scientific.

Said Billy Sunday, Thursday night,
With gestures sudorific:
"The Immaculate Conception, sir,
Is scripturally scientific."

Ah, yes, dear Bill, 'tis really true
And the Bible is prolific
Of many other statements that
Are "scripturally scientific."

When Josuha stopped the noonday sun
And fought with rage terrific,
It was, as Bill would doubtless say,
"Scripturally scientific."

When Elijah wound his heavenward way
In chariot calorific,
It was, beyond the slightest doubt,
"Scripturally scientific."

The loaves and fishes story, too,
By men with brains ossific,
Is held to be a story true
And "scripturally scientific."

The story of Elisha's bears,
To unsaved souls horrific,
To Billy is a story sweet
And "scripturally scientific."

That devils did inhabit swine
In a manner dolorific
Should not be doubted, don't you know,
It's "scripturally scientific."

The fact that Lot's wife turned to salt—
To Lot a sight algific—
Is true because, as Billy says,
It's "scripturally scientific."

That the earth was made before the sun
And filled with fruit somnific
Is a Bible story wholly false,
But "scripturally scientific."

Bill's orthodox rip-roaring hell
Is certainly damnific.

And like the whale that Jonah knew
Is "scripturally scientific."

That Aaron's rod became a snake
Is stated quite specific:
To Sunday's addle-pated friends
It's "scripturally scientific."

Bill's heaven is a golden fact;
His flames of hell siccific,
His "three prime faculties of the soul"
Are "scripturally scientific."

The fact an ass did one time talk
I hold to be lucific,
And Bill himself is proof that it
Is "scripturally scientific."

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

A very frank book; serious, scholarly, convincing.

THE CHRISTIAN HELL

From the First to the Twentieth Century

By

HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work. Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

The Belief In God and Immortality

A STATISTICAL STUDY

By JAMES H. LEUBA

Professor of Psychology and Pedagogy in Bryn Mawr College.

The work is the result of an inquiry among men of science — biologists, sociologists, historians, psychologists — as to whether they believe or want to believe in a prayer-answering God and in continuance of life after death. The answer is altogether different from what might be expected in view of the frequent affirmations of the supernaturalists that belief in Christianity, or at least its fundamental dogmas, is held by the majority of the men of science.

It puts into the hands of Freethinkers exactly the information they want on that subject, with the facts and figures verifying it.

As a logical conclusion, founded upon the general aspect of the case, we have held that science leads its votaries to a rejection of such undemonstrable propositions as the existence of gods and the survival of the "soul" when the body is dead. Here we have the evidence, in statistical form, which confirms our view.

To the inquiry into the attitude of the scientists there are added statistics regarding the thought of college students regarding the same religious dogmas.

The author is himself a man of science, an authority in his special branch, which is Psychology, and he knows and sets forth the origin and history of the beliefs with which he deals.

No recent book has attracted more attention from the press, or presented such a serious problem to the supernaturalists.

CONCLUSIONS ABOUT GOD

Difficulties of Conceiving and Maintaining His Existence Against Logic and Facts.

BY G. S. LINCOLN, M. D.

WE will approach the subject of a deity just as Thomas Jefferson advised his nephew to approach it.

"Fix Reason firmly in her seat and call to her tribunal every fact, every opinion. Question with boldness even the existence of a God: because if there be one he must more approve the homage of reason than of blindfolded fear. Do not be frightened from this inquiry by any fear of its consequences. If it end in the belief that there is no God you will find incitements to virtue in the comfort and pleasantness you feel in its exercise and in the love of others which it will procure for you."—Jefferson's Works, vol. ii, page 217.

"The fool hath said in his heart 'There is no God.'"—Bible.

"Children and fools always tell the truth."—Old Saying.

"God is a being without body, passions or parts."—Methodist Discipline.

Wherein would the Methodist God differ from a vacuum?

"I found an altar with this inscription: 'To the unknown God.' Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you." (Paul in Athens, Acts xvii, 23). How much more did these Greeks know about the unknown God than they did before Paul spoke so positively to them?

"Nations, like individuals, have their periods of youth, of manhood and decay. The same inexorable destiny awaits them all. The gods created by the nations must perish with their creators. They were created by men, and like men they must pass away. The deities of one age are the by-words of the next. The religion of our day and country is no more exempt from the sneer of the future than the others have been. When India was supreme, Brahma sat upon the world's throne. When the sceptre passed to Egypt, Isis and Osiris received the homage of mankind. Greece, with her fierce valor, swept to empire, and Zeus put on the purple of authority. The earth trembled with the tread of Rome's intrepid sons, and Jove grasped with mailed hand the thunderbolts of heaven. Rome fell, and Christians from her territory, with the red sword of war, carved out the ruling nations of the world, and now Christ sits upon the old throne. Who will be his successor?" (Ingersoll in "The Gods.")

Let us hope it will be Reason. Despite different shades of opinion, there are only three ideas on the God question: (1) Theistic or Deistic; (2) Pantheistic; (3) Atheistic or Agnostic. Pantheism is so closely related to Atheism that we could really discard this division without doing great violence to the facts.

I will notice the several arguments used to prove a God. I want to examine these arguments fairly and candidly, and I expect to show that not one of them is logically a proof of any creator or first cause. I expect to do this so forcefully that no one of intelligence will be able to say that there is a valid or logical reason for the God belief.

The first argument is: "Everything which exists must have had a creator. Logically this argument kills itself. Obviously, if God exists he must have had a creator, and that creator must have had another, so that the argument would prove a million creators as easily as one.

We are assured the universality of a belief in God proves that there is one. In what way? However, the belief is not universal at all. Many cultured and educated men do not believe it. The Buddhists do not believe it. Several tribes have no such belief. The argument is not valid and would not be conclusive if belief were universal. Belief can not alter a fact, nor make a lie of the truth, nor create an objective God out of nothing.

Seeming order, adaptation and harmony are urged as proof positive of a God. It is true that things which are near each other show some order, adaptation and harmony; this being more pronounced as the nearness of things causes the rough edges and sharp corners to wear or rub off, suggesting to the pious a designer. Yet the evidences of vast upheavals in nature, earthquakes, volcanoes, wandering planets and cataclysms disprove this argument entirely. They prove that there are some rough edges and sharp corners yet to be smoothed out in nature. The so-called moral argument breaks down at once when it is remembered that the moral sense is merely a matter of education modified by environment, and differs widely among different races. The design argument is the one the Deists usually rely on to confound the Infidel. The argument is that things are designed and that this absolutely proves a designer. Where any design can be shown, even the most hardened Infidel will admit the need of a designer. However, can the godist show this in nature? Can he show that what he calls design in nature can not be produced, is in fact not really being produced, by natural forces? I do not think we belittle his wisdom when we assert that what he does not know about nature would fill a library.

When we admit that man and some animals can design things, we do not also admit that there is a greater design in nature. In order to state positively that there is a design we must know the workings of the thing—know how it works and to what purpose. Can any one say this of the universe? If we can see any evidence of design in the long legs and bill of the heron, we can also see the design of a malevolent or devilish influence acting against the small fish or frog which becomes food for the heron. If we can see design in the tapeworm or cancer, we certainly must allow that such design would prove a devil as readily as a God, with the strongest evidence for the evil one. We know a piece of machinery is designed because we have seen similar things. Were we to show a watch to a native of Central Africa and also some lead which had been poured when molten into some water, causing it to assume grotesque shapes, the said native would look on the lead as the most wonderful and see the most evidence of design in it.

A design is a means to an end. This signifies that the designer had to resort to a means—to an intermediary something—to produce a desired end; and while the design may denote skill, intelligence and strength in the designer, it still denotes a weakness—an inability to do without some aid from a given thing. In other words, the design shows the limitation of a mortal and not the omnipotence of a God.

The words "God said let there be light and there was light" show no limitation, no weakness; no design was needed, only the will. But when the same writer says "God formed sun, moon and stars to shine," he showed the weakness of a mortal needing a design, a means to produce an end; which in this case was light. We would not design and use the railroad, the automobile, the telephone, etc., if we could say "Let there be" so and so, "and there was" so and so.

Do the believers in a God think they are adding to his omnipotence by causing him to design a design to do what he wanted to do? What has become of his fiat? Such an idea of an omnipotent God is ridiculous.

We are told that "God is love." As love is a human affection, or at least the affection of living beings, it follows that were all life to perish there would be an end of God. Love usually has some sex basis—a very improper ideal of a God for some of the extra-spiritual to entertain.

If "God is love," then hate is the devil; but only beings with brains can love or hate. Inorganic matter does neither. The natural universe has no God nor devil. "Who by searching can find out God?" No one can. This is another case of "why Jack did not eat his supper." Let us advance another step in this argument. Let us agree that three elements are in the universe—space or extension; duration or time, and matter. The first two from their very nature are infinite and therefore uncreated. This leaves us with matter to account for. Of course, when we say matter we mean all force and matter, for no one can think of matter devoid of force or force not connected with matter. We are now up to the vital question—has matter always existed in some form in space, or was there a time when there was no matter, so that it had to be created to be present here as we now perceive it? We know something—not much—about matter. We know nothing at all about any creator of matter. Which shall we logically believe—that matter is eternal and uncreated or temporal and created? If the claim is advanced that matter was at some time created we shall have some great difficulties to overcome. I will give you some of them. If matter were created, then we know logically that there was a time when there was only empty space, completely filled, however, by a being without body, passions or parts—in other words, a vacuum. Perhaps two vacuums can occupy the same space at the same time, but according to logic we should think not. Of course, God was not matter, nor did he have anything like matter in him, because if he were in any sense material then the whole argument would break down. Get these ideas in your mind—an omnipresent God not in any sense material, and also empty space. What more was God than space? God was not material, had no matter in him—had neither body, passions nor parts—in fact, was pure vacuum; so that God and space become exactly one and the same thing.

Nothing can be produced unless the thing from which it is produced contained the thing produced in some form or essential. What can an empty vacuum produce?

Now, if God gave forth matter, the matter must have been in him in some form eternally, and as he and it were necessarily present in space, then space must have had at all times within itself the essential elements of matter. Being always present in some form, it follows that it always bore the same relation to space that it now bears. In other words, it never was created—always was here. Forms are fleeting, but matter and force are truly eternal.

It will not do for the theist to assert that matter was a part of God, for such an argument would destroy itself. We must therefore suppose that matter was entirely wanting throughout space and also throughout God. From this vast emptiness we must in some way produce matter to comply with the argument of the theist. How can we get it? If anything ever did create, there must have been some motion. Motion means change of place. What is there to move in a vacuum entirely devoid of matter? Since God and space have been logically reduced to the state of absolute vacuums there can be nothing to move. Add to this the logical conclusion that all effects have causes, which are in turn effects also, and then you logically have a million of Gods as readily as one.

What caused God to act after an eternity of silence? Such cause, whatever it may have been, would need another cause and so on ad infinitum.

Logically there can be no Great First Cause. Matter and force are eternal. All other ideas are illogical and show loose, careless thinking or no thought worthy of the name.

Let us turn our attention to the Pantheistic idea that "God is all in all." The Agnostic and Atheist believe that nature is all in all. As the Pantheist believes that God and nature are the same, there is no real conflict in their statements. The Pantheist has some hazy notion of a sort of diffused intelligence, not a personality, and uses the word and prays—in this he differs from the Agnostic and Atheist. Intelligence means personality. No one can conceive of thought outside of personality—of the brains of some thinking being. The idea of diffused intelligence is simply concentrated nonsense. Intelligence means not only the power to think, but also to act on the thought. Such action would not be possible outside of personality, nor can thought be produced outside of brain cells. You may say that matter has a diffused intelligence, but you can not prove it; hence the assertion amounts to nothing. You say matter can produce thought. I agree with you if the matter is organized and has the proper brain cells—in other words, if it forms a thinking being. There is no thought except by brains, so that the Pantheist notion of diffused intelligence in nature is as ridiculous as the Methodist God without body, passions or parts. Some Pantheist said in effect: "All nature is God. He sleeps in the mineral, dreams in the vegetable, awakes in the animal, and thinks in the human."

The Atheist and Agnostic would assent to this, but he does not like the use of the word "God," because it means only nature to him and misleads others. In other words, if the Pantheist would abandon his transcendentalism and not prate about God when he only means nature, and quit praying when he really believes that man is the highest intelligence, then he and the Atheist and Agnostic would be in full accord.

What would you think of a scientist who claimed to know, for instance, of some wonderful substance, but who could not produce it when asked to show that he had really discovered it? Why ask for proofs in the field of science and accept without proof in the domain of religion?

Lest some Agnostic dissent from our classing him with the Atheist, I will say that while the Agnostic says meekly that he does not know that there is no God, yet he is not at all meek in controverting the arguments of the theists. To him the arguments are as poor and inconclusive as they are to the Atheist, and his meekness is only a sop thrown to the pious.

What does any one understand by the word God? Does it call up a definite mental vision or is it productive of as hazy a mental concept as "diffused intelligence" or "a being without body, passions or parts?" We can only define the unknown in terms of the known. What known terms apply to a God? Male or female? Personality or principles which in final analysis become only the forces of nature? These forces and processes no more think than does a stone or clod of earth. Let us say with Ingersoll: "Let the ghosts (gods) go. We will worship them no more. Let them cover their eyeless sockets with their fleshless hands and fade forever from the imaginations of men."

What have we left after the gods fade away? We have all we know—all there really is. We have mankind with all their hopes and fears—with all their loves and hates—with all their aspirations and despairs—with all their victories and defeats—with all their progress and mistakes—with all there is to life and happiness—with sorrow and disease; and as we no longer serve or venerate a guess we can freely turn our efforts to serve our kind. We could not help the infinite in any way, but we can help our kind. Our wish to do good turns from the sky to earth to help our race, and in the resultant good man will be blessed a millionfold more than by prayer or worship to a never-answering God.

Now the heavens no longer proclaim the "glory of God," but the earth proclaims the "glory of man" in his great progress and promise of still greater achievements in the time to come.

Where honor or where conscience does not bind,
Nor shall my future actions be confined
Slave to myself I will not be;
Nor shall my future actions be confined
By my own present mind.

HISTORY AND THE BIBLE

With a Presumably Genuine Picture of Jesus as Conceived of in the Time of Constantine.

The catacombs of Rome, Naples, Syracuse, Alexandria and other cities of the Roman empire are subterranean excavations in the form of galleries for the interment of the dead. They were first used after the second century A. D., when Rome was a city of great splendor and the Jews and Christians were poor and persecuted. A great change in this respect took place after the sack of Rome by Alaric, A. D. 410, when the city was in ruins. The Christians who buried their dead in the surrounding "Campagna" revered the catacombs near the Appian Way as the burial places of the holy martyrs, but removed their remains to the numerous churches for safer keeping. The catacombs were neglected, their entrances in ruins and after the devastations of Rome by the Goths and Lombards in the sixth century, they were entirely forgotten.

On the 31st of May, 1578, the catacombs in the city of Rome were rediscovered by some laborers

THE GOOD SHEPHERD.

The picture is an enlargement (three times) from the Encyclopedia Britannica, article "Catacombs." It is a likeness of the "good shepherd" Jesus of date between A. D. 200 and 600, after the drawing of Bosio. The defects of the photograph belong to the Encyclopedia's woodcut, but the features, dress, trees, house, etc., are distinct enough to show that the model is not from Palestine but from Rome. This Jesus is plainly an Italian.

digging for pozzolana earth, and a large literature has been busy with them ever since. "Roma Sotterranea," by Bosio, whence our picture is taken, is considered a classic, and references can be found in the Encyclopedia Britannica and other books. There is nothing Jewish about this picture, nothing suggesting a Christian teacher, a son of God or crucified savior of the first century; the features, hair and dress of this good shepherd are Roman of the fourth century and prove conclusively that the gospels of the New Testament are forgeries of a later time. Some authorities even say, that the fresco ceiling, whereof this picture forms the center, with its Roman house and trees, is from the sixth century. The passion, crucifixion or ascension of Jesus are never found represented in any catacomb. The entire length of the galleries under the city of Rome has been estimated at between 350 and 900 miles.

In the Old Testament the same deception in regard to history predominates. From 1580 until 1167 B. C. Canaan was a dependency of Egypt and no Jews were living in Palestine. Before Samuel, Saul and David no Israelites existed and no Hebrew language was spoken or written. The Exodus of Moses and the wars of Joshua are inventions of the Jews long after David.

One hundred and seventy miles south of Cairo were found the famous collection of the Tell el-Amarna letters. These Babylonian tablets represent the correspondence of Amenhotep IV, pharaoh of Egypt, with the kings of Babylonia, Assyria and the Egyptian governors of Palestine until 1167 B. C. Beginning with about 1600 B. C. the Egyptian records furnish rich and detailed pictures of conditions in Syria and Canaan. Thutmose III, who reigned between 1479 and 1447

B. C., has given a vivid account of his many campaigns and conquests in these lands. In his list inscribed on the great temple of Karnak he gives the names of 119 cities conquered in the land of Canaan. Moses and Joshua are heroes of Jewish novels!

Kent, in "Hebrew History," gives the dates of the composition of Judges, Samuel and Kings as late as 560-525 B. C.; Isaiah, 550-400; Haggai, Zechariah i-viii, 520; Malachi, 450; Nehemiah, 400; Psalms, 600-350; Job, 330; Zechariah, ix-xiv, 240; Septuagint translation, 250-100; Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, 200, and Daniel 165 B. C. The Jews were under the dominion of Persia from 536 to 333 B. C., therefore Isaiah, Zechariah, Malachi and Psalms were influenced by the religion of Zoroaster! The so-called prophecies in these books refer to Mithra and not to Jesus. Job, including the Lord and Satan, is a translation from the Persian, and Jonah is a story of the Philistines.

In the year 536 B. C. only a handful of Jews returned to Jerusalem from Babylon and were kept under strict Persian rule near the ruins of Jerusalem. The biographers of Alexander the Great know nothing of his coming near Jerusalem when marching to and returning from Egypt 332 and 331 B. C. It is an invention of the Hellenists. In the year 320 B. C. Ptolemy Soter conquered Judea and Samaria. All Jewish religious rites were prohibited and sacrifices to Zeus offered in Jehovah's temple at Jerusalem.

Zoroaster, the founder of the doctrines of the Magi or wise men, lived in Persia many years before Plato and Aristotle. The Persian Zend-Avesta give abundant details about him and are regarded as authentic. The fundamental idea of Zoroastrianism is dualistic; man stands between good and evil. No other religion has so clearly grasped the idea of guilt and merit. On the works of men here below a strict reckoning will be held in heaven. If man has a balance of good works in his favor, he passes forthwith into paradise and the life of the blessed. If his evil deeds outweigh the good, he falls under the power of Satan, and the pains of hell are his portion forever. Zoroaster believed that the fullness of time was near and the kingdom of heaven at hand. Ormuzd will soon hold judgment, punish the wicked and reward the good. Satan will be cast into the abyss and henceforth be powerless.

After the division of the empire of Alexander the Great, Mithra, the son of Ormuzd, became the favorite deity in Asia Minor. He was a god of light; candles were burning continuously upon his altars, and holy water and bells used in his rites. Mithraism teaches a flood and ark story, fiery chariot, water from a rock, communion, holy Sunday, heaven, hell, atoning sacrifice, immortality of the soul, last judgment, resurrection of the flesh and destruction of the universe by fire.

Next to Mithra, the new judge of the dead, came Atar, the god of fire, the holy ghost, the messenger of the supreme being and all the good and bad angels. Mithra, the second person of the Persian trinity, born the 25th of December, cleanses all with his purifying blood, proclaims all men to be brethren and gives regeneration through baptism and second birth. When Mithra's labors were ended, he retired to heaven after the celebration of a last supper. Mixing old Zoroastrianism with the cults of Mithra and Bacchus, everything was ready to begin the composition of the inspired and holy, anonymous New Testament!

With the foundation of the Roman empire and the granting of religious liberty everywhere the orientalizing of classic paganism began. Cybele and Attis were brought to Rome from Phrygia, Isis and Serapis from Egypt, Baal from Syria and Mithra from Persia. Chaeremon, a priest from Alexandria, a stoic philosopher, a teacher of Nero, rediscovered in the religion of Egypt the worship of the powers of nature and found in prayer a means of rescuing men from the fatality which the influence of the planets imposed upon them. Near the beginning of the third century A. D. Mithraism acquired an almost undisputed supremacy in the Latin world. Temples and caves of Mithra could be found from India to Scotland among the traders, laborers and slaves, but especially in the military camps. Mithraism lasted until the reign of Theodosius, A. D. 379-395. About 400 statues and reliefs of Mithra are known to exist today, while we have nothing referring to the crucified savior Jesus except from the time of the Dark Ages.

Another very important source of medieval Christianity is Manicheism! Mani, its founder, was crucified in the capital of Persia under Bahram I, A. D. 276. Manichæism taught revelation, redemption, ascetic virtue and immortality of the soul, and maintained itself until far into the Middle Ages.

After the mental efforts of Bruno, Gassendi, Hobbes, Spinoza, Voltaire, Holbach, Kant, Paine and their followers, people became more educated and tolerant in religious matters. They learned by traveling, that Christianity is only one of many religions and not the very best one. Gibbon proved the purely human development of the Christian belief. The claim that only one universal God exists falls to pieces, when we consider that every thinking soul has a different conception of his Lord or Father. The uncompromising, supreme ruler of the Catholics is not the elastic "God is Love" of the Christian Scientists. Ormuzd, who lives in pure fire, is not Jehovah, who lived in a wooden box. Allah, who abhors wine and has no son, is not the God of the Christians, who changes wine into the blood of his son Jesus!

The Protestants are breaking up into ethical Christians and the ignorant fire-and-brimstone eaters of the Billy Sunday type. As Christianity was constructed out of Zoroastrism, Judaism, Buddhism, neo-Platonism, Mithraism and Manicheism, so it will again decompose into aggressive Catholicism, only-in-the-mind-existing Christian Science, Spiritualism, New Thought and Free-thought.

The impartial history of the monuments, excavations and inscriptions will yet be one of the sharpest weapons to disprove the anonymous, fanatical writings of Jewish and Christian sects and break the tyranny of Bible and church.

A DISCOURSE ON RELIGION.

CHANNING SEVERANCE, Prelector.

Let us never forget what a curse religion is nor cease to combat it as individuals, for by individuals, singly and collectively, it is kept alive. Religion is a product of thought wrongly and foolishly used, and what is produced with thought can be destroyed by it, if false and without foundation on natural and eternal principles. Religion is nothing but God worship and an effort to rule the masses by the priests, who after making a God to suit themselves, put into his mouth words intended to produce fear and compel obedience. Cunningly they have made their mental God—for no other exists in the universe, or can be found by scientist or philosopher—the supreme source of authority before whom we must all bow or be damned.

Religion, which is priestcraft doing business with mental slavery and physical control as its object, is a needless and useless word in our vocabulary if the word God is not found therein, for without a God of some kind to start with religion has nothing to offer or say. Its business is to assume the existence of that mental monster priests have put up in the sidereal regions out of reach and sight, and then to send down messages intended to regulate the thoughts and the actions of simple and credulous minds. So the person who wastes time in talking about the "religion of humanity" could devote his thoughts to no subject more foolish. Morals, which are codes of conduct in society or aggregations of individuals, are needed to insure peace, harmony and justice, but religion or God worship is as unnecessary to man's welfare and happiness as a fur overcoat to those living at the equator; and is, when accepted and practiced, as sure a sign of mental imbecility as the wearing of an overcoat in the torrid zones would reveal.

Until God can make himself known to someone besides a priest, or find power with his "omnipotence" to talk and express his wishes through some other than a man clothed like a woman, or dressed in the regulation black to distinguish the smooth and unctuous fakir from the common herd, it would be well for mankind to stop believing for a while and do a little thinking. When a man has to tog himself up in clothes of uncommon and different style from all other men, to create a sense of wisdom and superiority they do not possess, it is well to think of him as a man without the effect of his costume, and when he is so inspected and critically considered he immediately falls to the same level on which the rest of us stand when we look for a God or talk about one.

Of all the fakes and humbugs ever known or utilized by shrewd and scheming rascals with which to play on human credulity, the religious one towers aloft like the mountain above a mole hill, and its evil and injurious effects are widespread and extensive, because, having produced multitudes of credulous minds that never think for themselves or have the least idea they can or should, it opens the way to an endless series of frauds and deceptions. Who, of all the human bipeds that walk this earth, are so gullible as those whose minds are stuffed with religious nonsense and kept from mental activity through fear and foolishness? When you find a man who fears to think and express his thoughts on any subject that interests or concerns the human race, you will find a victim of priestcraft, the source—I repeat again lest it be forgotten—of all religions and every form of mental slavery extant. Fools are made to order by religious instructors, and the world is full of mental failures, wrecks, and monstrosities, because of the power seen in priestcraft to produce them.

There is nothing good or beneficial about priestcraft or religion in any way, for its business being to prevent reason or prevent its exercise, to produce groundless fears and keep the world in a state of mental wretchedness, with poverty and ignorance as the common state of the masses, it is not now and never was anything but a curse and a gigantic evil.

Said Robert Taylor: "The ancient oracle of Delphi for a thousand years was a hideous nest of priestcraft—of jugglery, delusion and fraud." Said Dean Farrar: "The visitor to the ruins of Pompeii may still see in her temple the statue of Isis, through whose open lips the gaping worshippers heard the murmured answers they came to seek. No doubt they believed as firmly that the image spoke as our forefathers believed that their miraculous madonnas nodded and winked. But time has exposed the cheat. By the ruined shrine the worshiper may now see the secret steps by which the priest got to the back of the statue, and the pipe entering the back of its head through which he whispered the answers of the oracles."

And right here is a proper time to refer to the fact that present-day theosophists who are trying to harmonize all religions instead of exterminating the pestiferous things, are much attached to "Isis," with the pipe in the back of her head, and Madame Blavatsky's "Isis Unveiled" is one of their choice books presented for our consideration, that we may, if we will, acquire "esoteric wisdom." The best and most fitting thing yet seen applied to these mental wanderers in realms of miracles and mysteries, in barren and unproductive fields of thought, is "audacious ignorance," for if their work or literature is of any more value to the world than the rantings of St. Paul, the ravings of St. John, or the puerile products of priestcraft in every form or kind, the application of reason to them does not reveal it. Just as the world is making some progress in getting out and away from superstition, along comes this old folly in new dress to prolong foolish and worthless thinking, and help keep alive other species that must be exterminated before the human mind can use and get results from undeveloped resources. As humbugs, theosophy and Christian Science must be rated as kindred souls, and yet to the disgrace of general intelligence, both are flourishing like weeds in warm weather when the hoe is not in action. Hence in dealing with religion both are legitimate subjects for comment and criticism, for what they do not know and profess to tell us about God is yet to be disclosed by more vivid imaginations. All time devoted to their vagaries except for the purpose of being able to say you are familiar with them and because of that fact can rightfully analyze and condemn their baseless affirmations, is utterly wasted and lost. The thought that the chaff they both deal in can be used successfully to catch minds hungering for more knowledge, is a surprise producer, but it is done, and to all who stand by the solid realities which rational and scientific thinking present for consideration, as we wait for more in the march of progress, must admit it with regret. Nothing can have any permanent value that is not true, and neither of these mind-fuddlers is dealing in truths when they go back of material phenomena.

But what is the priest doing today as the legitimate successor of those ancient fakirs of Delphi and Pompeii? He is working the same old game, with only slight variations to meet the necessity of changed conditions, and so with the parson or the preacher, that modified representative of the old cult. The priest is still able to convince untold numbers that he has direct access to the ear of God, and is able to influence him for the good of mankind through prayers and ceremonies, and by direct requests for changes in his plans and purposes, that he receives from God a hunch now and then and is in close touch with him at all times through invisible forces not common to all men. He still puts over that ancient and preposterous insult to reason that he can convert baked dough and fermented grape juice into flesh and blood, and yet two priests do not meet and pass without laughing, as one of the ancients familiar with their business thought was a hard thing to do. But as religion is nothing without solemnity it must be preserved at all cost. And what is all this fool business for? It is for the same purpose it always was, to permit the select and favored few to rule and rob; so to debase and degrade the great majority that they will not rise up in open revolt against their masters. In ancient Greece religion was considered a necessity, for without a superstition of some kind it was feared the rabble would be ungovernable. The Catholic church still thinks so, though it does not admit its religion is the superstition that we all know it is, and one of the worst ever used to terrify mankind.

Ovid said in his day that the existence of the gods—they then had a plurality—was a matter of public policy, so when good old Socrates tried to laugh them out of existence he was kindly but firmly invited to take a drink of hemlock. Since then these sacred gods of mythology have all died a natural death, but in memory Socrates has outlived them and always will. So go the follies of the world, and in time will go those of the present, but by this uninspired prophet a new crop of some kind to replace them is foretold, since folly seems as perennial as domestic discords in every generation that seeks bliss in the sacrament known as marriage.

It is said that the more intelligent among the ancient Romans looked upon the whole religious system as a just object of contempt and ridicule, and there is no reason to doubt that intelligent men everywhere have always viewed it in that manner, though self-interest and priestly power to punish those expressing such thoughts have prevented their saying so. No man in his right senses who looks at religion as it is, can see in it anything but rank and rotten superstition, for without a trace of God to be found, and nature forever doing her work under immutable laws that nothing can influence or change, what is prayer or worship but an insane or an idiotic state of mind that has led to the committing of supreme follies? There is nothing more foolish that a man can do than to pray and worship when the object of his oblations is nothing but a mental phantom. Whether men believe in one God or many outside their own minds none exist or reveal themselves. So while we stay around here let us have the good sense to let unrealities alone as objects of contemplation, prayer or worship, or as a bugaboo to excite foolish fears.

The Reform that Made Buffalo Famous.

When Billy came to Buffalo
His language was quite vile;
But note the "marked improvement"
Since he's been here a while.
We do not mean the sinners saved,
Or haunts of Satan stormed,
But oh, the joy the angels feel!
Since Billy has reformed.
He came to save our wicked town,
To do it with a vim.
Behold the power of saving grace!
The town's reforming him!

CAYUGA.

The Peruvians had the institution of a Holy Communion, in which they ate of a sacred bread, sancu, sprinkled with the blood of a sacrificed sheep, the priest pronouncing this formula: "Take heed how ye eat this sancu; for he who eats it in sin and with a double will and heart is seen by our Father, the Sun, who will punish him with grievous troubles." The Spaniards themselves recognized that the Mexicans ate the mystical body of the God with every sign of devotion and contrition; and they were so far from depreciating the Peruvian Communion that they supposed St. Bartholomew had established it.—Philip Vivian.

The cause of America is, in a great measure, the cause of all mankind. Many circumstances have arisen and will arise which are not local but universal, and through which the principles of all lovers of mankind are affected, and in the event of which their affections are interested. The laying of a country desolate with fire and sword, declaring war against the natural rights of all mankind, and extirpating the defenders thereof from the face of the earth, is the concern of every man to whom nature hath given the power of feeling.—Thomas Paine.

I wish to make a statement, and make it too plain to allow a Christian minister successfully to dispute it. It is this: If the Bible is to be relied upon, and if it reports the language of Jesus correctly, then Jesus taught all of the worst doctrines preached in the Christian pulpit. The only way to make Jesus a teacher of what is merciful and just and kind is to show that he did not talk as reported in the gospels.

If there is one practice that ought to be discontinued it is the practice of deciding matters by precedents. I believe in considering every question on its individual merits, without reference to the previous question. There is such a thing as the divine (nature's) right of contradiction. Let us put it in practice no matter who says a thing is so. If to our mind it is not so, let us say so. We are too much swayed by the other fellow.

The only liberty that a Roman Catholic has is a priest's say-so. He dares not to keep his hat on his head against the command of a priest, nor to let an idea get into his head. Romanism is the most deadly enemy that liberty has on this earth and the only freedom which it gives its worshipers is the freedom to be a slave. The man who keeps the commandments at the behest of a priest would break them at the behest of a priest. Such a man cannot be trusted.

The reason that so many of the sayings of Jesus are incomprehensible is not because they are profound or divine, but because they are nonsensical. In fact, almost all the sentiments in the four gospels that their authors put into the mouth of Jesus are foolishness. His notions of a heaven, of a Father in heaven, of angels or devils, of hell, do not picture real things. No man ever talked more about what is not so and less about what is so than the hero of the four gospels.

Parents who tell their children that God gives them their food, their clothes and all the good things they have, mislead the minds of their children and misstate facts. It is simply a lie, a lie without palliation, for a parent to tell his child that God watches over it and keeps it from harm. Religion cannot teach anything but a lie, for religion itself is a lie. It is best to tell a child the truth and let the child find out what God is for himself. The best God a child ever had is his father or mother.

What is meant by "preaching the gospel?" What is this gospel that is preached? I mean it. And I want some person of authority—if there be such a person—to enlighten us. I assume that there must be something, possibly some portion of the Bible, that is called gospel. I want to know just what part of the Bible, just the book—chapter and verse or verses—that is called gospel. Gospel means good tidings. What is there good in the notion of a hell for a majority of human beings, and a heaven for the others?

No Book Sacred.

We have on earth no book or manuscript that is too holy to criticize, for every book and manuscript was written by some man; and no man is now, or ever was, infallible. We want to get one idea into our minds, that is, that no person who has lived on earth has been higher intellectually or morally than man. And there is another idea which would greatly benefit the world if it would accept it, and that is, that there is more knowledge among educated men today than ever before, and consequently the later writings of man are more accurate, more reliable, than the earlier writings of man. The highest knowledge is the highest authority. The man who knows the most on any given subject is the man who can speak with the greatest assurance on that subject.

We have no knowledge higher than man's, holier than man's or different from man's. There is no book of God, no word of God, no revelation of God.

All notions of anything divine on earth are fictitious. Every record of divine manifestations is false; every record of divine language is fabulous; every account of divinity is a lie.

No man can speak for God, for no man knows anything about God. To say that God talked with Moses is to say what no one can prove. A statement to that effect in a book is not proof; it is gall.

Man needs to free his mind from the thralldom of the Bible. That volume passes for more than it is worth. There is in it only the wisdom of man, only the light of man, only the knowledge of man. The lie printed upon the Bible has passed for truth, and has protected it from honest criticism.

We have reached a time when we must face the truth and accept whatever fate the truth has for us. Truth is better for man than all the religions that he ever had. If Christianity cannot answer the questions of reason and common sense then must it stand convicted of imposture and deceit. There should be no mystery about facts. There should be no necessity to cover up the truth. Man wishes to know if the Christian church is telling a lie or a dozen lies. If this church declares that what it teaches is true, then must it furnish the evidence upon which its religious tenets rest. There is too much evasion, too much dishonest silence, by the representatives of this church. I hold that not a preacher or priest of the Christian faith can give one single historical fact to support that faith. All of Christianity—all of its ecclesiastical or theological dogmas—are founded upon Bible texts, written by unknown men. Outside of the Bible's covers, there is not a particle of evidence to uphold the teachings of the Christian church.

The religious notion that the Bible is too sacred to be touched by the common sense of man is too foolish to consider. It is the sacred and not the profane that wrongs man most. The lie that the Bible is God's word I regard as the greatest curse of the human race.

Mr. Debs on Colonel Ingersoll.

At various times Mr. Eugene V. Debs has expressed, more or less at length, his appreciation for Ingersoll—not necessarily of Ingersoll as a denier of the Christian faith and an exposé of its falsity, but as a man and brother, or humanitarian. In Pierson's Magazine for April Mr. Debs publishes his "Recollections of Ingersoll."

It was as a member of an organization in Terre Haute, Indiana, known as the Occidental Literary Club, under the auspices of which Ingersoll lectured there, that Mr. Debs met him. Says Mr. Debs of this event:

"Late in the seventies, when Colonel Ingersoll was lecturing under the management of James Redpath and packing the greatest auditoriums in the country to overflowing, he came to Terre Haute and I saw him for the first time. I met him at the railway station on arrival and escorted him to his hotel. He at once filled my eye and captivated me completely. There was something intensely fascinating in his personality, an irresistible charm in his presence, a liquid melody in his voice—and withal he bore the stamp of genius and the towering majesty of a man! I felt that here was the greatest man in all the world."

The lecture was to take place on April 30, 1878. On April 14 Redpath wrote to Debs:

"You need not be afraid of speaking so extravagantly of the Colonel's eloquence that people will be disappointed. He is the most eloquent man now living. He astonished New England, and in Boston, where they hear the best oratory all the time, he made the profoundest sensation of the last fifteen years and drew the biggest audiences. . . . You will find that I have not overstated his marvelous power over audiences. Boldly announce him as the greatest orator of the world. He is."

The Terre Haute lecture, delivered before a large audience, is thus reported:

"The opera house was packed to the doors. All the surrounding towns had sent in delegations and standing room was at a premium. Many had to be turned away. The subject was 'The Liberty of Man, Woman and Child.' It was my privilege to introduce the speaker to the audience.

"Never until that night had I heard real oratory; never before had I listened enthralled to such a flow of genuine eloquence. The speaker was in his prime, not yet forty-five, tall, shapely, graceful and commanding, the perfect picture of the beau ideal of his art. Never can I forget his features, his expressive blue eyes, his mellifluous voice, his easy, graceful gestures, and his commanding oratorical powers. He rippled along softly as a meadow brook or he echoed with the thunder of some mighty cataract. He pleaded for every right and protested against every wrong; he touched every emotion and expressed every mood of his enchanted listeners. His words fell as pearls in sunshine from his inspired lips and his impassioned periods glowed with the fervid enthusiasm of their thrice-eloquent author.

"Redpath was right. Ingersoll was the greatest orator in all the world. No pen or tongue could ever describe his brilliant eloquence or his matchless powers."

Tributes to the magnificence of Ingersoll's personality and speech come fast to the mind of the writer, and among those he quotes is this from Elizabeth Cady Stanton:

"I heard Mr. Ingersoll many years ago in Chicago. The hall seated 5,000 people; every inch of standing room was occupied; aisles and platform crowded to overflowing. He held that vast audience for three hours so completely entranced that when he left the platform no one moved until suddenly, with loud cheers and applause, they recalled him. He returned smiling and said: 'I'm glad you called me back, as I have something more to say. Can you stand another half hour?' 'Yes: an hour, two hours, all night,' was shouted from various parts of the house; and he talked on with unabated vigor, to the delight of his audience. This was the greatest triumph of oratory I had ever witnessed." . . . "I have heard the greatest orators of this century in England and America; O'Connell in his palmiest days, on the Home Rule question; Gladstone and John Bright in the House of Commons; Spurgeon, James and Stopford Brooke, in their respective pulpits; our own Wendell Phillips, Henry Ward Beecher, and Webster and Clay, on great occasions; the stirring eloquence of anti-slavery orators, both in Congress and on the platform, but none of them ever equaled Robert Ingersoll in his highest flights."

The writings of Ingersoll would have made him famous even had he never spoken in public. His lectures are read with the same enthusiasm that they were heard. It was not necessary that one should approve his ideas in order to appreciate his oratory, for the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, himself a power on the platform, called him "the most brilliant speaker of the English tongue of all men on this globe." His qualities as a friend and companion captivated those who came to him. Having delineated these qualities, and described some of the many good deeds of the great Infidel, Mr. Debs says:

"Great as Ingersoll was in public life he was greater still in the charmed circle of his beautiful family and his happy home. Beneath the blessed roof-tree of the Ingersolls four generations dwelt together in perfect love and made home and heaven synonymous terms. Mrs. Ingersoll, her venerable mother, the beautiful daughters, the devoted sister and their husbands and children, ah, what supreme happiness reigned in that royal household! And to see them all swarm about the Colonel and cover him with caresses and kisses was a picture for the soul never to be erased from the memory. A temple of freedom, a house of love and joy, a holy shrine was the Ingersoll home when its master spirit reigned there, and they who passed its sacred portals, beheld its touching scenes of felicity and devotion, and enjoyed its hearty, wholesome hospitality visioned a veritable paradise on this planet."

In politics and economics little was held in common by these two representative men, yet in Ingersoll's humanity Debs finds everything to praise:

"He pleaded for the negro as no one ever had before, he espoused the cause of the Chinaman when it was almost treason to breathe a sympathetic word in his behalf, he protested passionately against the persecution of the Jew, he stood staunchly for the rights of woman, he thundered with a Titan's voice in condemnation of the crimes committed against childhood, he made the most eloquent, touching, inspiring appeal ever made in behalf of the criminal class, so-called, and to the hour of his death he low-being. The weak and unfortunate, the sorrowing and despairing, regardless of color or creed, whoever or whatever they might be, had in 'Bob' Ingersoll as tender a sympathizer and as true a friend as ever ministered to the needs of his fellow-men."

Praise is exhausted when justice is done to Ingersoll. Above the level he attained men do not rise, and we know that his eulogist is speaking with sincerity, truth and moderation when he says: "The world has yet to learn of the true greatness of the man and the infinite value of his service to humanity. He freely laid his all upon the altar that those who came after him might escape the curse of slavery and the horror of superstition, and know the joy of being free. He was absolutely true to the highest principles of his exalted character and to the loftiest aspirations of his own unfettered soul. He bore the cruelest misrepresentation, the foulest abuse, the vilest calumny, and the most heartless persecution without resentment or complaint. He measured up to his true stature in every hour of trial, he served with fidelity and without compromise to the last hour of his noble life, he paid in full the price of his unswerving integrity to his own soul, and each passing century to come will add fresh luster to his immortal fame."

A Bas le Diable!

A number of good and otherwise sane people are much disturbed in mind because belief in a personal devil is passing. All the comfort which in the past has come from our practice of laying the contrariness and crime of the world on the shoulders of the devil is lost if so be "there ain't no such animal." His banishment seems almost sacrilegious. We never loved him, but he came in conveniently when we tried to explain things.

Now the fact is, we don't need a devil. We are constantly giving evidence of our ability to outdo anything that could be invented by the worst old devil in any catechism or creed. What could be more skilfully diabolical than the way our financiers fleece the widows and orphans, and the church charitable organizations plunder the public treasury in a pretended attempt to undo the mischief? What more fiendish than grinding profit out of the lives of children; than robbing the worker of his product; than sending the big thieves to Europe on their yachts, and sending our idealists and reformers to jail?

What could be more effective in the way of damning souls than a bungling system which causes all our wars, much of our crime, and keeps the majority in a poverty that drives men to drink and women to the brothel? If a Satan were to lay out a scheme for running this world, would he dare to include more jails, prisons and poorhouses than we benevolently provide, or to fill them with a greater percentage of innocents? And where could he find a more cunningly devised system for making the wrong easy and the right difficult than the one we call civilization? It is no wonder that Edward Carpenter found it necessary to write a book which he named: "Civilization: Its Cause and Cure."

But not yet is this sad recital ended. The present war has opened up to the gaze of long-suffering humanity a picture of unbridled viciousness and degeneracy hitherto unparalleled in the annals of history. The scenes of crime and cruelty through which the world is now passing have faded to comparative insignificance the old-time devil and his infernal regions. The awful horrors which are the daily record of this wholly unnecessary and therefore purposeless war fairly cause the normal intellect to stagger, and cast a shadow of impenetrable gloom over the aspirations of those who sincerely hoped for an early enfranchisement of the world.

A bas le diable! We have no use for him now that human nature has demonstrated its ability to outwit him in all his fiendish ingenuity as revealed in the "holy book." With the sanction of God's churches we can do all the business of crime breeding and soul destroying very much better than he could if he were here, and we do it by the simple expedient of giving a few people the mastery of the rest through ownership of their means of livelihood, or what is even worse, control of their minds and hearts, so that at the mere beck of some demagogue a man must leave his family and his fireside to sacrifice himself on the field of battle; and for what? Echo answers, what? We can easily beat the devil at his own game and still call ourselves civilized and even Christian.

To what conclusion do these thoughts naturally lead? It is this: that like as man created God out of the goodness of his heart, so also did man create the devil out of the evil of his heart. Here is another unanswerable argument against the tenets of religion. The human mind cannot conceive of a more efficient fiend than history reveals in the character of some men. The devil is a wholly human conception. He is an etherealized counterpart of a typically bad man. To relegate to a superhuman origin the ills and evils of this present life which are manifestly the outcome of men's perversity is but one of the many absurdities connected with religion. It is not generally known that the words "deity" and "devil" are derived from the same old Hindoo word "deva." Originally the two conceptions represented but one idea. They were divided at last by the process and development of human thought that made one class of natural forces and powers good and another evil. When a great nation conquered some other nation, the gods of the conquered nation were supposed to be conquered also, and to partake of the degradation of the conquest; so they were relegated to a lower sphere. In this way the gods of one nation became the malignant sprites and devils of another. We once heard of a Christian mother who was found teaching her child to bow whenever the devil's name was mentioned. When asked why she did this, she replied: "Because I think it is safer." Give the devil his due. In other words, keep on the right side of any power that may help or hinder.

Decent American sentiment is now being insulted by a revival of the absurdities of hell and the devil through the preaching of certain self-styled evangelists. Those persons who look upon the banishment of the devil as almost sacrilegious are determined that his sacred memory shall be revived and maintained in all the glory of medieval superstition; and to bring this about they have engaged the services of one Billy Sunday, a former baseball player, who will shortly open his show in New York contemporaneous with the advent of Barnum and Bailey's circus. A busy spring may be expected in the metropolitan city!

Now apart from the falsity of the devil-idea it is perfectly plain that people who advocate its revival in an age of reason are totally ignorant of the true principles of pedagogics. The way to teach a child right conduct is not by terrifying its nature by a picture of evil, but by flooding its thought with the memory of things that are good. All successful teachers have recognized the fact that the best way by which one can impress the truth upon another is not by emphasizing error but by supplanting error with the cleansing power of truth. The supreme requisite of life is not to know error but to know the truth. The knowledge of error is fortuitous but inevitable; but the knowledge of truth is a necessity, and is attained only by those whose minds are set strongly upon it—who spurn to learn it through the medium of error.

Evil, like the poor, we have always with us. Men need no picture of a superhuman devil to remind them of sin and error. Life is crowded with the evil doings of godly as well as ungodly men. To get away from these sad conditions is the pressing desire of every decent man. The evangelist who comes to us today with the notion of a personal devil and the horrors of a God-established hell, in order to harrow up the feelings of a sensitive community, ought to be denounced to the police at once as a person seeking to disturb the moral equanimity of the people, as well as the mental balance of those who are easily influenced by such presentations. If the basis of the performance were other than a religious one, this would certainly be done. The police of our cities have interfered only too often in cases bearing no comparison to this one in point of reprehensibility. Religious doctrines have clouded the life of man sufficiently long; the wise man of today will have none of them; he has largely outgrown them. Let such a man assert his manhood and his decency, and relegate forever to the gehenna of unprofitable human concepts the absurd notions of hell and the devil. A bas l'enfer: a bas le diable! Away with hell; away with the devil!

Ignoring as of none effect the dictum of their Prince of Peace that they who take the sword shall perish by the same instrumentality, the New York Federation of Christian Churches has indorsed by a vote of 158 to 52 the universal military service which men of violence propose, and recommend the most extreme measures necessary. The vote by churches stood:

	For.	Against.
Baptist	16	1
Congregational	10	0
Disciples of Christ	3	0
Seventh Day Adventists	1	1
Protestant Episcopal	27	3
Reformed Episcopal	0	1
Evangelical Association	1	2
Society of Friends	0	2
German Evangelical Synod	0	1
Lutheran	14	7
Methodist Episcopal	23	4
Primitive Methodist	1	0
Moravian	4	1
Presbyterian	27	20
Reformed	19	3
Universalist	1	2
Union Protestant	10	4

It required the 20 negative votes of the Presbyterian communion to prevent the churches from going 5 to 1 for the sword. The Public, which holds that Christianity has "received a blow in the house of its supposed friends," observes that sixty years ago the Federation of Churches would have voted thus affirmatively for black slavery. The record for belligerency that the church is making now will not give it any hesitancy, after peace shall have been established permanently by Humanitarianism, in claiming that it abolished war.

The downfall of the czar of Russia is said to be due to his superstition, upon which some "power behind the throne" perpetually worked. Years ago the czar made a pilgrimage to a distant shrine to obtain the blessing of a recluse called Father John, who, we believe, turned out to be a rascally monk. During the Japanese war and afterwards it was an ecclesiastic bearing the name of Pobodonischeff or something similar who put the hoodoo on him, and more latterly he fell for the Siberian monk Rasputin, who caused the assassination of the czar's minister Stolypin, and not long ago was "done in" by his enemies of the Russian court. The czar is said to be a weak character, which must be so if these stories are true. Superstition is not characteristic of rulers of men. A people is more easily governed through its superstitions, but the governing class should be free from the delusions through which they control the unenlightened masses. The successful demagogue or autocrat defers to the popular belief and conforms to the popular error by attending religious services; he is lost, however, if he takes them seriously to himself. That was the czar's mistake. Superstition is for the masses who are to be governed. We cannot conceive of popes and kings actually believing in the superstition they proclaim regarding their own divine status and functions.

The adherents of the pope's church in America are not united in loyalty to the administration at Washington. Senator O'Gorman, who was sent to Congress from New York because he was a Roman Catholic, turned out in the end to be a pro-German hyphenate. Justice Daniel F. Cohalan, who because he was a Catholic was put in O'Gorman's place on the bench of the Supreme court of the state, refuses to sign a declaration of support to the President in protecting American rights and American citizens against German aggression. He calls it "hysteria," although Cardinal Farley has given his signature to the pledge; while Tammany Hall, which is the political arm of the church, is considering the nomination of the pro-German George B. McClellan for representative to Congress. It is evident that the Rev. Father O'Brien of Toledo, Ohio, would not have the united indorsement of New York Catholics in lynching Scott Nearing for opposing the government's plans to defend American life and property.

THE MISSIONARY IMPULSE

The Causes Which Impel the Convinced Freethinker to Disseminate His Views.

By ATWOOD MANVILLE.

II.

5. Superstition—religious belief regarded as based on ignorance or fear—is admitted to be a relic of barbarism; whereas religion is said to be the vanguard of civilization; but “where there is any religion, the devil will plant superstition”; and it is difficult to separate them. Jehovah told Moses how to place the blood of a ram on the great toe of Aaron's right foot (Exodus xxix, 20), and evidently considered such instructions more important than information about immortality. The belief in demonology and witches appears to us now as much of a superstition as the dread of sitting thirteen at table, but all are derived from scripture. Superstition and religion both predicate a belief in the supernatural and differ only in degree, depending on the generally accepted view of what is true in each community.

It is claimed that Christianity has been the cause of the greater civilization that exists in Western countries compared to the Orient, and that no nation has been civilized without a Bible; but when one considers the failure of Christian churches to advocate reforms, and their opposition to any science that tended to destroy the authority of their sacred book, he may reach the conclusion that the existence of greater civilization in Christian countries is due not so much to their being Christian as to the superior intelligence and education of the people in those countries that has led them to choose what they thought the best of the various religions as they have chosen the best in science, politics and art. There is no evidence in the Bible that modern civilization was inspired by that book, nor have its adherents welcomed the great discoveries of astronomy, zoology and physiology. When Galileo proved that the earth moved around the sun, the church put him in jail until he retracted. When Darwin's theory of evolution appeared, the church said it was incompatible with the word of God. Scientific criticism of the Bible by Spinoza, Simon, Reimarus, Paine and Remsburg have been and are discouraged, and the attitude of mind that disapproves of a change in the old beliefs is not one to adopt progressive ideas. In the Atlantic for December, 1916, a writer on “Holy Russia” claims that love in that most religious country is superior to the morality and justice in other nations, and that Russia will first see the second coming of Christ. Misha Applebaum, founder of the Humanitarian Cult, says that when he was a youngster in Russia (probably not forty years ago), one hundred of his coreligionists were killed for refusing to kiss the cross. Love in Russia and charity in America are apt to be considered by Christians superior to justice and scientific remedies. Andrew D. White, late president of Cornell, writes: “The establishment of Christianity, beginning a new evolution of theology, arrested the normal development of the physical sciences for over fifteen hundred years.” (Warfare of Science with Theology, vol. i, p. 375.)

The impulse for the abolition of slavery, of dueling, of child labor, of war, has not come from the churches, and they are not responsible for the telegraph, telephone, serums, anesthetics and other results of scientific study that have advanced civilization. The Christian says: “Why should we be expected to make new discoveries in the secular field? Our religion is progressive, but along its own lines.” All of which is perfectly true, but why, then, claim that Christianity has civilized the world?

The Rationalist thinks that the abolition of superstition from the world will be a distinct gain, and, believing as he does that Christianity is a superstition that will not bear the light of reason any more than other religions, considers it his duty to show that the ideas and elements of Christianity were known before the days of Christ; that there was nothing original in the ideas of the Trinity, virgin birth, resurrection, ascension, eucharist, heaven, hell, etc., or in the Old Testament stories. They were all derived from prior superstitions. This is a most important statement and should be verified by every Christian before giving it credence. Mr. George Smith of the British Museum discovered that the Babylonians had the legend of the creation and fall of man about fifteen hundred years before the Hebrews heard of it. Over five hundred years before Christ, Krishna was born of the virgin Devaki; Buddha of the virgin Maya; Confucius of Yen-she. The Siamese had the virgin-born Codom; Southern Hindoostan its Salivahana; the Chinese, Fo-Hi, said to have been born of a virgin 3468 B. C.; and many others. Justin Martyr, the Christian writer of 140 A. D., in his apology to the Emperor Adrian, said: “We say no more in this than what you say of those whom you style the Sons of Jove. As to his (Jesus') being born of a virgin, you have your Perseus to balance that.”

“The myth of the dangerous child” that made Herod slaughter the innocent boys, was very prevalent. Krishna was taken from the reach of the tyrant Kansa, who sought to slay him. Buddha was also in danger from King Bimbisara; and there were many others.

When marvelous occurrences are said to have happened everywhere, is it not probable that they were myths and that Herod gave no such order as Matthew reports? Luke's account omits it, although giving other details of that time. John the Baptist escaped death, although a young child.

There were other trinities. The Tri-murti in India, of Brahma, Vishnu and Siva; the Chinese “Fo is one person, but has three forms”; the Laotse trinity also. The oracle at Serapis said to Thulis, a great monarch, “First God, afterward the Word, and with them the Holy Spirit.” Orpheus wrote: “All things were made by one godhead in three names,” etc. According to Dr. Parkhurst, “the vandals had a god called Triglafl . . . with three heads.” These and many more are detailed in Mr. Doane's book, “Bible Myths,” and should have been discredited by this time if not true. A new book from the Bross Foundation attempts to do so. Does it not alter the probability of truth in the Bible stories if the supernatural events recorded therein are repetitions of mythological legends? There is hardly a Christian, outside of the Roman Catholic church, who does not think that superstitions persist in some of the Christian churches, and the burning of witches was approved by some Protestants as recently as a hundred years ago. Is it not right to destroy faith in a religion that has discouraged science and learning and even now looks with disfavor on the very idea of freedom of thought?

6. After listening to many arguments, the Christian often makes some such remark as the following: “Suppose you are right; suppose our doctrines and the Bible are not literally true, what have you to offer in place of it? Your process is destructive and not constructive. Everyone needs a spiritual side as well as a practical side, and religion appeals to the emotions. It does no harm; let well enough alone. The doctrines of the churches may not be true, but the teachings of Christ, the spirit of Christianity and the use of prayer are the greatest known powers for righteousness in this world and for salvation in the next.”

The Freethinker answers that it is more moral to ask whether a faith be true than what will be given in exchange, and reminds the Christian that one of the beauties of his religion is self-sacrifice, which counts as trivial any loss or evil consequences resulting from action that is right and true. The consequences may not be so bad as anticipated, for there may be something gained in the exchange of ignorance and superstition for truth and science far greater than we know, which should be especially relied upon by those who believe in a God of Truth. “To free a man from error is to give, not to take away. Knowledge that a thing is false is truth.” “He who keeps back the truth or withholds it from men, from motives of expediency, is either a coward or a criminal, or both.” Individuals may suffer temporarily; churches may lose money; men and women may lose employment; but are not these losses trivial compared to any advance towards God's truth?

Those who have abandoned belief in a revealed religion experience happiness in the more reasonable forms of applied religion, and, judging from one's own acquaintance, is there not even more happiness among those who believe only the practical side of Christianity than among the theologians? When the next step is taken and all allegiance to the authority that enjoins implicit faith is repudiated, there comes a sense of freedom, intellectually and spiritually; and a great satisfaction from the knowledge that one is right; even perhaps from a sense of superiority over one's fellows. This may not be a virtue, but it is a fact, and a practical source of happiness to counteract the comfort formerly derived from faith in Christ.

“But,” you may ask, “what about the period of doubt while the faith of our ancestors, the comfort of our lives, is being shaken?” It must be admitted that these are “the times that try men's souls”; but almost all Christians have grave doubts now about many of their doctrines. No reform can be brought about without hurting someone, and if the doctrines are not true, is it not better to save the next generation the necessity of learning and later renouncing them? Faith will not be destroyed unless the arguments are convincing, and, in spite of the comfort claimed by Christians, it is seldom that an apostate wishes to regain his former faith. Richard Ellsworth, formerly an Episcopal minister, writes in THE TRUTH SEEKER: “The Rationalist maintains that men are happier under the system of thought that he represents than under any system of religion whatever.” To him it is perfectly plain that the Christian religion fails to produce the results claimed for it. The thought of hell alone is a constant source of unhappiness to the sincere Christian. All through his life his eternal salvation hangs in the balance. He sings, “Would God I were with thee,” but when asked if willing to go to heaven now, replies that he is not sure enough what the future life may be. Christianity has caused untold suffering by its principle of selective salvation, and the loss of a selfish, exclusive heaven for the few is a small price to pay for the abolition of eternal torment. The testimony of many physicians has shown that the Agnostic dies as peacefully as the believer. Christianity gives no assurance of happiness hereafter and restricts harmless enjoyment here, whereas the Humanist urges the largest measure of happiness for all in this world, and beyond this life finds no present need to make calculations.

Religion has been a comfort to many, especially to women, but is also a great source of tribulation. It cannot be a comfort to privately disbelieve many of the tenets of the church's creed and yet feel the necessity of training one's children in all the accepted doctrines. Conscientious people have suffered greatly from the inward struggle between doctrines and reason, and it is only a brave heart that can break away from the accepted belief on his own unsupported reasoning; but when sustained by the facts and proofs, so little known, an honest, intelligent conviction is easily maintained. The comfort from a religion that you do not thoroughly believe in is more imaginary than real, and when thought has become unfettered, there is no desire to return to the former prison. Many a church member who does not himself believe is opposed to any propaganda on the part of the Freethinker because it is so unpleasant to overthrow the existing order of things and face possible ostracism for renouncing the prevalent religion.

Church architecture, ceremonial and music appeal to the emotions and may stimulate a genuine spiritual and moral feeling in many of the congregation, but it is doubtful if such appeal is so much a call to morality, or spirituality, as to mere gratification of the senses; or if it is a spiritual appeal, the same results might be obtained from the same instruments if symbolic of morality in the abstract instead of its embodiment in an historical character. Monasteries and convents show the gloomy, unnatural side of such spiritual devotion. There is no need of abandoning any beauty or any assembling of those who wish to stand for the right in the community, but each congregation should formulate a platform in which it believes, rather than stand on inherited and decaying planks.

The Freethinker, therefore, considers that he is justified in destroying the faith of the Christian, not only because he has the legal, reciprocal rights of the missionary, but because freedom of thought provides greater happiness.

Another reason is that he gains in morality. “Many of the dogmas of Christianity, and among these the most essential to its existence, are, as viewed in the light of modern civilization, certainly immoral. The doctrine of vicarious atonement, which lies at the very basis of the Christian faith, is alone enough to condemn that creed in the eyes of truly moral people.” If a new religion were formed today, the sacrifice of the innocent for the guilty, and the conception of a God who created men to condemn them, would not be a part of it. It is reason and not revelation that has advanced the principles of morality, and the Freethinker naturally objects to the assumption that Christianity and morality are synonymous. Many a Jew is better than many a Christian, and many a man who admits that he does not know is more moral than the man who believes that his God will forgive his crimes provided he has perfect faith or makes the proper supplication. Often the most religious countries are the most immoral, and an enormous proportion of the occupants of jails profess a religious faith. If Christianity should not be blamed because men have failed to live up to its ideals, but only for its wrong doctrines and their interpretation, neither should it be credited with superior morality when the men who make a specialty of living and teaching Christianity are not restrained from sin to any greater extent than others.

In an article that appeared in 1913 in the orthodox Baptist Standard the delinquencies of ministers are frankly admitted, some of the reasons assigned being that "intellectual dishonesty results from habitually standing as a special pleader; as the defender of ground that has not been honestly, candidly examined. . . . Creeds may be small matters after all, but the teaching of a creed in which we do not believe is no small matter in its effects on the teacher." It is usually admitted that Christianity was not moral in the past when it tortured the innocent, burned heretics and witches, condemned infants to hell, and caused the death of almost 30,000,000 people. If its doctrines now are so diverse, may not some of them still be immoral? Religion can exist without morality and morality without religion.

Theoretically, the Christian acts rightly, or refrains from evil, in order to please or obey God, or for fear of eternal punishment, but it is quite likely that he is equally influenced by the wish to satisfy his conscience, or please his fellow men, or for fear of human laws—and the Atheist may have these same motives. "The other world gives no motive for doing well to him who finds no motive for it here." Sudden conversions to Christianity have brought about complete changes in the lives of dissolute men, but such splendid results may be due as much to the arguments and appeal of their friends who urge the outcast to pull himself together, as to a sudden belief in the divinity of Christ. In fact, the scientific cures for intemperance, for instance, can be more relied upon than religion for the average man.

There may be many conceptions of morality. If one thinks that the best man is one who reads the Bible, prays regularly and attends church, the Christian is more moral than others. If one thinks that it is more important to save one's soul than another's body, the Christian is more moral. If one thinks that to save one's soul he must save others' bodies, the Christian may or may not be more moral than the unbeliever who does equal work for others for humanitarian reasons only. If one thinks that radical changes now for the future welfare of the majority of mankind are superior to almsgiving, the orthodox Christian is less moral, for he is almost invariably more opposed to such sacrifices than the Freethinker.

Radium and the Frozen World.

Since the discovery of the element radium, there has been a considerable stir in the physical sciences, and because of the properties of this self-luminous substance and its presence within the earth, a theory has been advanced by certain physicists which is supposed to upset the present contentions of the geologist regarding the physical condition of the earth millions of years hence. It is assumed that instead of our earth becoming a frozen ball as cold as the surrounding space, it will become a radiant burning ball repeating the solar stage of its beginning.

There has been a wonderful progress in our knowledge of the earth's history since the days when Cuvier examined and classified the remains of the Mesozoic Saurians, to the time a century later when Becquerel discovered radio-activity. In his experiments with phosphorescent substances Becquerel has shown that uranium compounds continue to emit rays independent of any other action of light; thus in his photographic experiment with uranium salt he has disclosed a new property of matter which he called "radio-activity." Following up Becquerel's discovery the Curies, seeing that pitch-blende has a greater radio-activity than uranium salt, at once proceeded to reduce through a process of purification tons of pitch-blende in order to get at the true state of the radio-active element, which they succeeded in doing, and that which they had obtained after their laborious experiment was a minute quantity of colorless crystals, a chloride of a new metallic element which they named "radium."

Coming to the question here in consideration, it now remains to be seen whether the discovery of radium challenges in any way certain physical conclusions of astronomical and geological data. The broadest physical generalization that can be drawn from the phenomena of the cosmical realm is the evidence of gradual reduction of temperature. A world in the process of cooling transforms a vast amount of mechanical energy into the form of heat, but it is always less in amount than the energy lost in transforming it. To say that the radium in the earth can multiply its power to such an extent as to fuse the rocky masses to a white heat in millions of years to come, or that it may maintain the earth's temperature indefinitely, is only a bit of speculative exaggeration and can be borne out by no present or forthcoming physical factors of geological science.

Since the discovery of radium it has been claimed that the earth is not absolutely self-cooling, but is to a certain extent self-heating. This is quite true and had been in consideration for some years before our knowledge of the radio-active element. Of course the nature of radium has somewhat upset the calculations of certain physicists as to the duration of the sun's heat and the age of the earth, showing that their mathematical calculations were based on erroneous data. Thus were swept away the restrictions imposed on geological time, and the contentions of those geologists and biologists met approval who demanded a greater age for the earth. At present it may be contended that the presence of radium in the sun may be the cause of prolonging to a certain extent the life of the solar system. Thus it reasonably follows that the nature of radium, so far as known, does not disprove the theory of a frozen world, but gives us a better analysis of the elementary constitution of a world in the process of cooling.

According to the theory of planetary evolution, every individual world passes, or may pass, through all the successive stages and phases known to cosmogony. By the method of induction from the principle of a cooling globe we are able to depict future conditions with as much certainty as those of the past. In the remote past we see the earth in its embryonic form, a fiery nucleus in the arms of a spiral nebula, the parent form of our system. From the earliest stages of its separate existence, from the solar stage to its present state, the earth has been losing its heat, decreasing its velocity of rotation and shrinking in size.

In looking forward into distant future ages, we foresee the gradual continental degradation, a frozen world and a darkened sun.

In its progressive cooling this earth is passing through a series of winters, presenting two stages of refrigeration which forecast a third stage. The first is the seasonal winter which visits the temperate zones in turn as they reach a position furthest from the sun. Our winter comes on when the earth in its orbital journey around the sun attains the position of perihelion, or winter solstice. The annual winter had its beginning near the latter part of the Tertiary times.

The second stage or the glacial winter, it is assumed, commenced 240,000 years ago, lasted 160,000 years, and 80,000 years have elapsed since its decline. It is from this epoch we get the earliest evidence we possess of prehistoric man. According to Croll, it is reasonable to suppose there may be a recurrence of the great winter, but not followed with the same features of glaciation, for physical conditions of the earth and its atmosphere may be vastly different. Climatic changes show a passing from a moist and warm atmosphere towards a cold and dry one.

In the third or final winter the earth will attain the lunar stage of refrigeration, when all animal activity will have ceased and the earth, having given up all its internal heat and losing part of its solar energy, will be reduced to a temperature something near 270 centigrade degrees, like that of surrounding space.

The heat of our system is chiefly solar and is undergoing a gradual dissipation in space. This means that in the distant ages to come all members of our system will pass to a stage of total refrigeration.

THOS. M. JELINEK.

What Must We Believe?

Some months ago, at a public meeting held in Denver, a reverend gentleman said: "I have visited some of the Denver churches to learn if the teachings of the church have changed. It is true that some of the churches have damped the fires somewhat." So I addressed a number of clergymen by letter and asked the following question: "What does one have to believe to be a Christian?" It seems to me from some of the letters coming to me that the clergy themselves are at sea regarding what they have to believe to be Christians. I forward the most worthy reply that has been received. I believe this question needs to be propounded not only amongst Freethinkers, but amongst the Christians themselves.

The Rev. Dr. James A. Beebe of the Denver Life School of Theology replied in a letter, which I quote in part:

"What does one have to believe to be a Christian? First let me say that Christianity is not fundamentally a system of beliefs or a certain set of theological propositions about the metaphysical distinctions in the Godhead or the union of the human and the divine in Christ. There are certain outstanding beliefs that are to be found wherever Christianity takes root. For example, what is known as the distinctively Christian approach to the doctrine of immortality, or again the fact that in Christ we have the fullest and completest revelation that has ever been given to the world about the character of God. But my own belief is that one can accept all of these distinctively intellectual propositions concerning Christianity and yet fall short of being a Christian. And this is the first part of my answer to your question.

"I should say in the next place that from the moral and ethical point of view to be a Christian would mean to live by the teachings of Christ. I am thinking just now about those teachings that have to do with relationships as between man and man. This should include not simply the matter of personal Christian ethics, but social Christian ethics. With reference to this latter matter it may be said that many folks apply the teachings of Christ to some relationships and do not apply them to other relationships; that they are Christian in this sense in some things and pagan or non-Christian in other things. But to be a Christian in the moral and ethical sense, in the highest meaning of that term, means to apply with all the earnestness that one is capable the teachings of Christ to all of our human relationships.

"But having said all of this I have not yet given a proper definition of what it means to be a Christian, for Jesus was not primarily a social reformer nor a teacher of ethics or morals. His interest was in religion and religion concerns itself primarily with one's relationship to his God; and to be religious in the fullest Christian sense means not simply that one shall be on terms of right relationship with his fellowman, but that he shall be on terms of right relationship with his God, to be related to God in the way in which Christ said that men should be related to him, in the way in which Christ himself was related to him. Some of his own expressions are tremendously significant. 'The Father is with me,' 'I do always the things that please him,' and again, placing himself in the place of God, he indicated that men were to be related to him in exactly the same way in which they were to be related to God, 'I am the vine, ye are the branches; abide in me and I in you.'

"So this matter of being a Christian is not so much a matter of intellectual beliefs as it is an attitude of soul and spirit toward God and toward Christ. Still to keep close to the language of your question and to answer it briefly I should say that to be a Christian is to believe that Christ is still a living presence in the world with whom men may walk in daily fellowship and friendship; and that this experience of fellowship with Christ, which is the same in my thought as fellowship with God, will show itself forth in all of one's life and actions and is bound to control in one's relationships with his fellowmen. To walk with Christ, to be conscious of his presence, and to act under all circumstances in such a way as we believe will please him, this is to be a Christian."

In a rejoinder to the Rev. Beebe I said:

I thank you for your effort in your answer to my inquiry "What does one have to believe to be a Christian?" This question seems to be one filled with mystery, even for those who profess to be Christians. The many whom I have questioned do not really understand, even ministers themselves. I do not see any difference between "Christian morality" or "business morality" of the present day. Is it not simply a question of belief, giving up all logic or reason and accepting that which is taught to us? There are many religions in the world—Buddhism, Mohammedanism, Shintoism, Judaism, Braminism, etc.—all religions of belief. The Christian religion claims, first, the creation; second, fall of man; third, the flood; fourth, Moses; fifth, inspiration; sixth, prophecy; seventh, incarnation; eighth, birth of Christ; ninth, life of Christ; tenth, miracles and ministry; eleventh, crucifixion; twelfth, resurrection for forty days, then (thirteenth) ascension into heaven. So after all religion is not a matter of intellectual attainment or of reason. Simply say, "I believe and will live a better life."

You seem to confine social ethics to "social Christian ethics." Would it not be as well to use the words "Jewish social ethics"? Ethics do not belong to any set of believers, but to all classes of people. I must confess that I have not yet found Christians who live the life of Christ. I have come to this conclusion, that the Christian churches are becoming more rationalized, leaving the dogmas of dogmatic theology which has become obsolete in the discard. In my private talks with ministers about the questions I have numbered, I find that many of them do not profess very much of a belief in them. Yet I claim that to be a Christian one has to believe in the thirteen articles I have given. I pause again to ask, Who is the teacher of Christianity? Thousands of men in America are asking the question I have given to you. The working men and women of America are seeking an answer to this question, so it is not really a personal one with me. Your answer may find an audience of hundreds of thousands of men and women the world over.

The discussion closed with an invitation from Dr. Beebe to call and talk it over. He still insisted that Christianity is not primarily a set of beliefs.

Some of the gentlemen who replied were very kind and considerate. They believed that if I would consent to have them come and pray for me, the light would shine and I could see the error of my ways.

So the sixteenth chapter of Mark, beginning at the seventeenth verse, is not to be taken into our beliefs—never was intended to be believed; in other words, this was the joker in the deck.

I still want to know what I have to believe to be a Christian. Who can answer my question. I know that William Ashley Sunday never answered it while in Denver.

The Catholic church filled the world with the true knowledge of the one true devil. It filled the air with malicious phantoms, crowded innocent sleep with leering fiends, and gave the world to the domination of witches and wizards, spirits and spooks, goblins and ghosts, and butchered and burned thousands for the commission of impossible crimes.—R. G. Ingersoll.

Clergymen Who Praise Paine.

[In Des Moines, Iowa, recently, the Rev. C. W. Reese, pastor of the First Unitarian church of that city, took for his theme "Thomas Paine, Champion of Religion." The first part of the sermon contained an excellent outline of the history of Paine's life. The second part, which we reproduce, gave Paine's place in religion. Said the Rev. Dr. Reese:]

Paine wrote the "Age of Reason" with profound conviction. He wanted to save the people from unbelief and from hatred of one another. But for writing this sincere and masterly work he became the object of suspicion and hatred, and his Christian enemies have never yet ceased to attack his reputation and steal from him the honors for which he paid so dearly. But the soul of Thomas Paine still goes marching on. Now in America and everywhere, the truths he uttered, to the amazement of the those who read and heard, are the common utterances from a thousand pulpits. The heresy of Paine will be the orthodoxy of tomorrow. It is only now beginning to be generally known that the Fathers of this country—Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, Adams, and others—and the Men of Letters of America—Emerson, Hawthorne, Holmes, Lowell, Bryant and others—were all in general agreement with the religion of Thomas Paine. It is one of the strange things of all history that the country that builds monuments and institutions to these men, that remembers them in celebration after celebration with the singing of songs and the waving of flags, should fail to do sufficient honor to the man who did more than any two of them to make America the "home of the free." I suppose the reason is that Thomas Paine when dealing with religious matters, as with other questions, was not content for his mind to function in part only. James has taught us that for the mind to function properly it must not only say "I mean this" but also "I do not mean the other." Thomas Paine was not content to deal in positive generalities, he wanted to be understood and he was understood. His supreme crime was that he told the truth as he saw it, holding back nothing. He fearlessly lifted the veil from the age of superstition and ushered in the age of reason. If ever a man lived who saw religion in its purity and simplicity, that man was Thomas Paine.

"Any system of religion," he declared "that shocks the mind of a child cannot be a true system." And finding that the current church proclaimed dogmas that shocked children and transformed adults into gloating fiends, he said, "My own mind is my own church." He said: "I believe in one God, and no more; and I hope for happiness beyond this life. I believe in the equality of man; and I believe that religious duties consist in doing justice, loving mercy and endeavoring to make our fellow creatures happy." His whole system of theology magnified God but not at the expense of man, and not in violation of the texts of the sacred scripture of creation. The universe was his bible. In the immensity of creation he saw God's power. In the unchangeable order of things he saw God's wisdom. In the abundance with which the earth is filled he saw the munificence of God. In the blessings granted to the unthankful he saw the mercy of God. In the wonders of creation he found his proofs of God.

The man who said, "To do good is my religion," and who with all his mind, and heart, and soul lived that religion, was certainly one of the world's greatest champions of religion. If sin is man's failure to be true to his cause, then Thomas Paine was the least sinful of all sinners. His cause was to do good, and to free mankind from tyranny. This cause urged him on to fight for his fellow laborers in England; to cross the Atlantic and join his fortune with the soldiers on America's frozen battle fields; to recross to his mother country and risk his life giving them a vision of the "Rights of Man"; to cast his lot with struggling France; to languish in prison; to give to the world his "Age of Reason"; and, finally, to return to America, whose flag he had helped unfurl, and there face ingratitude sharp and bitter. But in spite of all the gloating fiends who under the cloak of religion dogged his steps to the gate of death, Thomas Paine passed from the world firm in the faith that had urged him on. His body lies I know not where, but his spirit fills the earth.

Another pulpit tribute to Paine was delivered a few Sundays ago by the Rev. John Haynes Holmes, minister of the Church of the Messiah, New York, who, speaking on "The International Mind," said:

"Wherever in any nation, as actually in all nations, men are weighted and broken with the yoke of tyranny, there the international mind would speak its sympathy and give its aid. Wherever men are struggling to break the shackles of political or economic bondage, there the international mind would declare and fight the war that is war. Wherever men are languishing in darkness, weeping in mute despair, or striking in mad revolt, there the international mind would see its brethren, in their state of misery behold its country, and in their dreams of better days and happier peoples feel the impulse of its patriotism. This was the idea of Thomas Paine, a true internationalist, when he said, 'Where liberty is not, there is my country'; and right nobly did he act upon this creed. When our forefathers took up arms against George III and his minister, Lord North, Thomas Paine, an Englishman, immediately came to this country, and espoused the cause of the revolting colonists. When, at the close of the American Revolution, there began in England that battle between autocracy and democracy which achieved its first great victory in the Reform Bill of 1832, Thomas Paine straightway returned to the mother country, and enlisted in the ranks of liberty. And when, a few years later, there burst forth the consuming flames of the French Revolution, Thomas Paine repaired at once to Paris, and there did valiant service for the emancipation of the French people from Bourbon rule. Here is the international mind, in its best estate, at work. It fights the battle not of kings but of ideas. It defends not the soil of nations but the soul of man. It moves within the borders not of a single people, but of that realm which is as wide as human need and as great as the glory of human service."

Robert and David.

(Lines addressed to a minister who delivered an oration on Robert Burns in which he characterized him as a great sinner, and also as the patron saint of Scotland.)

Most Reverend Sir, I here consent
To that in your oration,
Whar Rabbie ye mak patron saint,
Tae a' the Scottish nation,
Twad seem St. Andrew is a myth,
I ken nae ocht about him,
And books that I'm acquainted with,
But gie me cause tae doot him,
But Rab, we ken, was a' oor ain,
His name we a' adore it,
All reverence due tae him that's gane,
Oor patron saint, St. Robert,
And noo will ye mak me aquaint,
In what respect or manner,
Was Robert Burns so great a saint,
And yet so great a sinner?
"Great saints from greatest sinners come," Sounds somewhat educational,
That first a sinful race they run,
Ere they become devotional,
Twad seem that he, tae hear ye tell,
Was subject for a prison,
Or else a candidate for hell,
Wi sins past a' remission,
Since saint ye've made him, let's compare,
St. Robert, wi' St. David,
The man whom Scripture doth declare,
Was, after God, most perfect.
"Save in the matter of Uriah,"
He's free from condemnation,
And sits in heaven, by the most high,
In holy approbation,
Point to one sinful act in Burns,
I'll point a score in David,
His record, everywhere one turns,
Has little in't to save it,
E'en to the very death-bed scene,
So much there is one spurs,
That 'gainst the lech'rous Jewish king,
I'll champion Robert Burns.

The Idealists.

Who dreams shall live! And if we do not dream
Then we shall build no temple into time.
Yon dust cloud, whirling slow against the sun,
Was yesterday's cathedral, stirred to gold
By heedless footsteps of a passing world.
The faiths of stone and steel are failed of proof,
The king who made religion of a sword
Passes, and is forgotten in a day.
The crown he wore rots at a lily's root,
The rose unfurls her banners o'er his dust.

The dreamer dies, but never dies the dream,
Though death shall call the whirlwind to his aid,
Enlistment's passions, trick their hearts with hate,
Still shall the Vision live! Say nevermore
That dreams are fragile things. What else endures
Of all this broken world save only dreams!

—Dana Burnet.

The Child Divine.

Plead not with heaven's alien gods to bless
Some holy babe and mother far away.
Be thou thyself the god whose power shall stay
With human sympathy and love's caress—
The hungry babes and mothers of today!
Seek thou the lowly mothers first, for they Need most the touch of manhood's tenderness.

Round every infant brow an aureole gleams
However starved by greed's brutality.
The holy mother in each mother dreams
Above the infant cradled on her knee.
Sing not of ancient gods and ancient themes—
All babes enshrine whatever gods there be.

Herndon's Unmarked Grave.

I am in receipt of the following letter from Judge Jesse W. Weik of Greencastle, Ind., co-author with W. H. Herndon of Herndon and Weik's Life of Lincoln:

"GREENCASTLE, IND., March 12, 1917.

"MY DEAR MR. REMSBURG: I was recently in Springfield, Ill., and visited the grave of William H. Herndon and was surprised to find it unmarked. I enquired and learned that a suitable granite marker could be bought for a hundred dollars, and I am going to see that it is erected. I am going to give ten dollars, and already two friends have agreed to give five dollars each. Do you feel willing to help, and do you know any other Rationalists who would be willing to contribute? Very truly,
"JESSE W. WEIK."

Probably no man in America, excepting Thomas Paine, has been more foully calumniated by religious bigots than W. H. Herndon. And all because he had the honesty and courage to give the world the facts regarding the religious belief of Abraham Lincoln.

For years the press, imposed upon, gave wide publicity to these slanders. All efforts to trace them to their source proved ineffectual until 1880, when a friend in Ohio sent me a paper containing a portion of a communication from the Rev. Dr. J. A. Reed, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Springfield, in answer to a Christian who had addressed to him some inquiries concerning Lincoln's partner. It was in the form of a confidential letter whose contents were to be given to the public without disclosing their authorship. Naturally believing that the name of the author would add to the weight of his testimony the one addressed ignored the desire and made known the name of his informant.

Reed's testimony contained no less than sixteen deliberate falsehoods, such as "Herndon is a pauper and a common drunkard," etc., mostly veteran lies that had seen service in the attacks on Thomas Paine.

The discovery and exposure of this "Defender of Lincoln's Christian faith" produced a profound sensation in Springfield. The Daily Monitor in a lengthy editorial denounced the infamy. I quote one paragraph:

"Mr. Herndon is not a pauper, is not a drunkard; whisky did not ruin him, and, in a word, the whole thing is a lie. Mr. Herndon lives on his farm near this city. He is a great admirer of nature, loves flowers, and spends his whole time on the farm, except when doing his trading, or coming into the city to see his children or grandchildren. He don't drink, he don't chew tobacco, he don't gamble, he is honorable and truthful, and he is highly respected by his fellow-citizens. He is a great reader, a great thinker, loves his neighbors and his neighbors love him. He has a great, big, kind heart for his fellow-man in distress, and, while never worth considerable property, he has always had enough for his generous purposes. Just why this thing should be allowed we are at a loss to know, and have waited to see if some of those who profess so much of the Christ-like in their composition would not have enough of the man-like to be men, and not allow a good and true man as Mr. Herndon is to be thus infamously maligned and belied by those whose works in the salvation of men would have more effect if more akin to Christ in practice."

W. H. Herndon was one of the best men I have ever known. In nobility of character and in his mental attainments he was the peer of his illustrious partner. The Freethinkers of this country owe a debt of gratitude to him. He rescued the name of Lincoln from the slime of religious superstition and gave it to Rationalism. But for Herndon Lincoln today, with almost universal consent, would be conceded to the church.

Lincoln and Herndon were two of the pioneer Freethinkers of Illinois. They were of substantially the same belief. Lincoln since his death has been duly honored by his state and country. One of the loftiest monuments in Illinois surmounts his tomb. The memory of his beloved partner has been covered with obloquy. For twenty-six years his remains have reposed in a nameless grave, without even a cobblestone to mark their resting-place.

Judge Weik's proposal is a worthy and a timely one, and merits the approval of Rationalists everywhere. His call for help will, I am sure, be answered by a generous response. I suggest that those who wish to contribute to the work send their contributions to THE TRUTH SEEKER to be forwarded to Judge Weik. The American Secular Union will give $10 and more if needed. The cost of the marker need not be confined to $100. If more is raised a larger stone can be erected.

J. E. REMSBURG.

I have often had occasion to remark the fortitude with which women sustain the most overwhelming reverses of fortune. Those disasters which break down the spirit of a man and prostrate him in the dust seem to call forth all the energies of the softer sex, and give such intrepidity and elevation to their character, that at times it approaches to sublimity.—Washington Irving.

NOTES AT LARGE.

The Pacifists throughout the country are making a strong effort to impress the rest of the community with the idea that they alone represent the true teaching of Christ. They are urging the claim that they only are the true Christians. In explanation of their position they assert that the message of Jesus to the world was one of peace, and that in seeking to maintain peace, they are in perfect accord with the "mind of the Master." Such a contention is as false and no more justifiable than that of the German kaiser and his "Gott mit uns," as anyone may see for himself if he will consult the records. He will find there the "Master's" own unquestioned words set down plainly: "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace, but a sword. For I came to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother . . . and a man's foes shall be they of his own household." It is true that there are other sayings of Christ which seem to offset the harshness and severity of this one; but this is the case with every subject broached by the gospel writers. And herein lies the supreme difficulty of understanding the gospel "revelation," which because of its vagueness, reveals nothing. However, the idea conveyed in the text just presented cannot easily be misunderstood. It has always been held to express truly the intrinsic purpose of Jesus in coming into this world. He thus inexorably puts the question of righteousness, justice and truth, so it is said, in such a way, that there is no getting by it or around it. War is a true feature of Christianity, and all unbelievers are perfectly willing that the two shall always identify themselves. The real pacifists are the Freethinkers and liberal-minded religionists, who deeply realize that international conflicts are an insult to civilization, and are simply perpetuating, in an age of scientific and intellectual advancement, the worst features of an ignorant paganism. Wars will never cease till the lessons of the Christian Testament are forgotten, and the church itself has become but a memory throughout the land.

Henry George, like Thomas Paine, was a believer in God and natural religion. But his God was a Single Taxer. As we find Mr. George quoted in an exchange, he once said:

"Better to me is the Atheist who says there is no God, than the professed Christian, who, prating of the goodness and fatherhood of God, tells us that millions and millions of human creatures are brought into the world by the creative fiat, and no place in this world provided for them. Aye! tell us that by the laws of God, the poor are created in order that the rich may have the unctious satisfaction of doling out charity to them—tell us that a state of things which exists in great cities, where little children are dying every day, dying by hundreds of thousands, because, having come into this world—these children of God, by his decree—they find there is not space on the earth sufficient for them to live; and are driven out of the world because they can not get room enough for little children! I believe in no such God. If I did, though I might bend before him in fear, I would hate him in my heart."

In concluding that affairs as we find them, and as generally approved by the Christian world, are not so because God willed that they should be, Mr. George was probably right, though unorthodox. The universe is not governed by any will, but, as Humboldt affirmed, by law—the said law being that what has happened and does happen will continue to happen in the same circumstances, unless there is human intervention or other change of conditions. The Atheist who affirms the naturalistic and mechanical view may not be a "better" man than the Christian who believes that God has ordered all things according to the counsel of his own immutable and most righteous will and in praise of his glorious justice, but he is more logical and less imperfectly supported by present scientific knowledge. If an all-powerful deity having human relations really exists, he is chargeable with all that Mr. George says the professed Christians accuse him of. The facts of life are the evidence against him, and the suffering children of men are the accusing witnesses.

It is surmised by an anti-prohibition newspaper in Ohio that the bone-dry law that makes an exception in favor of ministers and priests, allowing them to import twenty gallons per month of sacramental wine, is liable to stimulate the increase of church organizations. The idea set forth is that the man thrown out of business by the dry law may feel that he has a call to preach, and that having called a few persons together he will form a congregation to whom he may administer the sacrament. The method is thus outlined:

"First a congregation of three, the minister joining in, will sing that grand old everlasting song, 'How Dry I Am!' Then the holy man will offer up a prayer against drought, and all the congregation shall say 'Amen.' Then the sacred man will produce the corkscrew and gently, reverently and without distorting his features, withdraw the cork from the demijohn or growler of suitable size, the congregation meanwhile remaining seated in silent meditation. Everything is now ready for the words of consecration. These the holy man will intone in a modulated voice, saying that the last time Jesus met the boys he set them up and passed the can around, so here's to. After the preacher, the others will take a deep swig in turn and keep on until the demijohn is empty. Then the congregation will adjourn to meet again at the call of the preacher."

We have had in New York a liquor law which while closing saloons on Sunday permitted the sale of liquor at social organizations called clubs. The result was the multiplication of such organizations for no other purpose than traffic in liquor. The visitor became a member by purchasing a ticket of admission, and the ticket entitled him to a drink. The exemption of ministers from the provision of the prohibitory law opens the way for an abuse similar if not of the same magnitude. The "Crimes of Preachers" records the cases of a number of bootlegging ministers.

The Philadelphia North American of recent date has this to say of Billy Sunday and his apparent effort to besmirch the character of American womanhood:

"It is quite proper to form your own estimate of the sources of his information when a loose-talking alleged 'evangelist' recklessly declares that 'our women, as a rule, turn their homes into third-rate gambling dens and booze joints'—with more such rattling of abusive words.

"If it were possible to take 'Billy' Sunday seriously, one might question what sort of women he knows and what sort of homes he has visited.

"But as it is not possible to expect his vocabulary to be restrained by facts, the only thing to do is to set the slanderer down as such, and to turn the cold shoulder of righteous indignation on the man who makes an alleged religious revival the occasion of foul abuse of American womanhood."

There can be no question of the fact that, because religious conditions in this country have made it possible for Billy Sunday to speak before large audiences, he has it within his power to do serious injury to the good opinions entertained by thousands of our fellow-citizens. The North American cites a real instance of this nature. We cannot imagine a more pronounced case of libel than this utterly groundless accusation against the best part of our conglomerate population. What a few women do among the leisure class is no proof that "our women, as a rule," make a like use of their homes, any more than the slangy and vulgar speech of this evangelist is a proof that our men as a rule indulge in a similar dialect. It is only the under-world that talks as does Sunday. He must have known that world to speak its language so well! It is about time that the respectable element of our community put a positive check upon the pulpit utterances of this religious money-grabber, unless the courts decide that he is a monomaniac, which will alone prove his irresponsibility.

The Boston Pilot (R. C.) exults over the disappearing Protestantism which is admitted by the orthodox ministers. At the same time the Pilot accepts the claim of the compilers of the Catholic Directory that the pope's followers in America are increasing in numbers. To quote:

"The continued growth and progress of the church is brought into greater relief by the unconcealable decadence of American Protestantism. Consternation reigns among the sects as they behold the constant falling off in their membership. The number of unchurched is appalling. Protestantism has lost its hold upon its former adherents, who have become indifferent and deaf to its appeals."

Unexpectedly a reply to this boast appears in another Catholic paper, the Citizen of Milwaukee, which says: "Be this as it may, nevertheless the Protestant churches annually report some increases in their total membership, whereas the Official Catholic Directory reports no increase in the Catholic population of the Boston archdiocese for the past year. The number of the unchurched grows, but we fear that fallen-away Catholics add to it." A half dozen of the big Protestant sects, whose members in the aggregate equal the Catholic population, report a growth of less than a half million in 1916 as against the Catholic increase (alleged) of about a million. The Protestants get their accessions by means of revivals; the Catholics, by immigration and reproduction.

A German lieutenant who fell in Champagne, France, and whose words are quoted by Eden Phillpotts in the Literary Guide, wrote that the suffering which he faced had the effect of uniting him in feeling with the soldiers in the trenches on the other side, and that if he lived to get back he would betake himself to a study of the thoughts of those who were now his enemies. Another German soldier wrote to a friend in Switzerland: "They talk of a holy war. I know of no holy war. I know of one war which is the sum of all that is inhuman, impious and bestial in man." This is first-hand opinion. The religious value of war is seen only by the monarchs and the theologians like the bishop of London, who asserts that the war is of God. The horrors of war are indescribable. Walt Whitman, who had been a war nurse, said in homely but vivid phrase, that war was one-tenth glory and nine-tenths diarrhoea. One of the European correspondents said that war cannot be seen and heard; it must be smelt. It puts men in the shambles and the sewers. The police of New York have just received an official reminder of the proclamation by Congress that all persons who condone assassination of officials are to be arrested. Why exempt officials who advocate the assassination of persons that accompanies war and is the result of the glorification of war as a thing of God or as a biological necessity?

The Truth Seeker Company is indebted to the Masses for a review of Haeckel's "Eternity: World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion and the Theory of Evolution." The reviewer, Mr. Robert H. Lowie, takes issue with the author on what he calls Haeckel's "monstrous conception" that the "highest developed European peoples" are separated from the "lowest savages" by a wider gulf than that between savage and anthropoid ape. Haeckel's dictum is based on intellectual, not structural, differences, and would seem to be justified. As to physical variations, Huxley said in 1863 that "Whatever system of organs be studied, the comparison of their anatomy leads to one and the same result—the structural differences which separate man from the anthropoid apes are not so great as those which separate the anthropoids from the lower apes." Haeckel's statement cannot be accurately judged when in the quotation of it the reviewer omits to state that the author is speaking of "cultural and psychological differences." The lowest savages have more of the habits of the ape than of the highest developed European peoples. The feeling that such a conception as that of Haeckel is "monstrous" arises from the notion that all human beings are made in the image of God and are by him endowed with souls that are to be saved or lost. When the theological is replaced by the naturalistic view, there is nothing shocking about Haeckel's statement.

So many priests have been absorbed by the French and Italian armies that the church has appealed to Americans to urge young men into study for the priesthood. There would be a good field in the warring countries for the priests of Mexico, who obviously are not wanted in their own; and perhaps the people of Italy and France are not themselves suffering from the clerical shortage, since the clamor for more priests does not come from the populace. In America there is always a shortage of clerical material, although priests and ministers are exempt from all civic duties. The churches here, Catholic and Protestant, exceed the ministers in numbers by about 50,000. We recently read that Belmont county, in Ohio, had five pastorless churches on account of the shortage; and only two in three of the Catholic parishes in the country at large have resident pastors.

A friend sends us some copies of the Beaver Pa., Daily Times. They are back numbers. One is dated May 27, 1912, and a heading says: "Billy Sunday Preaches Memorial Sermon, Eloquence Shame His Knockers." Without pausing to interpret this language, we dip into the "sermon," catching these phrases: "Ladies, Friends and Comrades: It is with much pleasure that I accept your kind invitation to deliver the Memorial sermon today. . . . Did you ever feel the poverty of the human language? Did you ever think to yourself how poor words are to express your feelings? . . . This is a day for memory and for tears. A mighty nation bends above its honored graves and pays to noble dust the tearful tribute of its love." And so on. Billy found the words, but, as he has since been many times reminded, it was not an original discovery.

When George J. Lintner died it was found that his will, registered in Allegheny county, Pa., contained this clause:

"I do hereby give, devise and bequeath the sum of $50 to St. _____ R. C. Church of Pittsburgh, Pa., to be used for Masses for the repose of my soul."

He spent more for his "sole" than he did for an education that might have enabled him to spell it. And yet, with an education, he might have omitted the bequest.

DR. WAKEFIELD'S GUESSES.

From David Eccles, Maryland.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

When it comes to speculating without solid facts, on mere assumptions, Dr. Homer Wakefield has no peer. His intellectual gyrations are calculated to make a plodding thinker like myself dizzy. No matter where he lands, all of his conclusions are "without doubt." He speaks with authority, and not like an ordinary scribe. Both Jesuses, he says, "were, without doubt, fabricated by Gentiles as lures to Jewish converts." My nature is to doubt till doubt becomes an impossibility. I doubt even so cock-sure an authority as Dr. Wakefield. I doubt that he has "disposed of Josephus and Origen as subjects of debate." The trouble with the doctor is that he goes off at half-cock before all the evidence is in.

In the Origen matter, if he had waited a little before boasting, he would have discovered that he is "most ignorant of what he is most assured." He never read Origen's reply to Celsus; hence his opinions are not worth a tinker's imprecation, even though those opinions vary through three contradictory hypotheses, all "without doubt." It might save him some humiliation if he would harbor an occasional doubt about matters that can never be fully confirmed or disproved. While I have a fair confidence in the truth of my own theory, I do not present it as one "without doubt." It would take more evidence than I am able to marshal to make it indubitable; though I consider it immeasurably more certain than the majority of the wild guesses Dr. Wakefield indulges in, such as that the insane Jesus, son of Ananus, formed a nucleus for the gospel story; or that the Gentiles fabricated Jewish messiahs "as a lure to Jewish converts." The latter hypothesis is so improbable as to approach the border of stupidity. It is a complete inversion of all the facts we know. To make it true, Paul's epistles must all have been forged. He had the idea in his head that he was the first to preach to the Gentiles, and the whole context of the various epistles and gospels bears out this conclusion. But according to Mr. Wakefield the entire story, with its mutual contradictions, is a skillful lure.

When Paul said that before his time the Gentiles were "without Christ, being alien from the commonwealth of Israel, having no hope and without God in the world," and that Jesus was the "seed of David and a member of the circumcision," that was a "lure"; the Jewish Jesus who referred to Gentiles as swine and dogs, and instructed his disciples not to go near them, was another lure; the quarrel between Paul and Peter about circumcision was another lure; the abhorrence of Peter against preaching to Gentiles was another lure; his reference in his so-called epistle to his followers as "a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people," and his instructions to the women to take Sarah as an example "whose daughters ye are," as also his advice to let their "conversation be honest among the Gentiles who speak against you as evil doers," etc., was all a wonderfully concocted lure; James's dedication of his epistles "to the twelve tribes scattered abroad" was another lure, and John's denunciation of those who try to make themselves out as Jews but are not as "liars and the household of Satan" was but a shrewd continuation of this deeply-laid Gentile lure; the innumerable contradictions between Jewish belief and Gentile philosophy and mythology put into Jesus' mouth was a continuation of this lure, and so successfully was the whole scheme worked out that the world's historians are practically unanimous in the assertion that the first followers of Christianity were all Jews. The man who can believe all this the product of a lure has such a lurid imagination that I begin to think it a waste of time to reply to him. The lure was when the Gentiles made Jesus send his disciples into all the world to preach.

Why waste two and one-half columns in a debate to prove the Jesus story in the Gospel a composite? I told Mr. Wakefield once before that that is like trying to force an open door. It is a part of my own theory, and can only be dwelt upon to lead the reader's mind away from the points at issue. The Jesus of Matthew, Mark, and Luke have no marked dissimilarities; the Jesus of John is a more evolved Gentile character. I am not going to be led from the main subject to follow the doctor through a lot of unprovable guesses, however.

My theory is not a guess. It is a deduction from facts. Mr. Wakefield seeks to deny originality on the ground that others have claimed that Jesus lived to be fifty years of age long before me. Does he imagine for one minute that with Waite and Remsburg and Taylor and commentaries on the Bible all around me I could escape knowing this? I stated specifically that Waite put Jesus' birth twenty years ahead of the time Matthew assigned to cover the probability that he was over fifty years old when he died. The statement of Ireneus has nothing to do with my theory. Ireneus made a very early and sensible deduction from the words contained in Matthew. It was legitimate. But that in itself fixes nothing as to the time Christ lived. I have submitted the evidence from the Bible that Jesus was born near the death of John the Baptist, and lived to tell of the death of Zacharias, and that Josephus refers to a living Christ, the brother of an unknown James, just a few years ahead of the death of this Zacharias whom Jesus refers to. How does it happen that this period, which the Bible fixes for me, amounts to about the reputed time assigned by the Jews to the life of Christ, i. e., forty-five to fifty years? That is the file I want the doctor to gnaw at, and leave all else alone. He has utterly refused to consider this evidence, beyond seeking to invalidate the test of Josephus, and at the same time inconsistently tries to show that the James referred to was James the Just. The doctor is the most hospitable man to contradictory theories it has even been my fortune to meet.

Spring is here and I can waste no more time on this subject. To overthrow me, Dr. Wakefield will have to find me a copy of Origen's reply to Celsus that does not contain the passage I quoted, wherein he refers to Josephus' use of the words "James the Brother of Jesus who was called Christ," and tell me how he came to use the same quotation many years before in his "Commentary on Matthew."

As the forty-seventh chapter of Origen's reply to Celsus is occupied almost exclusively in telling us what Josephus said about John the Baptist, and what Jesus ought to have said about Christ, but only came near enough to tell about his brother James the Just, who was not a real brother, and why he was not so, etc., he will have to find me a book of Origen's controversy without the forty-seventh chapter. Then he can complacently write that he has "disposed of the Josephus and Origen debate." His present boast is a little premature. He will also have to find us an authority who offers more than a suspicion that the text quoted from Josephus is forged. The use of the words in this text twice by Origen, many years apart, proves conclusively that it was there, or that he forged it many years before his debate with Celsus. Who will prove this? A guess is not proof. In his Commentary, Origen quotes the exact place. In his debate he quotes the words, but does not give the place, merely imputing them to Josephus, and adding the gratuitous comment that the James Josephus referred to was James the Just. Where he got this tradition I do not know. No text of Josephus now extant refers to "James the Just."

Mr. Hugh Martin, I see, wants to indulge in a little legal word splitting, which I have no time for. My quotation was sufficiently strong as to Origen's reference to the disputed text in Josephus to cause Dr. Wakefield to question its authenticity and to assert that "no ecclesiastical or profane writer" had ever quoted it. Here was where he betrayed his want of information, for I have shown, and can produce more evidence, that it has been quoted for centuries.

The messiah idea is as old as the Jewish religion. Perhaps Gentiles invented that also "as a lure." When it comes to theorizing, Dr. Wakefield is willing to grasp any old straw to keep him floating. That a miseducated Jew should think himself a messiah is quite natural. I am dealing solely with probabilities. Those who do not wish to see will not see, and it is time wasted to try to make them. Their stupidity is in the assumption that I do not know their authorities. I read all they can say forty years ago.

JOSEPHUS QUOTATION PROVED FRAUDULENT.

From Homer Wakefield, M.D., Illinois.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I feel that I owe your readers an apology for my incautiousness in the reading of Mr. David Eccles' article (T. S. Feb. 3) in not noting a complete change of position by Mr. Eccles, in which, by a quotation from Origen, he himself refuted his former allegations and put forward a new postulate. Instead of further denying the interpolation in Josephus of the words "who was brother of Jesus the one called the Christ," he now alleges an interpolation by someone in Origen of the words "ought to have said," perhaps by a "pure myth theorist."

In former articles in contradiction of my statements, Mr. Eccles has taken the position that at the time Origen replied to Celsus, he (Origen) quoted Josephus as substantiating the historicity of Jesus, and, moreover, that the minor passage concerning Jesus in Josephus was not a forgery or an interpolation, but was written there by Josephus. I contended, to the contrary, that this passage was a forged interpolation, and was not thus cited by Origen against Celsus; and I offered an hypothesis that Origen was the guilty one, the forger of the interpolation that appeared later.

In his article of Feb. 3 Mr. Eccles begins by reasserting his original postulate that Origen did, as he expressed it, use Josephus against Celsus (implying to establish the historicity of Jesus), and quotes from Origen as though to substantiate his statement; but if we follow him we observe what escaped me when I answered it, namely, his change of position. It contradicts his (Eccles') allegations, and to meet it he advances the new hypothesis that his copy of Origen has really been interpolated, not by pious forgers this time, however, but by someone else in some other interest.

Origen shows conclusively in his answer to Celsus (250 A. D.) that he recognized that Josephus had not substantiated in any way the historicity of Jesus up to that time and therefore could not have done so prior to that time when he (Origen) wrote his Commentary on Matthew in A. D. 230. What better proof does Mr. Eccles want than that the words "the brother of Jesus, the one called Christ," in the earlier mentioned reference to Josephus was a forged interpolation? Origen's mention that Josephus ought to have said what was necessary to substantiate Jesus' historicity is proof sufficient that he did not say it.

To quote from Mr. Eccles' article: "The fact is he did use it on Celsus" . . . he did "provide it for that exigency, in spite of the doctor's denial, based on his confidence in lame authority." He then quotes from Origen: "The same Josephus, also, although he did not believe in Jesus as the Christ, when he was enquiring as to the causes of the destruction of Jerusalem . . . ought to have said that their machinations against Jesus was the cause of their miseries; yet, as one not remote from the truth said, 'these miseries befel the Jews by way of revenge for James the Just, who was the brother of Jesus that was called' the Christ."

It would appear that the fact that Origen here states what Josephus "ought to have said" (but did not say), when he answered Celsus, which Mr. Eccles tells us was written in A. D. 250, and that some of the later manuscripts of Josephus contained exactly these words identifying James the Just as the brother of Jesus the one called Christ, shows conclusively that Origen or another copying his diction (characteristic to the New Testament, and not to Josephus), later interpolated the same in Josephus. I crave pardon for being so remiss in seizing upon so good a point supporting the hypothesis advanced by me that Origen, rather than Eusebius, committed the forgery in Josephus.

Professor William B. Smith (Ecce Deus, p. 341), after devoting many pages to answering all apologists who had the date of his postscript contended the genuineness of the Josephus passages at issue, states that the authenticating of this minor passage is the last resort to save what must be saved if the historicity of Jesus is to be plausibly defended. Certainly we may recognize the truth of this statement when we stop to consider the desperate manner in which Mr. Eccles has attempted to defend it, first by denying the act of interpolation and finally by alleging interpolation in Origen of the words "ought to have said," in his own favor.

If there was no other proof of this pious fraud, and if all Josephus manuscripts extant contained the minor interpolation, and if Origen's manuscripts omitted the words "ought to have said," I should still regard the manner in which Josephus is made to identify James the Just solely by making him the brother of Jesus, when Jesus was not otherwise noticed by Josephus (Mr. Eccles admits the other reference to Jesus a forgery), followed by an explanation that Jesus was not his brother other than in a church sense, as extremely suspicious. It is illogical.

I can hardly believe Mr. Eccles is serious in alleging that the words "ought to have said" are interpolations. It is so incredible and beyond all reason that I must come to the conclusion he is joking and seeking to end up our little debate with a joke on me. The gentleman is an entire stranger to me, but since he has on several occasions during our discussion exhibited some Rationalistic sentiments, I must conclude now that he is not serious in his new position. I prefer to think that, rather than that obsession and prejudice alone could be responsible for it. I am prepared for a good laugh, with the joke on me. If I am wrong, let us pray, Brother Eccles leading us.

WELL PLEASED.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Apropos of the communications received by you, as to what THE TRUTH SEEKER should and should not contain, the writer deposes as follows:

Although there are some articles which interest me more than others, I read it, as the believer believes his Bible, "from kiver to kiver." In spite or because of this comprehensive survey, I am unable to find any fault whatsoever. My ballot is therefore that you continue to cut my copy from the same bolt and according to the same pattern. Any suggestion on my part would be simply for larger doses of the same prescription; for it doesn't last the week out very well. Having taken my own dose, I pass it on, always first exacting the promise that the recipient will keep the copy moving. I have had the pleasure of bringing the delightful discovery to several, that such a paper is in existence. And I myself was long in need of such a periodical before I was introduced to it. I am an economic crank, and think Free-thought indissolubly bound up with economics. But I would be sorry to have you give economics any more prominence, or drop it completely. One page is the happy proportion. Anything denied free expression strikes at Free-thought. Birth-control and informal marriage schemes touch the cause here.

HOW TO END THE WAR.

From W. N. Besant, New York.

On December 19, 1916, the New York Evening Telegram published an article entitled "Peace in the Hands of God, the Kaiser Tells His Troops."

How can God's shepherds keep silent with such mockery! The war was started by prayers, each ruler calling on God and the people to help him in the struggle to kill, slaughter and cut asunder men, women and children, regardless of all laws, suffering or starvation; but by all means win this war. All of our earthly shepherds seem to be degenerating. In olden times the war lord walked up to a river or sea, stretched out his hand and demanded the water to part so that his followers could walk through on dry land. The pursuers that followed were all swallowed up and the war was ended. The damnable mockery of these days! Get the right spirit; pray and believe. Call to the mountains that they be cast into the bottom of the sea. They have fooled the world long enough now and have been silent until now. Let the press of the world take the duties out of the hands of the earthly shepherds. Tell the Kaiser how to end this war in twenty-four hours. Perhaps the Kaiser does not know, and his shepherds do not tell him, or perhaps dare not tell him, to get his army all together at one time before their cruel enemies; have them all get ready and call on his God, and tell him to put himself and his men in his hands; tell his men to throw down their guns and weapons; ask God to save them from shot and shell; they say he can do it, then the war would be ended in twenty-four hours surely.

All the churches some time ago throughout the world started out with prayer. I have been waiting to see the good results; it was answered by submarines and death dealing instruments. The churches must be degenerating. The press of the world has been civilizing the world. Let them come out boldly and tell the world, the people in the world, which is the Power of the world. The press can sow the seed to the people if they will, and there will be no more wars. When these rulers want to add more stars to their crowns they tell their people God tells them to go to war and make one people. There is one God! They believe him. Why not? The press can give you food for thought and without fear to end wars for all time. When these rulers get uneasy and want to make wars and strife and tell their people they are inspired by God, let them come out boldly and show the people that they are of God and possessed with Godly power, and show some miracles. Let the ruler go out into the sea and say to his God and the people, "O God, I am thy servant, I believe in thee, O Lord, and thou canst help me to show the people the truth I have told them," and without life preservers walk on the water safely to land! Then he could say to his people, "Trust me, I will show you bigger things." If he sinks to the bottom there would be no war. He would surely sink. Let the press come to the front; of the next generation we do not know; tell us.

SHOW YOUR COLORS.

From F. L. Joslyn, New Jersey.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I was much interested in the letter of William Haskell in the issue of March 3. His selections are good, and here are some that are pretty nifty; neat but not gaudy, I should say. Gen. xv, 4; xix, 8; xx, 31-36; Lev. xviii; Esther ii; Prov. v, 18-20; vi, 25, 26; vii, 8-21; Song Sol., v, 4; vi, 6-8; vii, 1-3; i, 13; viii, 8. For one hundred per cent. slush see Gen. xvi. That Isaiah was high of stature and had some experience with boarding-houses, is indicated in Is. xxviii, 20. He should have gone to Missouri, where the statute requires that bed sheets shall be nine feet long, width not specified.

I was much pleased with an article in a recent issue in regard to encouragement of those Infidels who hesitate to state their views for fear of censure, etc. I have been an Infidel since my early teens, but until lately I have hesitated to express my views, thinking it better policy in a superstitious community to dodge the question. But I have come to the conclusion that Ingersoll answered my question years ago. He said that the best thing was to be honest, and Ingersoll is good enough for me. So now when belief is discussed near me I promptly state that my belief can be written on the piece of paper punched out of a transfer. The Lord's prayer has been engraved on the head of a pin, and my entire creed can be engraved on the point. Christianity is the curse of the earth; and I am unalterably opposed to all forms of superstitious graft. And I want to say to the faltering Infidels, that so long as you hesitate to tell your honest opinions, and to come out squarely for truth and right, you have not gotten all the superstition out of your system; you are not honest with yourself, or fair to your fellow citizens and our country, and you are unworthy of the great Infidels who have gone before you and made this world safe for honest folks to live in. By being honest, you will always make some enemies, but you will also make friends and they will be friends well worth having, and you will also be an inspiration to other doubters who may be somewhat timid about declaring themselves.

When you come to a saloon or a church, do like the pharisee, pass by on the other side. What fine houses some churches would be for bodies to live in, instead of for ideas to die in! Some preachers I see are big enough to work. If people in your house get singing hymns, try a nice, rollicking tune on your phonograph. It will clear the air wonderfully. I have been reading a book called "Remarkable Answers to Prayer." There are some wonderful answers, indeed. Isn't it awful to be prayed for? Psychologists tell us that when we worry about some one we injure him. If this be true, when believers pray for us, are they not a positive obstacle to our liberty and welfare? Are not those who pray for us our enemies rather than our friends?

The followers of the man of Nazareth had a shed revival here this winter. It raged for six weeks before it was entirely extinguished. When the receipts were counted it was found that the soul-saving hysteria had been very successful. People sometimes ask me why I do not go to church. I tell them that I do not go in saloons, gambling-joints or churches. This answer is usually sufficient. A sanctimonious old hypocrite once came in my place of business, rubbing his hands; he went out holding his ears.

When God wrote the Bible he forgot to sign his name. He didn't even make a cross till he got almost through. No attention should be given to anonymous communications. He would have saved his children a lot of trouble if he had told them what it was all about and what it all meant. I think that if he had had the sweet companionship of a nice, loving woman, he might have controlled his temper and used more chaste language. I think history shows that as people get away from God, they use the women better, and yet the women fill the churches and send their best work (the children) to Sunday-school! There are many parents who drink or smoke, but who do not want their children to indulge. Then why, oh! why, mother, will you send your sweet babe to the pest-houses of ignorance? One Sunday afternoon I sat in the beautiful sunshine, reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, when two little girls came in from Sunday school trying to sing some dreary stuff they had learned, and looking generally dejected. I put a waltz record in motion and you should have seen the transformation. They forgot the sob-stuff they didn't understand and got busy with some pretty little dance they did understand and enjoyed themselves. Now I ask who was the better man, the one who wrote the hymn or the genius Edison, who made the phonograph? Who was the better friend, the teacher who filled their ears with trash or the Infidel who filled their hearts with music? I see only one conclusion.

"GOD AND THE CHILDREN."

From G. F. G. Morgan, California.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

That was an excellent article by Prof. Leuba! I was trained for and ordained to the Christian ministry, in which I spent ten years in active work before I deserted it and turned to medicine. I learned the impracticableness of the average Sunday school teachings.

When separated, by work, from my family of four children, I enjoined upon my wife to abandon teachings of heaven and hell, to train up our boys and girls in a love for right, truth, justice and honesty, and to stimulate and encourage a self-conscious pride—if I may so express it—in a good character and a good name before men.

As a sect of ancestor worshipers, I must admire the Jews. As a sect, they are highly domestic. Their relations between husband and wife, parents and children are not equaled, as a class, by the average Christian. They teach their children practical living. Is their god the Hebrew Bible being? No; their children are taught to reverence their parents and to be loyal and true to the traditions of their family and to society. This sums up their whole duty.

A short time before the death of Mutsuhito, the late Emperor of Japan, he issued a Rescript, addressed to all Japanese, on the matter of personal duty of the individual. It was all summed up in three paragraphs: First, duty to parents; second, duty to the nation; third, duty to self. It was a remarkably simple, clear and convincingly comprehensive statement of human duty. Mutsuhito was a modern Marcus Aurelius. Can not non-Jewish sects take a few pages or leaves out of the Jewish child instruction book?

How few people realize the depth of thought and significance in and of that splendid aphorism of and by Robert Ingersoll: "An honest God's the noblest work of man."

PRESIDENT WILSON'S INAUGURAL.

From A. A. Soreng, Wisconsin.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

President Wilson's Inaugural Address expresses, in the main, truly patriotic and American sentiments; but one thing seems strange, that the chief magistrate of this secular republic should vie with the crowned heads of monarchies in uttering pious expressions at state occasions; as, for instance, when he mentions "God's providence"; and again when he says: "I pray God I may be given the wisdom and the prudence to do my duty in the true spirit of this great people."

To kiss that fetich, the Bible, at the passage reading "The Lord is our refuge; a very present help in time of trouble," is just a big piece of monkey shine unbefitting an official of that most exalted position, President of the United States of America. Why do not our statesmen "cut it out"? But of course the hypocrisy and humbuggery is done in order to please the church people.

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

William Edward Hartpole Lecky, March 26, 1838-October 22, 1903.

That the greatest of historians have been Freethinkers is well known. History should be a record of facts. The Freethinker bases all his convictions on facts. Histories written by theologians are well known to be full of fictions. What wonder, when theologians base their opinions on fictions? William Edward Hartpole Lecky was born at Newtown Park, near Dublin, Ireland, March 26, 1838. He graduated from Trinity College, Dublin, in 1859, where he studied theology for the purpose of entering the ministry of the Irish Protestant church. His opinions changed, however, as can be seen by an anonymous work he published in 1860, entitled "The Religious Tendencies of the Age." He abandoned the ministry and determined to devote his life to history. From this time on he was a voluminous writer. He published in 1861 "Leaders of Public Opinion in Ireland"; "History of the Rise and Influence of Rationalism in Europe" (1865), and in 1869, "A History of European Morals from Augustus to Charlemagne. He opens this work with a chapter on "The Natural History of Morals." This gave great offense to religionists, but the facts he there stated are today accepted by all except some theologians. Mr. Lecky next devoted himself to his "History of England During the Eighteenth Century." This was completed in eight volumes in 1890, and the Encyclopedia Britannica says that it proves Lecky to have possessed many of the qualities of a great historian. In 1891 he published a volume of poems which was not a success. He was a great historian, but not a poet. His "Democracy and Liberty" appeared in 1896. He was not optimistic as to the outcome of democracies. He had visited the United States, studied conditions, and gave as his opinion that in no European government would such corruption in public affairs be tolerated, as he saw in this country. His "Map of Life," published in 1890, discusses ethical problems.

While an Irishman and desiring the good of the Irish people, he was opposed to Home Rule, and in 1895, Dublin University sent him to Parliament as a Unionist member. Other honors conferred on him were: Privy councillor (1897); made a member of the "Order of Merit," (1902). He had received the degrees of LL.D. from Dublin, St. Andrew's and Glasgow; D.C.L. from Oxford, and Litt.D. from Cambridge. Mr. Lecky was married in 1871 to Elizabeth, Baroness de Dedem, daughter of Baron de Dedem, a general in the Dutch army. He died October 22, 1903. In 1908 a volume of his "Historical and Political Essays" was published.

Other events of which the past week is the anniversary are:

March 25, Geo. Evans, land reformer, born, 1805, died 1856.
March 27, Free State Convention at Leavenworth, Kansas, 1857.
March 28, Condorcet died, 1794. Benjamin Thompson (Count Rumford), born, 1753.
March 29, Buchner born, 1824. Swedenborg died, 1772.

Brave War Dogs.

When the historian records the story of this great war one chapter will be devoted to the great work done by dogs, says a correspondent in the Mail and Empire.

Practically all the European nations have used dogs in one way or another. They have been on the battle-field attached to the ambulance corps, on patrol duty. They have been despatch carriers and scouts, and when the invasion of Belgium took place they drew the quick-firing guns to the front line.

In addition to their work on the battle-field, dogs did much to aid refugees. They took their masters and their families out of the line of invasion.

War correspondents have told how much sagacity and courage the Belgian draught dogs displayed upon the battle-field at Haelen, where, with the aid of Colonel Isaac Newton Lewis' machine gun, they held back for a time the German advance through Belgium.

Just how many wounded men on both sides of the firing line have been saved by sheep-dogs and other breeds probably never will be known. These dogs have been trained to search for wounded, and by taking a man's cap to headquarters in the field a trained nurse or doctor follows the dog, who leads back to the place where the man is lying. Frequently a wounded man with his last ounce of strength will use it to drag himself out of the line of fire. It is in the out-of-the-way places that the dog has been particularly valuable.

If dogs were given medals for valor or for distinguished services on the battle-field, doubtless thousands would have won the coveted cross of war, for there have been instances without number on both sides where they have distinguished themselves.

Attached to a French command was a dog named Michael, larger, stronger, more intelligent than the others and of a gentle nature that made him a general favorite. Michael, although most "sociable," centered his particular affections upon a young French soldier named Henri. Every day at the soup hour Michael would appear carrying a tin can and place it beside Henri, who would fill it as he did his own, and they would dine together.

The day came, however, when Henri failed to return, and as the men stumbled back again to safety Michael scanned, with anxious eyes, each pale, haggard face, his sensitive nostrils quivering with dread.

When the last man had been accounted for and Henri was still missing the animal darted toward the battle-field and after some time returned, greatly excited and carrying an old half-glove which belonged to his friend. He could scarcely wait for the attendants to bring a litter before he started off again, his great, intelligent eyes imploring them to hurry.

In a remote part of the field they found the young fellow lying still and cold. After a hasty examination the attendants left him for dead, hurrying away to succor the living, but Michael refused to be convinced. Again and again he returned for assistance, but in vain, so he mounted his solitary guard, his face almost humanly expressive of grief.

The attack took place about sundown, and it was not until late that night that comparative quiet settled down upon the trenches.

Suddenly the moon flashed from behind a cloud, and the alert sentinel peered sharply about, then brought his rifle swiftly to his shoulder.

Not twenty feet away, creeping slowly towards the trenches, but halting abruptly every minute, loomed a large, dark object. The sentry advanced cautiously, finger on trigger, demanding curtly, "Who goes there?" followed by the stifled exclamation, "Michael!"

Michael it was, gasping, panting, but still the same old dog Michael—but not alone. Behind him, parts of his uniform literally torn away by the dog's teeth, lay Henri, dragged from the battle-field, inch by inch, by the devoted animal. And, miracle of miracles, the boy was actually breathing.

How the animal had accomplished such a Herculean task and escaped the vigilant eyes of the field attendants will forever remain a mystery, but suffice to say that little, fragile-looking Henri ultimately recovered, to challenge death once more at the front.—Our Dumb Animals.

Missed His Chances.

Mr. Sidener had made his first public speech and waited for his wife's verdict. He expected her to say, "Oh, it was simply great, Eddy"; but they were half-way home, and she had said nothing. "Well," he began awkwardly, "what did you think of my speech?" "What you said was all right," she answered with guarded enthusiasm, "but you didn't make the most of your opportunities." "Opportunities?" repeated Mr. Sidener. "What do you mean, Effie?" "Why," Mrs. Sidener replied, "you had ever so many chances to sit down before you did."

How About It?

"Father."
"Well, what is it?"
"It says here, 'A man is known by the company he keeps.' Is that so, father?"
"Yes, yes, yes."
"Well, father, if a good man keeps company with a bad man, is the good man bad because he keeps company with the bad man, and is the bad man good because he keeps company with the good man?"—Punch.

"Well, I am going back to town at once," was the boy's astonishing reply. "I won't stand a school where they do their licking by electricity."

THE FREETHOUGHT BADGE PIN

Dedicated to all honest men and women—to those who can and are willing to reason—who constitute the grand army of progressive thinkers throughout the world.

An Emblem of Freedom and Progress

Represents no lodge, order or society, but is designed as a token of recognition for progressive minds of every shade of thought.

All claiming to be free from superstition, all who base their belief upon science and reason, should wear this emblem to speed the grand work of emancipating humanity from the thralldom of mental darkness.

This is conceded by artists and the trade to be the most beautiful Badge ever designed. Being a practical jeweler and designer of emblems of every description, as well as an enthusiastic worker in the cause of human progress, Mr. Wettstein has succeeded in combining in this badge the great want of this age and the future. It represents the Burning Torch of Reason, the Rising Sun of Science and Freethought, beautifully enameled in brilliant colors in contrast with the Night and Darkness of Superstition, enameled in black, and symbolizes the evolution of the world from the Night of Superstition to the Day of Freethought, Science and Reason.

"A pin whose torch and golden sheen,
Would grace the breast of Sheba's queen;
And will lend grace in coming time
To queens of beauty more sublime."
(Impromptu by Elizur Wright.)

As a token of recognition among Liberals of every shade of thought, either at home or abroad, it is especially valuable.

Made in two styles and by best workmen in the most artistic and substantial manner.

Considering amount of gold and artistic workmanship in the badge, no other badges in the world are sold so cheap. They will last for generations to come and increase in popularity and value until fear and superstition exist no more.

THE LETTER BOX.

W. C. W., Chicago.—The picture from Life is amusing, but Life does not allow its pictures to be reproduced. We once asked the publishers for an extension of that courtesy and they wanted $25 for it.

W. W. WILLIAMS, Utah.—Your letter signed "A Truth Finder" and addressed to Mr. Washburn was forwarded to him, but he returns it with the comment that it "does not hit the mark." However, if you think one blow at capitalism is more effective than ten at Catholicism, keep on knocking.

G. W. B., Michigan.—The name of no publishing house occurs to our mind that would be likely to publish the manuscript of yours which we returned. If you will submit your manuscript to some literary man accustomed to handling "copy" he will probably advise you correctly as to our reasons for not undertaking its publication. The workmanship is not good.

O. A. NIX, Georgia.—Your kindness in writing the Digest to acknowledge your agreeable surprise at seeing THE TRUTH SEEKER generously quoted in its columns (March 17) will be appreciated by the editor of that magazine, we have no doubt, as it is by us. The advertisement of the Digest that it quotes "from newspapers and magazines of every shade of belief with absolute impartiality" is in accord with our observation of its policy.

J. H. SCHLEUTER, Nebraska.—You ask us what we call it when a minister begins a crusade against a dance house, whose proprietor has applied an opprobrious epithet to his mother, and then calls it off on receipt of a check from that individual. In the circumstances we might call it blackmail. The minister concerned is the Rev. Charles W. Savidge, pastor of an Omaha church, who set out to close up a place called the Underworld, but agreed with his adversary on receipt of the check.

A. JOHNSON, Washington.—The newspaper which reports that Mrs. Catherine Cudahy, widow of Michael Cudahy, the Chicago pork packer, has been made a papal countess omits to say how much the ennobling of the lady cost her late husband's estate. Papal titles are for sale, but if there is a fixed price it is not made public. That of countess comes high. A few years ago when the daughter of a papal marquis of Philadelphia named Mahoney went wrong, it appeared that the bestowal of his title had followed a gift of $50,000 to the pope. We cannot vouch for the story, but if it costs $50,000 to be a marquis, the higher title of count or countess would be worth considerable more. Still, a cardinal, who ranks as prince, gets his red hat on payment of $12,000.

S. J. KENDALL, Massachusetts.—It is easier for you to ask the editor if the Catholic religion was the first Christian religion than it is for him to answer. You know that the word Catholic means "universal." There was an early division of the church called Christian over the question whether the new religion should embrace the Jews and Gentiles alike. The sect that answered the question affirmatively called itself Catholic. The first use of the word "Catholic" is found in the Epistle of Ignatius to the Smyrneans iii, 4. Ignatius was a second century father of the church. His epistle is in the Apocryphal New Testament. This was two hundred years before the church had been converted to paganism under Constantine. The Catholic church is the oldest Christian church—that is, the Eastern or Greek branch is; but apparently there was a Christian religion older than the religion now called Catholic.

GEORGE C. BARTLETT, Connecticut.—THE TRUTH SEEKER has subscribers who would voice a loud and sincere complaint were we to follow your suggestion and print an entire chapter of the Bible from week to week, or from time to time, beginning with the twenty-sixth of Leviticus. True, as you say, "the majority of Christians, church members, are ignorant of the horrible chapters contained in the Bible, the word of God." They are ignorant of about all the rest of it, too. One time when we heard Ingersoll lecture he spoke of these chapters, and somebody said "Read it." He answered, "Go home and do it yourself; it is not fit for me to read." So some of our subscribers might say the Bible is not fit for THE TRUTH SEEKER to print. Our columns have a reputation for cleanness which would not survive reproducing the word of God as she is wrote. Nevertheless, we give to every suggestion submitted in good faith the up and down and once over.

DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

The Sprading Lectures in Los Angeles.

The Sprading lectures are moving along very merrily in Los Angeles, California.

As the subject of "Birth Control" has agitated the minds of the people of Los Angeles during the past month Mr. Sprading spoke upon that topic on Feb. 4. Among other things he said:

"The subject of 'Birth Control' is not new, but it is only in recent years that it has compelled a hearing, even in the liberal city of Los Angeles. Thirty years ago Moses Harman was hammering away in the middle west on the thesis that the best way to improve the human race was to free motherhood, to give to the woman the sole right to decide whether or not and when she would become a mother. He spent many years in prison in support of that idea, but he finally came to Los Angeles, which was broad-minded enough to listen to him on the platform and tolerate his ideas in Eugenics, the magazine he published here for a number of years. More recently the people of this city have listened to Emma Goldman, Margaret Sanger and some other advocates of 'Birth Control,' and certainly there is no evidence that any harm has come to the city on account of it. Today the women's clubs are discussing the question, and no one is too cultured or too aristocratic to be interested in it.

"During the nearly half century that has elapsed since the pioneers began working for 'fewer children and better' the fight to maintain the right to discuss these matters in public has been constant and severe—and it is not yet won. It is needless to point out that, without the fundamental right to speak and write publicly about the subject, there cannot be much effective advocacy of family limitation.

"It is one of the painful evidences of the tendency of our modern civilization to rush to the legislature on the slightest provocation—usually on no provocation—and secure the passage of a law suppressing this or that supposedly undesirable thing that there is always to be found upon the statute books a prohibition of any freedom or right that bigoted authorities may wish to suppress. There is always some law that can be invoked by the narrow-minded and reactionary against the advocate of any unpopular theory, and 'Birth Control' has been until now an unpopular idea. That there are many educated and refined women who are willing to go to prison in support of their views on this subject is at last causing the smug and complacent to sit up and take notice; but it will doubtless require still more martyrdom on the part of friends of the reform to make the majority of people realize that it is the only rational solution of the problems of poverty and criminality.

"When women are no longer forced to bear more children than they want and can properly care for, the reproduction of defectives will be largely diminished; and it is from defectives that the ranks of our criminals are largely recruited. Once we admit this premise, the next step is easy to formulate. If it is wise to prevent the population of the world with a large proportion of unwelcome children who can never have a fair chance in the battle of life, it is evident that we must place in the hands of mothers and prospective mothers the means whereby they may control the size of their families.

"When it is realized how many women have an ardent desire for motherhood, under proper conditions, there need be no fear of race suicide. On the contrary, the surviving population, under a rational regime of birth control, will be of much higher quality and superior efficiency than is possible under our present hit-or-miss system of reproduction. Only with the most broad-minded tolerance of free discussion can this problem be rightly solved—and the right solution is the only solution. The most effective means of birth control must be placed in the hands of every woman."

On Feb. 11 Mr. Sprading spoke to a large and attentive audience on the subject of "The Fall of Nations." Among other things he said:

"All that is needed to plunge us into war now is to have the owners of ships insist on sending them into the war zone till one is sunk. The capitalist who wants war can get it by sacrificing one boat. Could you imagine them saying: 'We will forego our profits by giving up our trade in order to save lives'?

"That we have a right to trade with England goes without saying. But have we not an equal right to trade with Germany? If so, then why have we waived that right for the last two years? Why did we not insist on trading with Germany as we are now insisting on trading with England? If we had insisted on our right to send our boats to Germany as we now insist on our right to send our boats to England, we would have been at war with England for the last two years.

"Now why do we make such a distinction between our rights with one nation and our rights with another? If it was sensible to refrain from trading with Germany during the last two years, why is it not sensible to refrain from trading with England now?

"If it is cowardly to withdraw our trade from England, as the militarists say, then have we not been cowards for two years by withdrawing our trade from Germany? If this is cowardice, I prefer being a coward to being a wholesale murderer, Mr. Militarist!

"Citizens have a right to a passage in the street, but if there was an armed mob fighting in that street, would a sensible citizen insist on his right to a passage at that time? Governments controlled by the military class have a habit of insisting on their rights at the wrong time.

"Instead of insisting on trading with those bloodthirsty nations, would it not be better to develop trade with the peaceful ones? If this were done, the war in Europe would be ended sooner, and we would have its trade, because we would not lose its friendship, and it would have a greater need for our goods after the war than before. Its productivity has been greatly curtailed; the waste of goods and the destruction of property have been enormous; it will take fifty or a hundred years to restore Europe. Are we so greedy and shortsighted that we cannot wait for this trade to come to us, but must plunge into a devastating war that will waste our wealth, as it has theirs, and cost us the friendship and trade of half of Europe for many years to come?

"A dozen nations have protested against the U-boat campaign, but all have refused to break with Germany, even after our solicitation. Was there any more reason for us to sever relations than there was for those other nations to do so? It is all right to protest against such invasive and destructive conduct, but there is no reason for us in order to show that it is wrong to involve ourselves in similar conduct.

"There is no such thing as civilized warfare, so let us not try to teach others (by doing the uncivilized thing) how to be civil. If we were right when we declared our neutrality—and I think we were—we are wrong now when we break it, without being attacked. Instead of breaking with Germany, President Wilson should have warned the greedy munitions manufacturers and the speculators in foodstuffs that they ship goods to Europe now at their own risk. This would have saved the lives of our own people in the danger zone and the lives of the Europeans by hastening the end of the war.

"Would the United States Senate have endorsed such a reasonable measure for avoiding war? Not much; and the fact that it so overwhelmingly endorsed President Wilson's breaking with Germany is sufficient proof that he is wrong."

Mr. Sprading also told us that, according to history, nations of the past were completely in the hands of militarists as now before their fall.

During the month the Examiner has given a brief synopsis of Mr. Sprading's lecture every Monday morning, and while his address on "Tolerance" was given more space than usual in the columns of this journal Feb. 19, it was the most conservative part of his address that the Examiner reprinted.

"Tolerance has always been one of the cardinal principles of Rationalism. If there has been one thing more than another that all Rationalists stand for it has been free speech and the right of everyone to his opinions, be they true or false, reasonable or unreasonable.

"It is therefore gratifying to us to find that the Catholic Church, as represented by Joseph Scott, is joining us in this campaign for tolerance. Since we have stood for free thought for time immemorial, we welcome to our side everybody who can share our views on those principles, be they Catholic, Protestant, Mohammedan, Buddhist or Pagan. In the case of the Catholic Church, of course, and also in the case of most other religious bodies, the espousal of the cause of tolerance today will mean a reversal of tactics since the days of the Inquisition and the witchcraft persecutions in England and America.

"On the other hand, a century and a quarter ago Thomas Paine clearly enunciated the principles upon which Rationalism is founded and which have been rigidly adhered to by all those who believe that only in free discussion of every question can the right be determined.

Rationalists wish strongly to emphasize the fact that they have always been in the vanguard of the movement for the resistance to tyranny and oppression; that their plea has never been for tolerance. Not only is it impossible to find a single instance where they have ever made an attempt to deny the rights of others, to prohibit the freedom of action of any person, to suppress the thought or speech of anyone else in any way, or to interfere in the slightest degree with the life or liberty or non-invasive activities or the expression of the ideas of anyone whatsoever. Not only this, but they never have even advocated any such intolerance, interference, denial, suppression or prohibition.

"That the Catholic Church at least professes to be willing to stand on this platform should be an example to those Protestant churches who have not yet given evidence of this attitude toward unpopular doctrines and innovations.

It is difficult for some of us to find the underlying motive for the desire that seems to exist in the hearts of many narrowly religious people to refuse a hearing to any doctrine besides their own. In this the Rationalists take exactly the opposite and, it would seem, the only tenable or defensible view. Our platform is always open to those who oppose our views—a hearing is not only always given to our adversaries, but their criticisms are invariably welcomed. We believe that only in the hearing of all sides of any question can the truth be discovered and established. Are there any pulpits in which this freedom exists?"

While on Feb. 25 Dr. Becker delivered the main address on "The Evolution of Religion," Mr. Sprading contributed the following thoughts:

"The scientific investigation in the fields of ethnology and anthropology has demonstrated the fact that religions had their evolution just as everything else had. They did not come to us ready-made, nor were they manufactured by the priest as many think, but they grew just as language and other things developed.

"Religions were the first attempt to interpret the phenomena of Nature. The scientific method of research is to trace a thing to its beginning in order to understand its origin. A written history of it is not sufficient. It must be known before it can make history. Great investigators like Herbert Spencer ('Principles of Sociology'), J. G. Frazer ('The Golden Bough'), and Grant Allen ('The Evolution of the Idea of God'), with many others, have examined the minds and beliefs of hundreds of tribes in order to trace their beliefs to the phenomena that produced them. There is a general belief among Christian people that all peoples have a belief in God and in immortality, but such is not the case. Many of them have no such concept, and the reason is that they were not all subjected to the same environment and therefore did not have exactly the same phenomena to deal with and to interpret.

"Those who believe in a God differ widely in their concept of him, and then there are many gods. Some have a stone god, some worship a tree, still others worship their dead ancestors as gods. About the only thing that is common to all of them is that they are all equally superstitious. These savage and primitive people did the best they could to explain things. When the hunter dreamed he was away hunting and was told by his companions that stayed awake that he had not left the place, he concluded that he must have a spiritual part that could go away at such times. He was as ignorant of the nature of dreams then as many people are now. But he did the best he could to interpret this phenomenon. When he saw his reflection in the still water, he reasoned that it was his other self. When he saw his shadow he decided that it was his spiritual part, and when he heard the echo of his voice, it was additional evidence of a separate or spiritual part of himself.

"Swoons for days made the impression on the primitive man that one can die for a few days and be restored to life on the return of the spirit to the body. After the belief in a spiritual part of man has been established, he proceeds to apply it to other things as well. He observes that some things move and that others do not, and he reasons that those things that move have a spirit to move them as he himself has, and that spirits, small or great, cause every movement. So trees and streams and the wind and the lightning all have spirits. Back of the earthquake is a great spirit, and every planet and sun and star becomes a great spirit or God. So the gods evolve and multiply.

"You see, they did the best they could with the reason they had to interpret the things they saw. Most people are capable of seeing the fallacy of their reasoning. But while rejecting their reasoning, they still believe in many of the beliefs established by it. They mistook life for spirit. So do many yet. They looked for some spiritual or supernatural cause for everything. So do many yet. But we see that the spiritual had a natural cause, or evolution, and so it is with all that is believed to be supernatural. When understood it is seen to be natural.

"The supernatural is nothing but a misinterpretation of the natural. Nature is sufficient within itself.

"It is cause and effect. It is the beginning and the end.

"It is a cosmos, not a chaos.

"It is inclusive, because it is all there is."

JOHN A. MORRIS.

REGARDING CHRIST'S HISTORICITY.

Much has been said the past month by David Eccles and others regarding the historicity of Jesus. How it can have any bearing on the question of the authority of the Christian church is more than I can now see. And that is the main effort of THE TRUTH SEEKER, in its highly appreciated work, if my judgment is right, from what I have read in its pages the past four years. It has made of me a confirmed skeptic where I was previously an easy-going church member with liberal tendencies.

I have read in addition to THE TRUTH SEEKER about $3.00 worth of the literature advertised in its pages and would read much more if I could afford the expense. Yet I can not see the use of proving that there was such a character, historically speaking, as Jesus, after it is so thoroughly conceded that his birth and death are mythical, or false, and that most of the sayings and incidents of his life are but parallels of the lives of other gods supposed to have previously existed. Whether there is a small nucleus of fact in the mass of rubbish foisted upon the pious world as realities does not concern me, after the superstructure of supernaturalism is torn down. That he spake as never man spake before is absurd; that he had any more authority than any other of the many fanatical teachers of the past is just as absurd; and that a supreme power desiring the salvation of the world from the consequences of sin would take such an unreasonable way to get the truth before a suffering world is beyond the conception of a reasoning mind if it takes the pains to make a study of the evidence on both sides.

I have a Russellite as a neighbor and he is a shrewd man. As a young man he refused to accept the hellfire doctrine of the orthodox churches and as he had but a common school education he was easy for the doctrine of "plenty of hell here on earth but none hereafter." He saw the necessity of taking the Bible as it is or throwing it away altogether, for if you abandon its chronology, and the story of Adam's fall, the whole structure sinks in the sand. So history, archaeology, astronomy, biology and all of the sciences that support evolution are but works of the devil and false in the very necessity of the case. And I agree with him. He can accept the one and hold to the other.

So it is with the life of Christ as given in the gospels and epistles. I can not help looking at it just as I would look at a character in Dickens, admitting the possibility of his having been acquainted with a person that might have been the nucleus of the character, but as for the character, it would be folly to assume.

We have, rather, a supreme curiosity to know who threw the character of Christ together in the Greek, and where all the material was collected for the same and how.

We have a world of literature at present similar to the novel, "Inside the Cup," by Winston Churchill, that is an attempt to rehabilitate the Christ after all the admittedly false is abandoned, and some go so far as to be satisfied with the so-called spirit of Christianity as being sufficient to hold the church spires aloft.

I would like to have David Eccles or any other student of the ethical side of the scriptures give us a review and criticism of the conclusions drawn by the writer of this book.

To me it looks like a complete begging of the question, yet there are many that think the position taken is logical and see no weakness in it. Some of Harold Bell Wright's works I would like to see picked to pieces, and I believe here is where a great work could be done.

That the Christian religion has any right to capture all the refined and noble sentiments of the past and label them as Christian because they may be found in the Bible should be proven without any possible chance of denial.

It may be that it has been so proven, but I have yet to find a well read and popular work that carries it that far. I would be pleased to know of such a work.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxies of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

Labor Omnia Vincit.—The prodigal son had just sneaked in the back way, between two days.
"Owing to the greediness of the beef trust," explained the old man, "we are entirely out of fattened calf, but here's a can-opener. Get busy."—Indianapolis Star.

The Day After.—Jack—"Who is that fine-looking girl that just bowed to you?"

"Yes?" she questioned, sweetly.
"It is this—shall I return those white satin suspenders by mail, or will you have them now?"—Harper's Magazine.

A Scottish doctor who was attending a laird had instructed the butler of the house in the art of taking and recording his master's temperature with a thermometer. On paying his usual morning call, he was met by the butler, to whom he said:

"Well, John, I hope the laird's temperature is not any higher today?"
The man looked puzzled for a minute and then replied:
"Weel, I was just wonderin' that myself. Ye see, he deed at twal o'clock."

An Unhandy Timepiece.—The Higgins family were moving from Twenty-sixth street to Thirty-sixth street. Three vans had carried all their belongings during the afternoon, except Mrs. Higgins's mother's cut-glass bowl, which Mrs. Higgins wanted to carry because it was not easy to pack, and the grandfather's clock that was never trusted to the moving-vans. Higgins always carried it.

Holding it with both arms, Higgins walked down the front steps like an amateur tight-rope dancer and started up the avenue. It demanded all of his strength, breath, and attention.

At Twenty-eighth street Higgins set the clock down carefully and mopped his face.

"Shay, old man," said a bleary-eyed individual who had been staggering up the avenue behind him. "Shay, why don't you get a watch?"

The Rev. George C. Abbitt took down the receiver and placed it to his ear.
"Is that the Dickel Liquor Company?" a woman asked.

Mr. Abbitt recognized the voice as that of one of his parishioners.

"No," he replied in stern reproof; "it is your rector."

Was there a dull thud?

No.

"Indeed," said the lady, quick as a flash, "and pray what are you doing there?"—Hopkinsville New Era.

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

A very frank book; serious, scholarly, convincing.

Paine's Age of Reason

By THOMAS PAINE, M.A.

This edition of Thomas Paine's masterpiece is the one that is sure to become the standard for all future correct editions. It is reprinted from one of the first copies in English published by Barrois at Paris, January, 1794, and the proofs were probably read by Paine. It enables the world of the twentieth century to read Paine's AGE OF REASON as Paine wrote it in the eighteenth century. It is printed from large new type. 180 pages. 15c. T. S. Co.

THE CHRISTIAN HELL

From the First to the Twentieth Century

By

HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work. Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

This Is the Book We Have Been Waiting For

The Belief In God and Immortality

A STATISTICAL STUDY

By JAMES H. LEUBA

Professor of Psychology and Pedagogy in Bryn Mawr College.

The work is the result of an inquiry among men of science — biologists, sociologists, historians, psychologists — as to whether they believe or want to believe in a prayer-answering God and in continuance of life after death. The answer is altogether different from what might be expected in view of the frequent affirmations of the supernaturalists that belief in Christianity, or at least its fundamental dogmas, is held by the majority of the men of science.

It puts into the hands of Freethinkers exactly the information they want on that subject, with the facts and figures verifying it.

As a logical conclusion, founded upon the general aspect of the case, we have held that science leads its votaries to a rejection of such undemonstrable propositions as the existence of gods and the survival of the "soul" when the body is dead. Here we have the evidence, in statistical form, which confirms our view.

To the inquiry into the attitude of the scientists there are added statistics regarding the thought of college students regarding the same religious dogmas.

The author is himself a man of science, an authority in his special branch, which is Psychology, and he knows and sets forth the origin and history of the beliefs with which he deals.

No recent book has attracted more attention from the press, or presented such a serious problem to the supernaturalists.

JESUS AND HIS IDEALS.

Practical Good Sense Shown in Ignoring Those Precepts Which Only Hypocrisy Can Commend.

BY ATWOOD MANVILLE.

CHRISTIANS who believe that Jesus was a part of the Trinity, and therefore God, often fail to question themselves fairly as to their own belief in his teachings as a moral guide. They are bound by authority in belief but not in actions; they consider it blasphemous to express doubt, but permissible to disobey. To these, the following criticisms of the teachings of Jesus may seem blasphemous, but there is no desire to draw a wrong inference from a partial quotation, or impose an opinion. Let each one consult his Testament and decide, candidly, whether or not the precepts are true and constitute the best moral teaching to-day, keeping in mind the customs and speech of Christ's time so that criticism shall apply only to the meaning and not the letter of his remarks. If some of the teachings are not the best morality, should they be so considered, because attributed to Jesus?

(a) "Resist not evil." "Unto him that smiteth thee on the one cheek, offer also the other." "And of him that taketh away thy goods, ask them not again." "Love, your enemies." "Blessed are the meek." "Agree with thine adversary quickly."

Do we approve of this non-resistance? If so, should we advocate armament even for defense? Should not Christians follow these beautiful ideals, individually and as nations, regardless of consequences, or admit that Christ's teachings are not a divine guide for modern conduct? He also said: "Think not that I am come to send peace on earth: I came not to send peace but a sword." Was this also moral? Is it better to be "poor in spirit" than valiant in spirit?

(b) Very few Christians believe that they should teach their children: "Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth." "Take no thought for your life, what you shall eat." Take therefore no thought for the morrow." "Woe unto you that are rich."

Do we consider such teachings practicable or even good ideals? Is the life of a tramp vindicated by them? Do not Internationalists and Socialists more nearly believe these ideals of pacifism and equality than most of the supporters of the churches? Robert C. Adams says: "The world shows its good sense by ignoring them, and the church shows hypocrisy in commending them."

(c) "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire." "He that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." "He that believeth not shall be damned." "The angels shall come forth, and sever the wicked from among the just, and shall cast them into the furnace of fire." "If you forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses." "And these shall go away into everlasting punishment." "Whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father."

How are these compatible with the Golden Rule, or with an ideal of a loving God? If we ought to forgive evil doers, should not God do the same? Does the Christian believe that God will punish those whose God-created minds refuse to believe, or that he will punish any one for ever; or are these teachings not moral and divine, but human and false?

(d) "If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple" (Luke xiv, 26). This is probably eastern imagery and not intended to be taken literally, but is not the idea that one should consider home ties of slight importance compared to following Jesus? And if we have decided that he was human, was not that egoistic doctrine, based on erroneous conceptions of the duration of the world? Woman, what have I to do with thee?" (to his mother). "Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father. But Jesus said unto him, Follow me; and let the dead bury their dead." "The father shall be divided against the son," etc. In these instances the prevalent hyperbole may account for the apparent immorality, but if these things had been said by anyone but Jesus, should we have considered them as a proper attitude towards family relationships?

(e) "No man can come to me except the Father which hath sent me draw him." "Many are called but few chosen." "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel." "Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not."

Did Christ come to save all the world or only a few?

The Federal Council of Churches claims that "Jesus is the final authority on modern social and economic questions," which appears to the Free-thinker an unjustifiable assumption; for modern social and economic questions are concerned with improving physical conditions and caring for men's bodies, whereas Jesus taught that the body was comparatively negligible. The Council approves "the science of preventing disease and accidents," but they are unable to discover, from a study of Jesus' life, how he effected his cures, nor did he instruct men in the prevention of disease. The Christian Scientists may, or may not, have discerned the method, but they are not members of the Council. Jesus' doctrine of love and unselfishness is admirable, and was taught by him in a more appealing way than ever before, but it was not original; and even if it were, all details of the methods of application to modern conditions are lacking. Jesus advocated charity rather than a search for the source of affliction.

Can the Federal Council, or anyone else, honestly believe that a study of the four gospels will accomplish better results in providing solutions of labor troubles, the social evil, poverty, peonage, drunkenness and war than a study of modern authorities and present secular conditions? The spirit of altruism is not developed solely by Christianity, and, as H. R. Wade said, "The religious system, being essentially non-progressive, is always fearful lest a new discovery compel it to explain away some further article of its inspired law; but the Rationalist moral system is ever eager for that which will tend to increase its understanding of social conditions." The churches have not been the foremost agitators for the abolition of slavery, dueling, poverty and child labor; nor for the adoption of universal disarmament, democracy, woman suffrage, freedom of speech or of most "modern social economic questions."

Love and unselfishness are essential for both study and conduct, but Jesus invented neither. Even the Golden Rule was quoted by him: "for this is the law and the prophets," referring to Leviticus xix, 18: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Confucius, 500 B. C., said: "What you do not like when done to yourself, do not to others," yet it would be considered irreverent to speak of the golden rule of Confucius.

Jesus prophesied none of the revelations of nature since discovered and applied by man, which, presumably, would have been known to a son of the creator who could perform miracles. "In his time" many of them said, "He hath a devil and is mad," but since then his teachings have been proclaimed by the civilized world. However, how would he be viewed if he preached to devout Christians now, in the United States, as he did in Jerusalem? Is he the modern authority that the churches claim or are we so imbued with his traditional divinity as to be unable to see that he was only a good man with ordinary knowledge of his own time and with an unwarranted belief in the supernatural on earth?

Was he not sincere in the expectation of the approaching end of the world? "Repent for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." "There be some standing here that shall not taste of death till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom." This generation shall not pass away till all be fulfilled."

Theologians have explanations for every sentiment that does not please them, but, even if they satisfactorily interpret these passages, is there any evidence that Christ taught or thought of social conditions in 1917? Can not the discrepancies in his doctrines be better explained by realizing that his biographers were not so inspired as to avoid errors?

"Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward for ever." Jesus expected the fig tree to have fruit out of season, "for the time of figs was not yet." In his first miracle, he turned water into wine, not wine into water. "There met him two possessed with devils, so the devils besought him, saying, 'If thou cast us out, suffer us to go away into the herd of swine.'" And he said unto them, "Go;" showing that he believed in demonology—not a modern science—and did not respect the ownership or feelings of the two thousand innocent swine. It is no wonder that they asked him to depart.

In the parable of the laborers he justified the same pay for ten hours' work as for one. "And his lord was wroth and delivered him to the tormentors till he should pay all that was due unto him. So likewise shall my heavenly Father do also unto you if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother their trespasses." The lesson of forgiveness is good, but in modern social science torment for debt is antiquated. "Thou knewest that I reap where I sowed not, . . . for unto every one that hath shall be given," etc., shows the necessity of doing the best we can with our talents, but emphasizes rather unfair punishment. Instead of suggesting a cure for inequality, as a modern divine should do, the unfortunate fact is reiterated, "but from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath." "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead."

Is not the suffering of one who has done wrong, like getting rich, to be relieved, and new methods devised for preventing others from sinning in like manner?

In Matthew xxi, 12, instead of giving instructions, Jesus used a scourge and overthrew by force the tables of merchants who were legally transacting business. The parables were impressive, but sometimes taught a strange justice, and the reason given by Jesus for this form of teaching is involved: "That seeing they may see and not perceive; and hearing they may hear, and not understand; lest at any time they should be converted, and their sins should be forgiven them" (Mark iv, 12).

While there may be found beauty in the teachings of Jesus, a study of the gospels, in the light of modern criticism, may establish that Jesus did not actually say and do all that the gospels report, and that his character and teachings were built around his personality by those who wrote his brief biography. If he had been divine, all that he said and did would have been perfect, and, in our opinion, more consistent and more clear for all generations. "For as Jonah was three days and three nights in the whale's belly; so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." He was in the tomb two nights and one day, unless, as some Christians claim, he was crucified on Thursday.

"All things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive." Is that true? Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them." This power deputed to men has caused enormous imposition upon credulity and encouragement to immorality. It was one of Christ's doctrines. Was it moral or not?

There is often an endorsement of gloom, as, "Woe unto you that laugh now, for ye shall mourn." "Blessed are they that mourn."

Those who believe that the God of the Old Testament is the true God and a loving heavenly father, in the form of a man, as described in the Bible, are right in explaining their religion to others; and those who believe that godliness has progressed and improved since men wrote the Bible should be permitted to submit their case. It is claimed that no man has lived on earth whose teachings have made so radical a change for good as those ascribed to Jesus, but if he was only a man, and if the accounts of his miracles were not well authenticated, we should take only the good and not be bound by everything in the gospels. Moses may have been the best teacher of his time and Jesus of his time, but evolution is evident in morality as in all else.

Belief in doctrines made by men, or in facts of doubtful reliability, is not essential to a religious life. Washington and Lincoln were "religious," but there is ample proof that they were not Christians in the strict sense. It is customary now to call oneself a Christian even though not believing in the virgin birth, atonement, transfiguration, miracles, or the resurrection and ascension; but this is a quibble to avoid the terrible opprobrium of non-conformity. They are in favor of a moral life, but are only Christians in the sense of living in Christendom. No one tries to live literally as Christ commanded.

A religious person shapes his actions on instructions received from men who do not agree upon what can please or displease their God. An irreligious person shapes his actions on the dictates of his conscience, or because of the knowledge that vice is apt to bring its own punishment, or to retain the respect of his fellow men. It may be claimed by the Christian that it is God who gave man his conscience, and, if that be true, belief or disbelief in God will not affect it. The consoling fact is that it is there for the benefit of the Agnostic or the Atheist, in spite of himself, and both are convinced that they will not be condemned for failure to comprehend what is not clear regarding its divine source. Pagans and heathen have had that moral sense, and it is an unfair appropriation of righteousness to make Christianity the only source of morality.

Is it wrong to say that one does not believe in a personal God? Professor Leuba of Bryn Mawr has just published the result of a canvass among scientists, and more than half of them admit that they hold no such belief. Is it right to believe that Jesus was God when the evidence is so doubtful? The answer probably is that honest belief in anything is not a violation of the ethical law; but is it not better to follow Christ's teachings that are moral without belief in his divinity, rather than have absolute faith and be opposed to a free discussion of a subject so vital as religion?

Disbelief in Christianity need not destroy anyone's belief in immortality, for that is a much older doctrine, of which the ancient pagans and other heathen were convinced; nor is the existence of the Deity here in question, but only his appearance on earth in the person of one man only.

The mission of Freethought is to abolish false doctrine and superstition; to substitute modern knowledge of this world for ancient theories of the hereafter, and to make men true to themselves with a horror of hypocrisy; to emancipate the human mind from a belief in the infallibility of the Bible, the Koran or any other book; to abolish the fear of open discussion of religion; to discredit all revealed religions with their immutable laws, and substitute the true religion of Humanitarianism; to unfetter the mind from the authority of the past so that it will be free to seize and adopt each revelation of science in the present and future; to urge each individual to consider his every act in the light of its relationship to the community, rather than its conformity to a code established thousands of years ago by men in the name of God; to develop self-reliance and a truly moral sense; to urge all mankind to follow the best laws of man, as discernible in the light of evolution and modern science, and be ready to accept any true revelations of improvement, duly appreciating that our knowledge is infinitesimal and that our spiritual nature will lead us to seek the best use of discoveries in material nature; to so act as to leave this world a better place for future generations, not because of commands in a certain book, but because our natures—God-given if you will—urge us to reasonable sacrifice for our fellow men.

And all that the Freethinker asks is a fair hearing for his arguments, and a fair consideration of his proofs, so that each individual may arrive at his own conclusions.

Teacher's Seasonable Thoughts

Now that gloomy Lent is nearing its close, choirs are practicing anthems in praise of a "Risen Lord." Tenors and sopranos will exhort the congregation to "Raise your joys and triumphs high," and, not to forget the celestial with the terrestrial, will add, "Sing, ye heavens, and earth, reply." Then bass and alto will join in with:

"Love's redeeming work is done;
Fought the fight, the battle won:
Lo! our sun's eclipse is o'er;
Lo! he sets in blood no more."

Poor deluded school teachers will be drilling the innocents to lisp:

"O Jesus, precious Savior, now hear me while I pray,
And grant me now a blessing, this lovely Easter Day."
Processions will pass up flowery aisles chanting:

"The strife is o'er, the battle done,
Now is the victor's triumph won."

Countless alleluias will be raised, and all in praise of what? An obscure Judean about whose name have been clustered all the fantastic events culled from many Old World religions.

Weeping for Adonis is no longer done in Jerusalem, but weeping crowds will be prostrated on Good Friday, in mourning adoration of a dead Son of God. The Feast of Easter is kept no more by the Teutons as a Spring festival but as an anniversary of a "resurrected Christ." Old miracle plays are re-enacted on Good Friday and on Easter in every church service where the ancient tale is re-read, re-told, re-sung to twentieth century worshippers!

It is pitiful to hear many voices wailing the Litany of a sixteenth century fabrication, but it is appalling to hear the Athanasian creed, with all its crudities, its dogmatism, its vindictiveness, its worse than infantile reasoning, recited by a standing congregation who thus link themselves with the barbaric past. Above all, that little children should be schooled to a false triumph—

"Christ is risen indeed to-day!
Hear the choirs triumphant say.
Shout aloud the joyful sound,
Tell it all the world around";

that useless faith should be drilled into them:

"Only believe in the Savior's name, Light of the world is He";
"There's a Friend for little children

All these, I say, are positive cruelties and betrayals of their trust in us.

Rationalism, the Fourth Demand, is still a demand; the child's world is controlled mainly by faithful fanatics, who use every festival to hammer home the untruths of the Bible. Can you rest on your oars and say our bark is in port? Do you not know that even Rationalist teachers are compelled by circumstances and conventions to reiterate lying declarations to their pupils from poems and readings selected by religionists?

Must sensitive children be compelled to hear the hideous doctrines of eternal punishment unless there is faith in a risen Lord, and of a dying God's sacrifice for a sin-stricken world? Have we to suffer in vain, struggling out of the tortuous paths of faith to a world of light and truth, only to start our little ones on the cruel thorny road where we began?

Let the little children enjoy the Spring, its balmy air, its nesting birds, its springing flowers, with no shadow of the cross on their young lives. We Rationalists can do much to make their lives joyous and carefree. Can we not also clear away the superstitions that will cloud their futures? How do other teachers, who read THE TRUTH SEEKER, feel about this? Are we doing enough to counteract the poison of dogma and blind faith everywhere instilled into the minds of children? Can we do more? Are there any suggestions we could give one another that would help in this war of Emancipation from Superstition? Have we let our voices be drowned in the chorus of Faith? Have we tacitly consented to teach what we knew to be untrue? This Easter should see us resolved to take no more part in the Orgy of Superstition, no matter how flowers, music and tradition combine to beautify it. We must teach, as we know, the falseness underlying it all. TEACHER.

The Vitality of the Untrue.

Last week we wrote on the impossibility of perpetually suppressing the truth. It will only serve to keep the balance true if we dwell this week upon the persistency of a legend and the vitality of a lie. In a sense they are two sides of the same thing. All history shows how difficult it is to kill a legend, and daily experience proves that if we once give a lie ten minutes start it will take truth ten years—or more—to overtake it. And if the lie chimes with a current prejudice or prevalent expectation the chase is likely to be a long one. It is thus that every legend brings its cloud of witnesses. In the days of belief in witchcraft one could find plenty of witnesses who had seen old women careering through the air on broomsticks. In the opening months of the War thousands of people saw a Russian army pass through Britain on its way to France. It is hard to kill a lie when it is of the ordinary kind; when it is a religious lie it as nearly achieves immortality as is possible to any human creation.

Want of space prevented our noticing last week an article in the Daily Chronicle, by Major Redmond, M.P., on "The Great Revival [of Religion] in France." After being a year with the army in France, Major Redmond is convinced that there has been "at least one beneficial result from the war. It has led to the revival of religion in a most remarkable way." Concerning England, the major is content to observe that "everyone is agreed on this," and that "it is apparent in a hundred directions." One wonders who "everyone is." Many of the clergy deny it flatly. They lament that the expected revival has not occurred. Church congregations have certainly not increased in numbers. Soldiers home from the front do not appear more religious than when they went out. We have published testimonies from scores of people, chaplains, soldiers, and writers who have testified that religion is undergoing an eclipse at the front. Who are the soldiers who are becoming religious? Where is the revival in civil life? Major Redmond says he has seen it. So did our forefathers see witches traveling through the air. So did our contemporaries see a Russian army traveling through Britain. It is not at all difficult to see things—if one makes up one's mind that they shall be seen.

It would be unfair to Major Redmond to say that he does not produce evidence. He does; and it is of the usual religious variety. He finds it in France. Some of the French clergy have found the revival in England. And there is the same suspicious circumstances in either case. The miracle occurs where the writer's audience is not. It is the homage paid by legend to reality. So Major Redmond goes to France to discover something which French writers have failed to observe. He says:

"To those who have been brought to France by the war the manifestations of religion everywhere displayed have come more or less as a surprise, especially to those who had been led to believe from the action of many successive French governments that the church was more or less a thing of the past in France. It is hard, of course, to judge of the real depth or intensity of religious feeling, but all one can say is that if this can be done by noticing the attendance at church, then the religion of France is to-day very true and very sincere."

Major Redmond also speaks of the bravery shown by French priests (he says that over 2,000 have been killed), and of the devotion shown by people at church services, etc. It should be noted, however, that the French priests have been killed because the French government will not permit the priestly garb to serve as a reason for exemption, and because in France all citizens, lay and cleric, have the same duties and responsibilities. The French state is a secular state, as the French state schools are secular schools.

If one wanted proof of Major Redmond's unfitness for judging the effect of the war on French religious or anti-religious opinion, it is supplied in the passage cited. Everyone who knows France is aware that the majority of French people are still professedly Catholic—particularly in the villages and country districts. Probably about a fifth of the nation are Freethinkers, although in disestablishing the church in France this minority would have had the support of many others who saw both the injustice of a state religion, and the actual danger to the state the church had been. Naturally a visitor to France—and one whose service with the British army would have, of necessity, kept him away from the large cities—would have found many evilences of the existence of religious belief. And with equal certainty he would have seen the religion of the more superstitious peasantry and provincials intensified by the disasters which have overtaken France. The same cause which stimulated the mental activities of the educated and intelligent would, at the same time, numb the minds of the less educated, the less intelligent, and the naturally superstitious. This is all that Major Redmond's evidence amounts to. If he saw more, it was because he went ready to see more. If he was surprised at seeing this much, it is evidence only of how little he understood either the French character or the position of affairs in France in relation to religion.

Now, it is very likely that, so far as mere anti-clerical feeling is concerned, some Frenchmen may have had their bitterness toward the clergy toned down by discovering worthy men under the priest's robe. And if that is the case, it is all so much to the good. But to talk of this, or to see in this a great revival of religion, is downright absurdity. And may not this discovery be, so far as Major Redmond is concerned, a mare's nest? If he has been under the delusion that every Freethinker must regard every priest as a scoundrel, he will naturally view the discovery that a Freethinker will treat a priest who proves himself a good man with consideration and respect as epoch-marking. Freethought does not depend for its existence upon there being bad priests, nor can it be killed by every priest becoming a paragon of goodness and courage. A Freethought which depended upon the character of the clergy for its being would not be worth having. Whether English or French, Freethought is quite independent of the character of those who profess a faith in religion. The character of believers, the peculiarity of their mental processes, may be used to point a moral, but it has nothing to do with the development of Freethought. People did not give up the belief in witchcraft because they believed that those who upheld it were cowards, or liars, or rogues; but because their own mental growth had carried them beyond the stage of a belief in broomstick-traveling old women. And that principle holds good of every phase of the relation between Freethought and religion.

To imagine that French Freethought, with its army of brilliant intellects, from Voltaire to Anatole France, rested upon whether clergymen were good men or bad ones, is a notion that could only survive for five minutes in the brains of a man who so completely lacked all comprehension of the meaning of Freethought, or of the historic and mental processes by which religion is outgrown. And such a notion is supremely ridiculous when we are dealing with the French intellect. For it is one of the most logical and the most fearless in Europe. It is never afraid of its conclusions, never afraid of pushing ideas to their logical issues. It is these features which, in spite of lapses, have kept France Republican since 1789. They enabled it to deal with the Dreyfus case in a way which converted what threatened to be a national disaster into a cause of national strength. It is this directness of thought, this ability to look clearly at the logical issue of a controversy, that makes the French people the most practical in Europe. They are very practical because they do not neglect the things of the mind. They do not neglect the things of the mind because they are practical. This the average Englishman, with his rooted distrust of intellectual processes and his eternal fumbling after a compromise, cannot and will not understand.

Perhaps a powerful factor in the situation is that while the nation with a Christianity nearest our own is our bitterest enemy in this war, and has distinguished itself by every possible brutality, the nation with which we are in closest alliance has for years been associated with the strongest manifestations of Freethought. France is a secular state. It has no religion in its Constitution; it has no religion in the schools. Its best brains in art, in science, in politics, are definitely freethinking.

And what are British Christians to do? Before the war they were pointing out that the new generation of Frenchmen were degenerate because they had been brought up in "godless" schools. French politics was corrupt, because it had no state church. The French were "decadent"; hence their rejection of religion. The war came, and showed France as healthy, as great, as ever.

What were the pietists to do? They dared not say they were wrong; that they were merely lying for the greater glory of God. And yet some explanation must be found. At length it was discovered. There had been a great revival of religion in France! That accounted for everything. And the story does account for a deal. It shows that Christian tactics, whether a nation be at war or at peace, remain the same.—CHAPMAN COHEN, in the London Freethinker.

On the Plan of Salvation.

Nothing that ever owed its origin to priestcraft was so destitute of that plain, ordinary common sense which supplies our daily needs and enables us to get through the world right side up, as the Christian scheme of salvation. It is so idiotic in conception, so weak in construction, and so absurd in details, that no mind using rational methods of thinking can contemplate it without weariness and disgust.

Here was a God, according to his creators, who knew all things to the end of time; he knew before he started exactly what would occur throughout the endless ages of eternity, for old gloomy John Calvin figured that out as the only logical way possible with an omniscient God; and whether the doctrine of foreordination looks good or otherwise to some Christians, every one of them who accepts a God without intellectual limitations must fall in line with John's logic, since reason compels.

Dares one of them to assert that God did not foresee, when he blew into Adam the wind which set him agoing, that he was to drown everybody but old Noah and his family? No; and if he could see that far, could he not see the necessity for a savior for the new crop of human beings, and just how he was going to make the whole scheme work to give himself mental satisfaction? Of course he could, if omniscient—and how many times we have been told he is! Then, of course, he knew who was going to hell and who wasn't, and also those who were sure of heaven and known to be, as Calvin terms them, the elect; they were all known before he removed Adam's rib and started the first pair in family life, with no knowledge of birth control or anything else of importance. He foresaw the need of coming to earth while the rest of an endless universe rolled on without his control and guidance for thirty-three years, during which time he learned the carpenter's trade and passed through all the variations of human life from an infant up to mature manhood, except the delights and uncertainties of matrimony.

He made man, knowing all these things would happen, and how he himself must be crucified to atone for the sins of mankind—to make their effect on his mind free from annoyance and perturbation.

Think of it; he must suffer for three days on the cross to make himself view the sins of mankind with composure! Nothing else he could think of would effect that result; so down he came from his throne on high, to suffer physical agony horrible to contemplate, in order that he might save about one person in a thousand from going to hell.

With his omnipotent mind, that was the best he could do, otherwise he would presumably have done something else; and this imbecile stuff has been taught for nineteen hundred years, and accepted by millions as a truth and a reality! Some of the greatest minds that have manifested in human bodies have swallowed the dose and defended it with great reverence and solemnity as good medicine. There were Gladstone, Sir Isaac Newton, Samuel Johnson, and Charles Dickens; and we have seen our Daniel Webster, Benjamin Harrison and Lew Wallace falling for the same asinine folly. That it might be pumped into the common herd who do not think or reason, is not surprising, but how the brain of a Gladstone and a Webster could absorb it and retain it, will never cease to mystify any thoughtful man.

Before this God created a solitary human being he knew he was to give life and consciousness to countless millions going to hell for all eternity, there to suffer indescribable torments forever and ever, for no possible reason except that he had so willed and determined before creation was begun. It would have been just as easy to make mankind so that their actions would always please him, and to give them endless joys without one exception, as it was to create men with such natures that they could not be good or do right in his eyes; for omnipotence surely had that power. Why didn't he use it and avoid the necessity for a hell and endless suffering therein for such vast numbers of sentient beings brought out of the "blank unknown" for no other purpose?

No Christian tries to answer this question except in one way: "God's ways are not our ways." I guess they are not, for no human being, even with a finite mind, would have done such fool things, for right and justice have a high value with us and none of us would find pleasure in such awful cruelties as God must contemplate for all time on his own children.

But every sensible and rational-minded man in the world knows there is not a word of truth in the tale; so that, instead of being filled with fear when preachers teach it from their pulpits, to be accepted by millions of their fellow-men, they simply feel a disgust and contempt which words cannot express. It is so insulting to human intelligence that one must deliberately debase his reason to accept it; for no matter how sensible and clear-minded a man may be on all other subjects, when it comes to religion, and our favorite brand called Christianity, all who receive it must descend to the level of a perfect and complete idiot. Only by refusing to think and reason, to analyze, question, and closely inspect, can any human being truthfully say: "I believe in the Christian religion with its doctrine of sin transmitted by Adam, which required God Almighty to enter into the body of a human being and be crucified, to give himself the mental satisfaction he could attain in no other way." That is precisely what it amounts to; and when the world is made to accept it in only one way, by teaching it to children, that fact is enough to condemn it and make it a subject for ridicule and laughter, instead of seriousness and solemnity.

A child knows nothing and believes everything it is taught; and without that period of life in which to plant Christianity, the faith could no more be prolonged than vegetation could be made to grow without water.

Said Mark Twain in referring to Christian Science, an outgrowth of this fertile superstition: "At bottom I suppose I take a private delight in seeing the human race making an ass of itself again—which it has always done when it had a chance. It distresses me to hear talk of sanity in the affairs of men. So far as I know, men have never shown any noticeable degree of sanity in their affairs, and it seems like flattery to intimate they are capable of it. Sanity—in the human race! This is really fulsome."

How much truth he expressed in the words! For sanity was never possessed by any Christian on earth, and nothing has given men such a chance to make asses of themselves as when they took up with religion in any form; but the extreme limit of asininity was reached when Christianity, with its man-God and his salvation business, was taken seriously and received with reverence. Let us keep this fact before the people.

CHANNING SEVERANCE.

When we consider, for the feelings of nature cannot be dismissed, the calamities of war and the miseries it inflicts upon the human species, the thousands and tens of thousands of every age and sex who are rendered wretched by the event, surely there is something in the heart of man that calls upon him to think! Surely there is some tender chord, tuned by the hand of the Creator, that still struggles to emit in the hearing of the soul a note of sorrowing sympathy. Let it then be heard, and let man learn to feel that the true greatness of a nation is founded on principles of humanity and not on conquest. War involves in its processes such a train of unforeseen and unsuspected circumstances, such a combination of foreign matters, that no human wisdom can calculate the end. It has but one thing certain, and that is to increase taxes. I defend the cause of the poor, of the manufacturer, of the tradesman, of the farmer, and of all those on whom the real burden of taxes falls—but above all, I defend the cause of women and children—of all humanity.—Thomas Paine.

Celibacy is the essence of vulgarity. It tries to put a stain upon motherhood, upon marriage, upon love—that is to say, upon all that is holiest in the human heart. Take love from the world, and there is nothing left worth living for. The church has treated this great, this sublime, this unspeakably holy passion, as though it polluted the heart. They have placed the love of God above the love of woman, above the love of man. Human love is generous and noble. The love of God is selfish, because man does not love God for God's sake, but for his own.—R. G. Ingersoll.

Reason—a god, upon the throne of Mind—
Vouchsafes attention to the lightest thought.
Admit its sways; give heed and thou shalt find
Thy ills but phantoms that will come to naught.
But disobey the promptings he may give,
And obstacles arise at every turn;
Too short the space allotted man to live,
Unless through reason we life's lesson learn.
J. C. H.

Atheism leaves a man to sense, to philosophy, to natural piety, to laws, to reputation, all of which may be guides to an outward moral virtue though religion were not; but superstition dismounts all these.—Lord Bacon.

Wherever there is a text in the Bible which tells what God said and did, it is safe to say that the author of it had no respect for the truth.

Perhaps the worst act of the Jews was demanding the crucifixion of Jesus, for had Jesus been allowed to live there would have been no Christianity.

The next great world-religion will have this purpose for a creed: to make the whole of man worth saving. In trying to save the soul the man has been lost, and only the church has been saved.

In the parable of the prodigal son the calf was killed and the prodigal feasted. To a great many minds it looks as though it would be better to kill the prodigal and save the calf. The fool things in the parables of the New Testament would soon dissolve the structure of civilization and make good behavior liable to a term in the state prison. To get Jesus, as an authority, out of the mind would lift man into a higher plane of living. If Jesus came to Boston the brewers, who had read of his turning water into wine, would bring to him the whole of Charles River to be turned into beer.

I admire the man who has been good, but I admire the man more who has not been as good as he tried to be. To fall at the foot of our desires is better than to reach the heights of our dreams. There is always something more to be reached. Happy is the man who knows this and dies looking forward. It is the good yet to be achieved that leads the world on. The secret forces at work in our country for its destruction are to be found where men meet in the dark, where they conspire behind shutters and blinds and where they do their dirty work in whispers and innuendoes and by veiled threats and boycotts.

Yellow religion is worse than yellow literature, and the specimens of this kind of religion can be found, not only in the Old and New Testaments, but in about all of the writings of Roman Catholics for easy consumption. Read some of this writing and see. I cannot say that I believe that man has a conscious personal existence after the experience of death, and yet a coffin does not seem to fit a man. There is something outside of it that did not get into it when the man's body was put into it. It is what we know and loved. No one can say that nature is a liar, and in nature's silence where sleep the dead, who has heard the whispering of immortality?

Whose God?

When any man stands up in dramatic fashion and with raised hand declares he is telling the truth before his God, there is no hurry about accepting the statement as absolutely reliable. What is his god? That is what we wish to know. Some men's gods are no better than dead Indians, or dead snakes. Gods are as thick as men on the earth, and of about the same value morally. An oath, no matter who takes the oath, never appealed particularly to me. I can see a man; I can see what he has been doing through his life and can judge somewhat by his character whether he is to be trusted, but I cannot get in touch with a god so as to find out whether he is worth swearing by. Oaths in court are of the same quality as those on the street. The only difference is in the persons who do the swearing.

It is generally true that every man has something that he swears by; it may be his boy or his girl, it may be a dog or a god, but generally there is something. If a man means what he says; if he is honest and knows the truth when he sees it, why cannot he tell the truth without taking an oath to do so? I have always found that a man's word is as good as the man; so is his oath. And more than that, I have always found that a man's god is as good as the man, and no better. Now, if a man swears by his god that he will tell the truth, and he is a liar, what is his oath good for? No man can swear by any other god than his own. If he is a mean man he has a mean god. When a man says that he loves God, and wrongs his fellow-men, that man is a liar. Human conduct is the key to a man's religion. Before I accept the statement that a man is to be believed because he gives his testimony under oath, I wish to know what kind of a man he is. An upright, truthful man would tell the truth whether he was sworn on the Bible or on a pack of cards. To believe a man under oath is to doubt him without he is made to swear.

When the world realizes that man's gods are no better than they themselves are, and that they can swear by no other gods than their own, less value will be placed upon oaths. L. K. W.

Religious Forces.

The religious statistics of the United States for 1916 were gathered by Dr. H. K. Carroll and are published as the "Federal Council Year Book," by the Missionary Education Movement of the United States and Canada. Dr. Carroll has for many years had charge of the religious department of the government census. He reports that in 1916 "there has been an encouraging increase over the year 1915," but 1915 was an off year, so that any increase at all would be encouraging to those who hope to see the churches grow. The gain in 1916, as he figures it, is less than three-quarters of a million, or 747,000. Of these he concedes to the Roman Catholic church about 216,000.

The religious bodies of the United States, including the non-Christian, are shown by his statistical tables to have upwards of 40,000,000 communicants or members. Of the Christian communicants 25,000,000 are Protestants and 15,000,000 Catholics.

The churches did not make a large net gain of church buildings or organizations last year. All told they were only 117, which is great falling off when we recall that the Methodists used to boast that they were "building three a day."

In ministers of all sects there was a gain of 2,643, of whom 478 were Catholic priests. The war must have caused an immigration of Catholic ecclesiastics. We lately stated that there were fifty thousand more churches than ministers in the United States. That was from statistics of other recent years. The table for 1916 shows 182,843 ministers and 225,321 churches. So the churches exceed the ministers by 42,478. The slump in church building accounts for the lessened disparity between pulpits and men to fill them.

The figures of Dr. Carroll giving the number of Catholics never agree with those of the Catholic Directory. There is always 15 per cent. difference, because the Catholic statisticians count the whole Catholic population, including children who have not received their first communion. Dr. Carroll estimates that these include at least 15 per cent. of the whole number. So while the Directory claims seventeen millions, he allows fifteen millions.

Nearly all Catholics are supposed to go to church at least once a year, or to do their "Easter duty," but there must be an enormous population called Protestant that never unites itself to any Protestant church even to that extent. According to this Year Book, Protestant non-communicants outnumber Protestant communicants two to one. The whole Protestant population of the United States, this statistician estimates, is 75,000,000. That number would include the Rationalists and the indifferents; and the latter are more numerous than church members. For example, New York state, with a population of 10,000,000, is one-fourth Catholic, and it is not likely that Protestant church members have more than the same fraction. That would leave half the population unattached. In the country at large the unchurched form a still greater proportion. Dr. Carroll prints a table showing how church members embracing four-fifths of the total membership are distributed by states, and comments:

"The average of the total of communicants, 33,299,142, given in this table to the total population, 102,017,312, is as one to three plus." That is, more than two to one neglect the means of grace.

Some figures on the world's religion are included in this Year Book. They show that only a third part of the world is Christian. This is the table:

Christians	564,510,000
Confucianists and Taoists	300,830,000
Mohammedans	221,825,000
Hindus	210,540,000
Animists	158,270,000
Buddhists	138,031,000
Shintoists	25,000,000
Jews	13,052,846
Unclassified	15,280,000

Grand total.....1,647,388,846

The "grand total," which like the numbers composing it is copied by Dr. Carroll from Whitaker's Almanac, is supposed to represent the aggregate population of the world. A "population of the earth according to race," in the World Almanac, gives the world 1,691,000,000 inhabitants—approximately three times the Christian population, which is divided into groups of 272,860,000 Roman Catholics, 120,000,000 Greek Catholics, and 171,650,000 Protestants.

There is no prospect that the world will ever be converted to one religion, or rather that religion, which is the same wherever and whenever found, will ever take one name. The sects will be maintained, because it is half the life of one religionist to fight and condemn another. Rather than making new recruits worth mentioning, Christianity is having trouble in holding what it has got; for although the United States, the most populous of countries, is lumped in world religions as Christian, we have seen from Dr. Carroll's figures that the proportion of Christian church members to the entire population is only as one to three. So it is, perhaps, with the other nations nominally Christian.

Catholicism and Science.

There is nothing that more quickly affects the religious world than an announcement of certain statistics which have a greater or less pertinency to the dogmas and practices of Christianity. This fact was strikingly demonstrated when the recent book of Professor Leuba on "The Belief in God and Immortality" was given to the world. Churches that ordinarily paid little attention to the newest book dealing with religion controversially, were compelled to give some heed to that book because of the array of carefully digested figures which it gave regarding the proportion of eminent scientists who had lost all faith in the doctrines it aimed to consider.

As a seeming offset to the professor's calculations, the churches caused to be published throughout the country at about the same time, and months in advance of the issuing of the official church directories, a statement of religious statistics calling the attention of the country to the apparent great advance made numerically by the many denominations during the year 1916. It was thought that in this way the injury that might be done to faith by the scientist's computation would be, in part, if not wholly, overcome as men realized the overwhelming gains made by the churches in a year naturally unfavorable for spiritual progress. But if scientific calculations are thought of little value by the dogmatic religionist, the scientist knows that religious statistics are practically worthless; and that if the merits of the two causes are to be considered wisely, it must be with reference to their intrinsic truthfulness, and not with regard to the comparative numbers of their adherents. It was the church that taught men to say, Athanasius contra mundum; and if Athanasius as he stood alone against a heretical world is to be honored and his teachings accepted as truth, how much truer ought this to be of science as it faces a skeptical world, steeped in superstition and religious conceits! As numbers, then, count for nothing when truth is in the balance, let us take a look at the church's arguments against the discoveries of science.

The answer of the Catholic church, as voiced in the Jesuit weekly, America, is characterized by its usual sophistry and avoidance of the real issue. This paper makes a contrast between "men engaged in scientific pursuits" and "true scientists," and remarks that, while the former may have shown a marked Atheistic attitude, the latter, who alone "deserve the honored title" of scientists, "are by no means characterized, as a class, by this frame of mind." Professor Leuba has informed the public as to the sources from which he gathered his statistics regarding the religious belief of scientists; they are, we should judge, the best to be had in the land. Now if the editor of America is informed of the existence of a better list of American scientific scholars than that made use of by the Bryn Mawr professor, he will be serving a most useful purpose if he will give it at once to the general public. If he cannot do this he has failed to prove his case, and the scientific statistician still has the argument.

The Jesuit paper goes on to say that "certainly the gentlemen from whom the inquiry was made are not authoritative spokesmen for science, and it is unfortunate that a slur should have been cast on an honorable body of men." Whom does America consider "authoritative spokesmen" for science? The Roman Catholic answer to this inquiry ought to be intensely interesting. Perhaps the intention is to give the impression that as there is only one religion, the Roman Catholic, so there is only one school of "true scientists," the Catholic school; and if a body of scientists however distinguished, fails to teach what is taught as science by the Catholic school, such men are not "true scientists" but simply "men engaged in scientific pursuits." It would not require an Aristotle to see through the child-like absurdity of this phase of the matter. And as to Professor Leuba's casting "a slur" upon "an honorable body of men," the less that is said about this the better it will make the Jesuit argument appear. No scientist, so far as our experience goes, has ever cast a slur upon scientific attainments except the Roman Catholic. The papal church has been, and is now, the greatest enemy the "true scientists" have ever had to contend with. Mankind will never forget the treatment meted out to our forefathers in their struggle for scientific knowledge by that cruelest of human institutions. The most humiliating scene that ever occurred in Italy, the birthplace of the Papacy—humiliating, not for science, but for the church—was when Galileo was compelled by ecclesiastical authority to declare that the earth does not move round the sun, and left the august presence murmuring, "E pur si muove"—and yet it does move. Who was the "true scientist" in those days? and who has most effectively cast a slur upon all true scientific progress? Will America ever tell the truth about this matter?

This Catholic publication has something more to say in rebuttal of the results of scientific investigations regarding religious beliefs. As an apparent clinching argument it adds this statement: "No matter what may have formed the basis of the disbelief, it was not found in science. Science, ancient or modern, has discovered nothing whatever that runs counter to the fundamental philosophic truth that God exists, or to the clear conclusion based on the evidence of the facts of consciousness that the soul is immortal." If the Roman Catholic church has no better argument to offer than this one, by which to sustain her ecclesiastical position, the world has nothing to fear for the stability of modern science. It is not a necessity with science to show that it has no arguments to offer against the existence of a God any more than against the existence of a supreme Goddess, and a brood of little gods. As a god is not a requirement of science, but is a requirement of religion, it therefore follows that the proof for the existence of God rests with religion and not with science. And as religion has not proved the existence of a god so as to satisfy a very great part of the world, we do not see in what respect it becomes any matter of interest at all to science.

Science rightly resents all interference with the sacred pursuit of truth, all blatant and insolent church infallibility of ignorance claiming to control the sunlit realm of knowledge. Just so far as medieval religionism survives, science is in antagonism with it, and must continue the war to the death; for science is the champion of the human spirit against the tyranny of superstition, of obscurantism, of degrading ecclesiastical ambition. Truth overrides all authorities. The authorities may be venerable and lofty as the perpetual hills, but truth is the overarching sky. This is the conviction established by science. It becomes ingrained in all the workers in science. To get this conviction equally ingrained in men following religion is the only security against superstition, error and fanaticism.

Works and Days.

In every encounter with others in this life there is the possibility of honor and victory. A good day is often made up, not so much of its deep devotions, its strenuous activities, its planned recreations, as of the passing words and smiles, the spiritual emanations and radiations, which give to others the sense of joy, or beauty, or love. As a painter puts the colors on his canvas, eagerly, lovingly, so we may touch soul after soul throughout the day with some lasting color from the palette of Nature which is in our hands. A picture is made by minute touches. A day is made by its details.

"Count that day lost whose low descending sun Views from thy hand no worthy action done."

Our worthiest action will be often only a word, a peculiar intonation of the voice, a way of grasping a hand. Sometimes the worthiest action will be a silent struggle in the breast and an inward victory. Frequently the worthiest action will be a deep longing or an aspiration. No day, therefore, need be lost. We may bear ourselves in such a manner, we may so sit at the table of life, among the indiscriminate guests, we may employ our faculties, whatever they are, in such a spirit, that the day's life will be an achievement, another piece of colored glass fitted into the mosaic. We may be thankful for that day, and others may be silently thankful that we lived it.

Patriotism.

There is hardly a more abused word in the whole range of human speech than the word Patriotism. To the persistency with which its use has been pressed at all times, is largely due the fact that it carries with it no import sufficiently trustworthy to enable the thoughtful to form thereon a world-wide definition. Every nation gives its own meaning to the word; and out of this individual conception has grown a national policy more or less at variance with that held by other nations. Yet if Patriotism is to stand for anything worth while, it must embrace two fundamental conditions of all human existence, namely: Humanitarianism and Personal Character.

It ought to be apparent that a human being's first duty is to the creature of his own flesh and blood, and not to houses and lands in a particular part of the earth. Even the love of fellow-countrymen for one another ought not to take precedence of the broader and more enlightening love which humanism demands shall be shown by man to all nations alike. To be attached to one's own country as a cat feels at home only in its own garret, is to exhibit a culpable ignorance of that larger world of men and things that lies beyond our narrow purview. The sort of Patriotism that can fix its gaze only on a circumscribed piece of territory, and has no ambitions beyond the enrichment of the race of men that dwells there, will in the end forfeit the culture and refinement that follow an amicable intercourse of the nations with one another. When Thomas Paine gave expression to the thought, "The World is my country," he enriched human life and literature with one of their grandest conceptions; for it is when Patriotism is viewed as mere love of one's native land that we observe the most serious defects in the popular definition of the word. Men who, with a most commendable readiness, respond to the call of their country in the time of war, are often a constant disgrace to that same country in time of peace. Some one has said that "war is a refuge for rogues." Any nation that looks upon the readiness with which its male citizens go to war as the chief mark of a patriot, will be required in the future to change its definition materially if it hopes to attain the highest point of national efficiency. Men who hold a true love for their country will serve it faithfully at all times, as well in times of peace as in times of war. How can a man be called a patriot, even if he goes to war, if in times of peace he oppresses the poor and ignorant, makes the taxes exorbitant, robs the city, the county and the state, thereby compelling men to speak of his country as a land of grafters! The patriot is the man who at all times honors his country by the example of an honest and upright life. The way to abolish war is to abolish false ideals of patriotism, and fall in line with the best spirit of the civilization of our day.

Herndon's Unmarked Grave.

For the truth about the religious opinions of Abraham Lincoln the world of Freethought is indebted, perhaps more than to any other man, to the Hon. William H. Herndon. That is probably the reason for our receiving the following letter:

"GREENCASTLE, IND., March 15, 1917.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: The grave of William H. Herndon who was for twenty years Abraham Lincoln's law partner, is unmarked. His body lies beside that of his wife in Oak Ridge Cemetery, Springfield, Illinois, and in sight of the great monument above the grave of Lincoln. A neat and suitable granite marker can be secured for a hundred dollars, and I am going to raise that sum. I will give ten dollars. Doesn't THE TRUTH SEEKER want to do something? Of course, the church people of Springfield and elsewhere refuse to give and will otherwise oppose the movement.

"Please tell me what we may expect from you, and also, if agreeable, send me the names of a few Rationalists to whom I may apply for help. Very respectfully,
"JESSIE T. WEIK."

Instead of sending the names of Rationalists to Judge Weik, we send his name to them. They will agree that the memory of Herndon as the writer of the Life of Lincoln and the object of a great deal of clerical abuse because of his adhesion to the truth, should not be neglected. Placing a marker on his grave now will not help Herndon, but will take away reproach from his friends.

The State, a newspaper published in Columbia, S. C., questions the power of the legislature, in passing a "bone-dry" law, to deny to churches the right to import any alcoholic beverage for sacramental purposes. It inquires:

"If there be any body of Christians who believe that they should use the fermented product of the grape, may not the legislature stand aside and with respect, even with humility, consent that its customs and beliefs be not interfered with or interrupted?"

We call it a hardship for "any body of Christians" to be so interfered with, but what particular rights have a body of Christians beyond those of any other body of citizens? It is an immaterial point that Christians worship in spirit and in booze, but according them privileges denied to the unregenerate is setting a bad precedent in a secular state.

Gov. Tom C. Rye of Tennessee, with a most imperfect conception of his function as a civil magistrate, has issued a proclamation setting aside April 8 (Easter Sunday) as a day when every Tennessean should attend Sunday school. He professes to think that from the Sunday school habit "will spring countless blessings to every home in our state." It would be a greater blessing to the people of Tennessee to know that the proclamation by Governor Rye is an impertinent interference with their religious preferences, and to have the intelligence and spirit to resent it by telling him so and then staying at home on Easter Sunday.

"Who, if anybody, is priest-ridden?" inquires the Catholic Citizen. Catholics numbering fifteen millions support 21,000 priests, while 6,500,000 Baptists support 43,000 ministers. It is plain that the Catholic chicken has superior chances of surviving pastoral visitations.

Religion is a large, loose word, and it can be made to fit any motive, but once assumed, it seems to strengthen every resolution, to chloroform mercy and hallow any means to the self-sanctified end. What people would shrink from as inhuman they constantly embrace as divine.—Rupert Hughes.

MAN'S DUMB COMPANIONS.

Numberless Birds and Flowers that Seem to Prefer the Atmosphere of Human Dwelling-Places.

But, indeed, all these winged people, that dwell in the vicinity of homesteads, seem to partake of human nature.—Nathaniel Hawthorne.

Wherever a domicile of man is situated—it matters not whether it is on the immediate shore of the restless ocean, within sound and sight of the sleepless waves; upon the great grassy, billowed prairies, where erstwhile the bison trod; deep within the humid, equatorial forest, upon a clearing; like a swallow's nest, clinging to a mountain side; or on a far oasis, in the arid, sandy desert—there are nooks and spots about that dwelling-place that are reproduced in the surroundings of all other homes; that present almost exactly the same features as they, so far as it is possible for us to see or know. For the primitive needs and wants—aye, and the whims, too—of man, savage, or civilized and enlightened, do not vary a good deal throughout the world; and if it happens that a location desirable in the main is not fully adapted for a home site, other circumstances remaining the same, he will make it so. Thus in the instincts common to all sorts and conditions of men when seeking and completing their dwelling-places, can we account for the uniformity in the nature of the environments of the domiciles occupied by mankind. The traveled, beaten path, leading to the river's brink, to the bubbling spring, or to the well with its windlass and bucket; the trampled weeds; the shrubbery, spontaneous or planted mayhap by human hands; the spaded plot; the gray ash-heap by the door; the enclosures for the domesticated animals—corral, kraal, or barnyard; the little arbor beneath the trees—some, at least, of these features are found wherever man has battled with nature and tilled the rebellious ground. The owner of a brownstone mansion as well as the dweller in an igloo or a wick-i-up must come in touch with nature; and the impression that is left in all cases, as illustrated by the effects that, in establishing homes, these men leave upon the virgin features of the land, marks the fact that man is the same animal wherever found—climate, no less than time, is without effect upon his nature, broadly speaking.

Altering the phraseology a little to accord with circumstances of individual cases, each and every householder upon the face of the globe might say of his own habitation as Thoreau remarked in relation to his Walden abode, "The thick wood is not just at our door, nor the pond, but somewhat is always clearing, familiar and worn by us, appropriated and fenced in some way, and reclaimed from Nature."

That organisms are influenced and fashioned to some extent, directly or indirectly, by their surroundings, is the usual rule; but when we perceive this general sameness of domestic environments prevailing all over the broad face of the benign earth, regardless of the race, color, or social position of the master of the house, we are made aware of the fact that here the immediate surroundings, though they ever react upon him in a thousand ways, are, in a measure, created by the organism. But, of course, this modification in its proximate environment by the organism, is but a means to the end that itself shall become more securely adapted to those circumstances of its surroundings that are farther-reaching and more potent.

Now, the general sameness, artificial in one sense, that obtains about the houses of men throughout the world, has not been without its effects upon the local distribution of life. Other circumstances remaining equal, plants that take to spots of a particular nature, and animals as well, will seek and seize upon the nooks to their liking, wherever found. And if other things are not equal, if some external condition prevents the spreading of a given species of plant or animal into territory generally conducive to its success in life, then such territory will be taken possession of by beings with habits of life closely related to those of the victims of the interfering circumstance—provided, of course, that the new-comers be creatures whose make-up is such as will save them from suffering the ill-fortune of the unsuccessful aspirants.

It is a notorious fact that there are numberless forms of life that seek the atmosphere of man's dwelling-places (we are leaving out of consideration, be it understood, all domesticated animals and cultivated plants), and it is partially due to this fact that the local distribution of life has everywhere been influenced by man's agency—in a great degree unconsciously. In many cases (as witness the blue-bird, which, however, owing to the competition of the English sparrow, has largely returned to its old haunts) animals leave their habitat of ages, and seek, if not the companionship of man, then the conveniences that his home surroundings afford—perchance in order to be safe from natural enemies, or to pick up a good and easy living about his out-buildings, or to be sheltered from the wintry blast.

We have not to do with mere camp-followers, as the hungry coyote who hies from his hiding-place afar, and, when, twilight falls, slinks and skulks about the settlers' outbuildings with the object in view of making a meal of domestic poultry; nor yet with the rapacious hawk that sometimes hovers near, have we to deal. It is ours to dwell briefly upon a few of the many life-forms that find the domestic environs of mankind available as permanent dwelling-places, or at all events occasionally spend a season with us.

The mice and rats are cosmopolitan, or more nearly so than is desirable; they have followed man practically wherever he has gone. The English sparrow is continually advancing—constantly pushing into new countries and into new corners of the old; he evidently believes in expansion, and judging from the way in which he lords it over weaker rivals, in imperialism also. A short time ago at a certain homestead in South Dakota none of these birds were to be found. One day a pair were seen investigating matters about the stable; and a day or so later a flock of twenty or more had taken up their abode about the premises.

Besides such as are practically cosmopolitan, every country has its own particular life-forms about the home. In southern Arizona, says A. A. Field, and as we can testify from our own observation, the "great glossy ravens . . . have so adapted themselves to civilization as to have become almost a necessity as purveyors of edible refuse and debris which accumulate in such abundance about the abodes of mankind." We have watched the magpies in South Dakota and Utah perform a like office about the doors of the houses. In addition to this they largely take the place of the eastern bluejays, which in the latter state are not found, and in the former are present only in the summer season (where we observed them), and do not seek the dooryards but are truly birds of the wilds.

The robins build in the crotches of old apple trees, or upon beams in the barn. The wrens take possession of every conceivable or available crevice about the premises. The purple martins occupy the bird-boxes—they are the aristocrats of their tribe. The English sparrows, already mentioned, are everywhere with their ceaseless clamor. The cliff swallows are content to share the space beneath the eaves with the mud-wasps. Everywhere in our country—over the lone ranch-house in the west and the cities of the east—sail the night-hawks, seeking the insects that are attracted by tens of thousands to our habitations. Twittering, on the wing, especially near the close of day, we see the fairy-motivated swifts, or chimney-swallows, who, in their occupancy of the chimneys, have no rivals except sometimes soot and smoke. In unnamed hollows and unlooked-for holes sleep by day the bats and owls. What a vast number of winged neighbors we find that we have when we come to count them all! And a very few have been named here.

The flora of the domestic sphere is no less interesting than the fauna. The plebeian shepherd's purse, "the commonest of weeds," has been "naturalized wherever civilized man is found." In northeastern Utah, at a point where those highways of plant-dispersal, the railroads, have not yet penetrated, we met, not the common mallow (Malva rotundifolia) which both in the well-settled portions of our own country and in the Old World is a common wayside and dooryard weed—children eat the fresh capsules under the name of "cat-cheeses," and similar terms—but a close relative thereof, Callirrhoe in volucrata, a taller, more attractive-flowered species than its more vulgar kinsman. No doubt until the crack of doom Callirrhoe will remain man's close companion in many regions of our western country, just as the common mallow is likely to continue a common feature of our vegetal environments elsewhere. By the by, the latter species flourishes in Salt Lake City and other places where irrigation is extensively practiced.

What dooryard in our land is without its knot-weed, and mallow, and plantain, and ground-ivy and catnip? If not these, then others of similar habits, and with the marks of domestication indelibly stamped upon them forever, are certain to be met with in every spot that partakes in however small degree of the nature of a dooryard. In southern Arizona near the triune peak yclept the Triplets, we well remember a small spring far up in the bare and sunburned mountains, shaded by a tree or two, where from time to time travelers were wont to water their tired and thirsty horses, and haply to eat a noonday lunch—about that little spring whose immediate surroundings alone bore the stamp of man's civilization, far removed from others of their kind we found the Canada fleabane (Leptilon Canadense) and a species of cockle-bur, field-weeds both, thriving in luxuriance.

But let us leave the dooryard and its immediate associations. The pasturelands have been, to some extent, reclaimed from wild nature, and in general the aspects of the ground have been changed since it was first fenced in. In the pastures, where the grazing stock harm them not, but on the other hand unconsciously protect them by devouring many of their enemies, the blue and the hoary vervain flourish better now, we doubt not, than in their haunts of yore. We have seen Illinois pastureland knolls rivaling in color the skies and lakes and twilight realms, so thickly have they been covered with these two nervains. To the pastures we go to find the yarrow, and thistles, and the dandelion, and various buttercups in their greatest abundance. Competition here with other forms is not so great as in some other places—that is the philosophy of the thing. The plants under present consideration are now unconsciously cultivated by the cows!

And let us not forget the barnyard (though it is filthy enough), where velvet-weed and May-weed and smartweed, and Roman wormwood, and amaranth, and Jimson-weed reign paramount; or the roadsides where the great ragweeds flourish, where the wild sunflowers flaunt their yellow banners in the sun, where the white and the yellow sweet-clover scent the air, where their red-topped relative (Trifolium pratense) invites the industrious bees, and where the humble knot-grass clings close to the generous ground. And again, let us not pass by without mention the railroad embankment where a host of flowers "burst and bloom." Many treasures indeed are to be found there. In one county in Illinois where we had seen the dwarf larkspur and a puccoon (Lithospermum linearifolium), respectively, in only one other locality, along the railroad they ever bloomed in lavish abundance! Just as a new country through which a railroad is constructed, quickly becomes settled by human beings thereafter, so it becomes stocked with new plants also. Seeds of various kinds have become mixed with grain that is being freighted, or are imbedded in the dung of animals, which, on crumbling, falls from the stock-car, or perchance a traveler flings from the coach-window a nosegay in which there chance to be some ripening capsules.

But what boots it to us that we continue further? We have seen that wherever man has set his foot, more or less of domestication has been the result; that whenever he pushes into new territory, cheek by jowl to abide with him—seeking fresh fields and pastures new—goes a host of animals and plants that ever afterward are as completely inseparable from their liege lord as the very gods of his household.

H. TULSEN.
St. Louis, Mo.

The orthodox Christian tells us that "a dying God" is the necessary condition of human salvation. With a meaning quite other than his, and in a sense far more profound, the saying is true. We, however, will put the word in the plural, and say, not only one god, but many, even all the gods of the past and the present, must die in order that man may be saved. The gods have thrived and grown great, have dominated the world and held it in stagnant subjection, because they have fed on human superstition and ignorance and fear. As Apollo was fabled to shoot his arrowy shafts of light through the night-dragons that opposed the coming of day, so the shafts of an ever-brightening intelligence must slay the old-time gods, if a better day is to dawn for the religious life of the world. Only as the gods die is a higher life reborn for man.

It may at first appear strange that the very best and noblest men of any age must seem wicked to that age. But the explanation is simple enough. The average man must judge his fellows by the conventions and standards of his time. He who loves more than they do, must love some things that they regard as unlovely, and think he ought to hate. He who reasons more conformably to truth than they do, must fix his mind on subjects that they think unworthy of it. He must do and say things that they have been accustomed to condemn. Not only was it so with such men as Bruno, Vanini, Paine and Ingersoll; but, in every department of thought or life, it must ever be so in the case of him who runs ahead, and so gets out of sympathy with his age. They have no rules large enough to measure him by, and so they pronounce him monstrous. It is so in art and science and morals and philosophy, as well as in religion.

THE JESUS COMPOSITE III.

Antiquity Replete with Messiahs of That Name Paralleling the Son of Man.

The story of Jesus Pandera of the Talmud conforms with the Jesus Panthera of Celsus on at least one point, namely, that he learned magic in Egypt. The Talmud account makes Jesus out a seducer, whereas Celsus represents him as the offspring of a seduction. Both characters, however, were magicians, Egyptian educated, and impostors.

In a possible appropriation of the Talmudian Jesus to Christian uses, we find the stoning applied to James as a brother of Jesus, while Jesus is crucified.

Some of the collective moral teachings ascribed to the composite Jesus were taken from most remarkable sources. For example, Dr. B. Pick, in McClintock and Strong's Biblical Cyclopedia, x, 174, article Talmud, illustrates the process. He observes:

"In one of the treatises of the Talmud called Challah we find, almost verbatim, what our Lord says in Matt v, 28, and yet that portion of the Talmud is written in language so obscene and immoral that it would be difficult to meet its equal among the most licentious publications of ancient or modern times. We challenge any admirer of Talmud to translate the treatise and publish it."

The following quoted passage from the Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. vii, p. 170, may be of interest:

"R. Joshua b. Perahyah is said to have fled with his pupil Jesus to Alexandria in order to escape the persecutions of the Jewish king Yannai (103-76 B. C.); on their return Jesus made a remark on the not faultless beauty of their hostess, thereupon R. Joshua excommunicated him; and when Jesus approached him again and was not received he set up a brick for his god, and led all Israel into apostasy (Sanh. 107b; Sotah 47a; Yer. Hag. 77d). This account is supplemented by the statement, made on the assumption that Ben Stada is identical with Ben Pandera, that Ben Stada brought magic from Egypt (Shab. 104b). The story that Joshua b. Perahyah, a contemporary of Simeon b. Shetah, was the teacher of Jesus, is not clearly stated in the various 'Toledot'; it is said merely that Jesus was named after this brother of his mother. The assumption that Joshua b. Perahyah was the uncle of Jesus is confirmed by Kirkisani, who wrote about 937 a history of Jewish sects. The references to Yannai, Salome Alexandra, and Joshua b. Perahyah indicate that according to the Jewish legends the advent of Jesus took place just one century before the actual historical date; and some medieval apologists for Judaism, as Nahmanides and Salman Zebi, based on this fact their assertion that the 'Yeshu' mentioned in the Talmud was not identical with Jesus; this, however, is merely a subterfuge." (Art. "Jesus of Nazareth in Jewish Legend.")

If we persist in establishing a historical priestly Jesus, approximating the period of the Gospel Jesus, we may find one (Josephus, Ant. xv. 9, Sec. 3)—if we accept the statement of Ireneus that Jesus was nearly fifty when crucified in the year 28 or 30 A. D.—in Jesus Ben Phabi, 30 B. C., who was deposed by Herod the Great. This Jesus' father's name was the Greek equivalent of Ishmael. "It follows from this that Jesus b. Phabi was a native of Egypt, like his predecessor Hananeel." (Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. vii, p. 173.)

If we persist in establishing an historical messianic pretender, we also find him in Josephus ("B. J." ii, 20, Sec. 4) and his name was Jesus Ben Zappha or Zopha. He was "general of Idumaea in the first century, appointed by the revolutionary government of Jerusalem after Cestius Gallus had been driven away. Jesus is perhaps identical with a former high priest of the same name, who, together with other nobles, fled from Jerusalem to the Romans shortly before the destruction of the Temple. (Jewish Encyclopedia, vol. vii, p. 173.) Surely one of these Jesuses should satisfy the demands of historicity.

Epiphanius described the first Christians as Nazoreans, a sect existing before Christ and knowing nothing of an historical Christ, as observing Jewish festivals, practices, etc., and closely related to the Jessaeans. Drews speculates that they later coalesced. Sawyer points out that there were two Christian sects at the time of the writing of Revelation, one including the seven congregations which were at Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamus, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea; the other, those of the Catholics at Antioch, Rome, and Alexandria. Drews comments that "Revelation is a Jewish-Gnostic work, the Jesus of which is more primitive than the Jesus of the gospels. But Revelation is entirely and certainly of astral character." (Historicity of Jesus, p. 315.)

Among the early and pre-Christian sects, we have the Nazirite-Nazarite (consecrated to God) significant among the ancient Hebrews as one devoted to Yahwe (Jehovah), one who takes a Nazarite vow of separation or consecration; maidens consecrated to the service of Belthi. A Nazir, a devotee, characterized by unshorn locks and abstinence from wine and from approaching a dead body, even of a nearest relative; or one dedicated by his mother for life with a vow that no razor should come upon his head. Samson is the only known early type. "No less a person than the apostle Paul is supposed by them to have taken such a vow." (Encyclopedia Biblica, vol. iii, p. 3364.) John the Baptist and Apollonius were typical of the sect. Jesus is pictured to us as a Nazarite. The Nazorean woman in the dress of a harlot (Prov. vii, 10) may possibly be identified with the maidens consecrated to the service of Belthi (sacred prostitution).

If one will carefully peruse the 587 pages of the seventh edition of Doane's "Bible Myths" and Robertson's "Pagan Christs," he will finally concede the Oriental mythical origin of the miraculous birth, the star of Bethlehem, the song of the heavenly host, the recognition and gift receptions of the divine child, the slaughter of the Innocents, the Temptation and forty-day Fast, the crucifixion, and the darkness at the crucifixion. Also the descent into hell, the resurrection and ascension, the second coming and the millenium, the judgment of the dead, the Creator Christ, the Alpha and Omega, the Christian miracles, the eucharist or Lord's Supper, the baptism, the worship of the virgin mother, the Trinity, the birthday of Jesus, and the Christian symbols. Moreover, unless his affections and prejudices have too greatly colored his understanding I should predict that one will be able to comprehend that Chrissa, Mithra, and Buddha, as well as Joshua, are represented in the composite Christian Jesus.

Drews (p. 290) says: "The fact is that there is nothing, absolutely nothing, either in the actions or words of Jesus, that has not a mythical character or cannot be traced to parallel passages in the Old Testament or the Talmud, and is therefore under suspicion of being derived from them."

"It is a complete misunderstanding of the facts to say that this admitted 'mythical wool' of the gospels proves nothing against their substantial accuracy, and to convict those who reject the historical Jesus of defective method. The wrong method is altogether on the side of those who believe in an historical Jesus, although there is not a single passage in the gospels they can show to be historical."

Drews adduces considerable evidence to show that the Jewish Gnostic sects antedated the Christian era; that they had their rudimentary Christ Jesus, Joshua, modeled along the lines of the Old Testament prophecies. Among the pre-Christian sects which sooner or later merged into the Christian cult were the Gnostics ("the root of the whole of Christianity") and the Naassenes with their modified and adapted God-sown seed springing from the Logos which produces the world, pictured in Revelation and Paul, including astral attributes.

In the gospels of Mark (ix, 39), Luke (ix, 49; x, 17), the Acts (iii, 16), and in the Epistle of James (v, 14), we read that the name Jesus had a miraculous power, and the Talmud also says that about the end of the first century disease was healed in the name of Jesus.

We thus observe that the several pre-Christian sects of the Jesus-type of Christians were not far removed from the gospel Christian period. These sects were scattered, but that they worshiped their god under the name of Jesus (Latin) or Joshua (Hebrew) is not regarded as improbable by Drews. Many bits of evidence support this view.

Isaiah furnished, as Drews shows, a pre-Christian Christ as well as a pre-Christian Jesus. We have the suffering and death of the servant of God, his resurrection and exaltation by God, and through it, of the spiritual and corporal redemption of man.

Eusebius traces both Jesus and Christ to Moses, and Justin emphasizes the relationship of Jesus with Joshua of the Hebrew scriptures, and points out that Joshua, who was originally called Hosea (Anses), received the name Joshua from Moses. In the words of Drews: "He appointed a man high-priest of God in the highest possible sense, and called him Christ."

According to Drews, the Gnostics even to the second century questioned the historical (mortal) existence of Jesus, and themselves believed, as did the earliest Christians, only in an ideal, a metaphysical conception. Says Drews (ibid, p. 59):

"The earlier Christian literature is acquainted with a Jesus-god, a god-man, a heavenly high-priest and savior Jesus, a metaphysical spirit, descending from heaven to earth, assuming human form, dying, and rising again; but it knows nothing whatever about a merely human Jesus, the amiable author of fine moral sentiments, the 'unique' personality of liberal Protestantism."

The Jesus of the present gospels is thus a composite of many origins, set in fulfillment of two distinct Jewish prophecies, pictured to correspond to a unification of mortal man and God. This Jesus complex, purely a metaphysical God until the year 70 A. D., on the fall of Jerusalem and demand for the Jewish messiah, then took on the messianic aspects. The earlier concept is represented by Matthew, the later one by Luke. Later still, the compromise or composite Son of God and Messiah, the developed Christian conception, regardless of many contradictions of Mark, Matthew, and Luke, is represented by the gospel of John.

The significant manner in which the Christian framers of the present text of the New Testament concealed the derivation of the Latin name Jesus from the Greek Jason and the Hebrew Joshua, is illustrated in the translation from the original Greek of the epistle of Jude of the passage: "The Lord having saved the people out of the land of Egypt." The original Greek text as reproduced in Buttmann's Greek edition of the original edition gives the name Jesus instead of the Lord.

It is self-evident that the motive for destroying the identity of Jesus with Joshua was to open the way for a separate and later alleged historical character. Certainly it was not the Jesus of the New Testament instead of Joshua, the second Moses, who accomplished this redeliverance of the Israelites out of Egypt.

The characterization, "God our Savior" (Jude, verse 25), is also significant. In this we must either regard the savior Jesus Christ as God instead of Son of God, or the God Jehovah (Yahveh) as the savior. It is also interesting that the introduction to Jude presents him (Jude) as the brother of James, but as servant instead of brother of Jesus Christ. Elsewhere, James is represented as the brother of Jesus.

During the first and second centuries of the Christian era, the Gnostics, or, as Gibbon puts it, "at least the Nazarenes (Nazoreans) continued as a religious sect distinguished only by their obstinate perseverance in the practice of their Mosaic rites." They regarded the newly created mortal Jesus as an ordinary man. In this they may have had reference to Jesus, son of Ananus, an historical character (Josephus) of about A. D. 66, an unlettered maniac, who while in attendance upon the feast of tabernacles at Jerusalem, cried out day and night of hearing voices from the directions of the four winds, etc., as he passed through the streets of the city.

The following described behavior of Jesus, son of Ananus, reminds one strangely of passages in Isaiah liii. When brought before Albinus, the Roman authority, after having been arrested and beaten, which failed to stop his cries, he was said to have been scourged until the flesh was stripped from his bones, yet he neither craved mercy nor shed tears, though every stroke was accompanied with the mournful cry: "Woe to Jerusalem." When interrogated he made no reply. "He cursed none that beat him nor thanked those who gave him food." He was set free as insane. He conforms to the selected passages in Isaiah: "He was oppressed, and he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth; he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth." "He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief." "Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows; yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted. But he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed." . . . "The Lord hath laid on him ~~the~~ iniquity of us all . . . for he was cut off out of the land of the living: for the transgression of my people was he stricken."

It should be observed that while Jesus, son of Ananus, conforms best to the "Servant of Javeh" of Isaiah liii, who voluntarily submits to suffering in order to expiate the sin and guilt of the people, as Drews puts it, he also presents a significant resemblance to the Christian Jesus who also voluntarily experiences the passion and suffers an alleged crucifixion in atonement for the sin of Adam. To what extent Josephus purposely likened this son of Ananus to the Jewish prophecies must be a matter of individual conjecture.

HOMER WAKEFIELD, M. D.

A Leaf from Satan's Diary.

SOMEWHERE IN SPACE, 12,000,000 B. C., Friday, Jan. 13.—The Governor has been working like a steam-shovel for twenty-eight million years to corral the essential raw materials with which to create a universe.

I have an idea he thinks I ought to have given him a lift in gathering some of the coarser elements, but I still feel young enough to play hooky with a clear conscience. Besides, I've done some real hard head work in formulating my plans to make man do things after the Governor gets man created and into operation. Anyway, I have no good reason to worry about what the Governor thinks as he always has treated me pretty decently and I've never seen him really sore about anything except when I've tried to pump him about his ancestors. I suspect that maybe some of them had a "past" that the Governor doesn't want me to advertise around in the various parts of the universe that he is arranging to create. While I am very fond of hearing and passing along all brands of racy gossip, and while it seems to me that a creator's pedigree would be rich stuff to pass along, I must not let myself indulge in a trifling recreation now which might jeopardize my unlimited pleasure in the Governor's universe after he gets it all shaped up and working.

So I'll continue to tell the Governor that I've loafed around in every cubic fathom of the space in which he intends to install a universe and I haven't bumped into a single guy that didn't admit that the Governor is in undisputed possession of 110% of all the brains extant. I'll tell him that if his mind were as bulky as it is strong and clever it would fill all the space there is and there would be no place to put a universe. I'll tell him that all the wisdom that ever can exist throughout the universe, outside of his own dome, necessarily will be just the little fragments of his own wisdom that he graciously may choose to distribute around. I'll tell him that the only real thrills I've ever had in life were from watching him invent the law of gravitation, and then gather huge quantities of nothing from nowhere and convert it into regular atoms suitable for the construction of a universe, and then use the law of gravitation to hold the stuff in place while completing his plans for the Milky Way and man and other details of his big scheme. A little soft soap is a great asset even when reserved exclusively for the Governor.

Well, now that I've decided how to keep the Governor industrious and in a sunny frame of mind while I loaf and plot, I might as well get busy on the ramification of my plans for having fun with man.

I understand that it is the Governor's idea to make man spend a lot of time sending up wireless messages of flattery to His Majesty. When I tell myself, privately, what I honestly think of the Governor I have to admit that he is an eye-opener as an inventor and demonstrator of the possibilities of strictly New Thought but, so far as his jurisdiction over my realm is concerned, he is a bona-fide joke. His one great failing is his fondness for compliments, but perhaps he gets that from his primitive ancestors and should be excused for it. Anyhow I couldn't reform him by a curtain-lecture, but I may be able, after getting past this B. C. age, to reduce the dimensions of his vanity by putting man wise to the fact that the Governor has ulterior motives in establishing a system of prayer books and ethics for Wednesday evenings and Sundays. But I won't put man wise too rapidly. I want to spend a few thousand years in getting man confused as to the perfectly proper way to gain permanent admission to the post mortem cabaret which the Governor is going to establish as an inducement for man to be generous in his praise of the Governor.

After the Governor induces man to organize a religious society with rules and regulations whereby members can pray without thinking, praise by subconscious habit, and enjoy ignorance harmoniously, I'll get after a few of the main pilots and show them how each one can make as much money as all combined will be making at the time. I'll just suggest to each pilot that he go among men and preach that all the original procedure for getting cabaret tickets is highly faulty and dangerously inadequate. I'll suggest that each of the central station pilots proclaim a revamped, expurgated, and amended code of procedure under a coined name suitable for advertising purposes. Man, as I understand the Governor's specifications, is going to have a funny kind of a mind. Man, beginning as a boy, is going to follow the leader—as a general rule. Boy will follow the boy leader who catches on rapidly-moving freight trains, steals neighbor's watermelons, etc. Man will follow the man leader who comes along with new sleight-of-hand tricks and new methods of remitting 10% of his income to the Governor.

The result will be a beautiful medley of creeds which will divide man into hostile camps that will be a source of genuine entertainment for a venturesome fellow like me. It will be immense fun to watch the various groups of men collide with one another using theories, boycotts, dreadnaughts, creeds, and the like, for the purpose of civilizing each other.

Well, on another day I'll work out a few more ideas and have them ready for man.

HOLLIS CORBIN, Scribe.

Limitations of the Common People.

What do the common people know anyway? Have they ever read Herbert Spencer? No; they would drop dead if they should try; would need a surgical operation to get it through their heads. What do they know of Spencer, Huxley, Hume, or Charles Darwin; or what do they know of Kant, or Plato, or Socrates or Schopenhauer, or Bergson?

Turn to politics, do they know anything about Adam Smith or John Stuart Mill or any man who ever said anything worth listening to, or wrote anything worth reading? No; they wouldn't go to hear Herbert Spencer make a speech. They would think it was the Spencer who invented writing. They are not interested in science, philosophy, logic, government. They go to the baseball games, the movies, the saloons, the churches; and they read the newspapers. How are you going to make anything out of them? The man who speaks on history, philosophy, or science, they do not care for. It is the Billy Sundays and the Billy Bryans, the billy-goats and the Billy-be-damns. They are the ones who move the crowd.

What do they talk about? Well, I don't know; I don't go. They talk about conventional morality, cheap aphorisms, use catch words, appeal to deep-rooted prejudices, wave the flag, religion, "mother, home and heaven!" Anything to get a vote or a cheer. What do they talk about? Anything that enlightens the mind? If they did, the public wouldn't go. Anything that adds to real culture? Anything that moves to real inspiration? They talk about the things that the people feel and those are the commonplace things or the people wouldn't feel them; necessarily the commonplace things. Why, it is a matter of arithmetic, almost. Here are a million people; some idiots at one end—we will not count them—some geniuses at the other, the front few; down below them a considerable number of men of talent, but not very many. Who are the rest? Why, the common people who live an automatic life, who hold conventional opinions, who fear change; who are moved by the common things, and nothing else.—Clarence Darrow, in the Modern School.

It is not science, but faith or credulity, that founds religions. All nations have designated under the name of "acts of faith" the works of a man who shuts his eyes in order that he may see the better. It is by walking with faith, that is to say, with closed eyes, that we arrive at the gates of Paradise. The census of that locality, if we could take it from this distance, would show us more unlettered than learned persons. The child who knows his catechism by heart is more acceptable in the sight of God than all the students in a great university. The church never hesitates between an astronomer and a monk. Knowledge is full of dangers. Not only does it puff up the heart of man, but it often destroys, by its reasoning, the best constructed fables. It is that which has so effectively weakened the church during the last hundred years. Who can say how many souls have been cast into hell by the invention of printing? And yet men continue their investigations. Only a few men have been deterred from their intellectual studies by the fact that enlarged information brings increasingly greater incredulity regarding the church's claims. The fact that the church can no longer coerce the human mind into accepting its teachings without investigation, is one of the best signs of intellectual freedom, and heralds the day when the church will be known only in its past history, as the school boy of our time acquires his knowledge of ancient Egypt.

The heading on an article by Garrett P. Serviss in the Journal of March 26 is "Myths of Evolution Fade Before Scientifically Ascertained Facts." A perusal of the article shows that the thing which fades before scientific facts is the myth of the creation, and we assume that that is what Professor Serviss would have stated in his heading had not the editor thwarted with his intent.

NOTES AT LARGE.

Labeled "Another Cry from an Economist," the following communication has been received:

"Last Sunday I heard a reverend gentleman preach to girls on the temptations of the city. He said: 'Come to me my dear, lonely girl; I have a crown for you.' But any girl not an idiot might retort 'What good would your crown be to me—living on $5 a week? What I want is my wages doubled, if I have to work, or better still I want to see a society in which the man who loves me can make enough to marry me and give me a home.'

"(1) Query: Would a complete set of Ingersoll or Voltaire help these girls any more than the robe of glory? Certainly not. Then there must be a place for economics even in a Freethought paper unless it absolutely excludes all considerations of human welfare from its province. (2) Query: Are Freethought papers maintained by the beneficiaries or by the victims of the present social disorder? It is too true that the takers of rent and interest and dividends, whether in church or out of church, do not want the sources of their incomes looked into too closely. (3) Query: Would a complete set of Ingersoll be the best answer to the bread rioters? Rather is it not economic investigation—the honest effort to cure the economic ills of society?"

MARY MONICO.

If we are expected to answer the foregoing queries, we will reply to the first (1) that "a complete set of Ingersoll or Voltaire" would indeed help the girls much more than any robe of glory the reverend gentleman has to bestow. In the first place, these sets have a commercial (or is it economic?) worth, and would bring a sum, if disposed of, that no robe of glory can command. Thus they have a physical value, and when it comes to literary, mental, intellectual, psychological importance, the robe is nowhere. (2) Freethought papers are supported by all sorts and conditions of men and women, among whom are capitalists, the beneficiaries, and wage earners, the victims, of "the present social disorder." They take THE TRUTH SEEKER because they are Freethinkers, and not because they are capitalists or wage earners. None of them has applied to us for instruction in economics. (3) It in no way detracts from the value of the writings of Ingersoll to say that they do not directly answer the bread rioters. They were not primarily intended for that purpose. But because an author is not a provision dealer, or a publisher a baker, is their product to be despised? To offer a set of Ingersoll to bread rioters would be absurd, perhaps, but not more so than the criticism implied in this query. And we wish to remark that economics and economic investigations do not touch all that pertains to human welfare. Human beings have minds as well as bodies. Freethought does not profess to react directly upon economic conditions, although the fact that most economic reformers have been Freethinkers would show that there is some relation between rebellion against religious authority and against social conservatism. We ought to warn our young correspondent against becoming possessed with the idea that only one sort of reform or improvement is worth while, and that all endeavor that does not at least divide its efforts with that particular movement is incomplete. We have seen economic conditions discussed and investigated for more than forty years, and as economic conditions are no better now than they were then, since young girls are forced to live on $5 a week and bread riots occur, we are by no means sure that wage-earners would not have profited as much by reading Ingersoll and investigating religion as they have from perusing Marx and Proudhon and investigating economics. Investigation may not mean remedy in all cases; still, without that which has taken place, conditions might have been worse. While we never hear Freethinkers minifying the work of Marx and the necessity of economic agitation, we constantly meet with criticisms of Ingersoll and Freethought by the economic cranks. They began immediately after Ingersoll's death, and were answered for all time by Edwin C. Walker, himself an all-round radical, who told them that Ingersoll chose the work he thought the most important, or himself the best adapted to carry on, and made a success of it. So Mr. Walker advised the economic reformers to quit finding fault with Ingersoll and to do their work as well as he did his—if they could.

Most of us are without knowledge on which to base a guess as to the permanence of a republic in Russia. F. Cunliffe-Owen, the journalist, is doubtful. He says:

"Those who know Russia best, and whose experience of her people is derived from sojourns of some duration in their country, who are equally well acquainted with Germany, are far more inclined to look for a permanent republic at Berlin than at Petrograd.

"This is due to the fact that the sentiment of the vast masses of the Russian people is religious and monarchical, the two being blended together in a manner almost incomprehensible to western nations whereas in Germany reason and science, with their consequent unbelief, have to a great extent taken the place of faith while intellectual progress has carried with it a corresponding rebellion against the authority of the anointed of the Lord."

But Victor S. Yarros, an idealist of the Philosophical Anarchist school, but withal a sane and competent newspaper man, and probably a Russian, writes in the Public (New York):

"Fortunately, the men now at the helm in Russia are practical, moderate, able and thoroughly disciplined. They are neither narrow-minded Chauvinists nor Utopian radicals. They are loyal Russians, and they will be zealous and energetic organizers of victory in the field. They are also progressives and sane constitutionalists. They are not likely to deceive themselves as to the chances of a counter-revolution. They know that the black hundreds and the dark forces of the empire have not been completely disarmed. They have not forgotten the revolution of 1904-5. They know that pogroms, 'holy crusades' for the 'white czar' and the Orthodox church, malicious and venomous slanders of the revolutionary leaders, may be resorted to with some hope of success. If they succeed in thwarting their enemies and averting a reaction, the revolution will mean a new and bright era for Russia, an era of great, if cautious, social, economic, political and religious reforms."

The official religion of Russia is Greek Catholicism, which knows as little of religious liberty as the Roman variety. Nothing else has been allowed, although there are said to be 5,000,000 Romanists in Russia proper. Conversions were not permitted from the Orthodox to any other communion. After the war with Japan the czar promulgated an edict of religious toleration, but the Holy Synod took care that it was not made effective. The priests will have to be handled somewhat after the Mexican fashion if the reform is to be successful. THE TRUTH SEEKER, of course, has not been allowed in Russia. The country has stood as the synonym of all species of tyranny and oppression. With suffrage, liberty of speech and publication, and some attention paid to public education, there is no reason why the nation should not now become great and free. Its greatest handicaps in the past have been ignorance and superstition. It is significant that Cunliffe-Owen attributes the difference between Russia and Germany—the one backward and medieval, the other advanced and modern—to the development in Germany of science and reason and the neglect of them in the czar's religiously ruled country. Had the revolution taken place in Germany, where one is woefully needed, the people would be ready to make it a durable success.

That brilliant Jewish clergyman, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise of the Free Synagogue, New York, in his opening sermon against "Billy Sundayism," used two very appropriate terms as descriptive of the evangelist—a "theological standpatist" and a "theological strike-breaker." The evangelist stands on past superstition and has no notion of religious progress. And besides thus standing pat (a term used in the game of poker as indicating that the player will not attempt to improve his hand by discarding a part hoping to get something better), he makes it more difficult for anyone else to improve his religious circumstances. Thousands of persons are, as might be said, on strike against orthodoxy. They want better terms, and the evangelist prevents by taking theology as it is or has been. It is an insult to the independent worker to class Sunday as a "scab," but in the opprobrious sense of the term he is nothing else. He also stands pat with the worst of the past regarding war. "I wish, Lord," he prays, "you'd tell America to help wipe Germany off the map, as you commanded Israel to destroy the idolatrous and corrupt Canaanites." That is pure, barbaric Yahwehism. His cure for an auto-cracy is destruction, not reform of the nation. He sees nothing in revolutions, like our own and those of France and Russia, as a means of alleviating the conditions of the people—only destruction, extermination, putting to the sword, ripping-up, the killing of "everything that breatheth"—for which see the scriptural precedent in the case of the Canaanites. "What'll I do?" he says. "Why, I'll turn the New York tabernacle into a recruiting station. I'll call for recruits—volunteers for Christ and the United States army. I'll have recruiting officers there to sign them up. I'll raise enough of an army, myself to beat down to the dust the devil's hordes that are murdering our womenfolk." To borrow an ejaculation, "Can you beat it!" He continues: "Jesus will be our commander-in-chief, and he has Von Hindenburg beaten to a frazzle. And maybe he hasn't it in for the miserable heresy that crawled out of Leipsic and Heidelberg." The "heresy," the Higher Criticism of the German professors, is to him the idolatry of the Canaanites, and demands the same methods of extinction. Coming to New York on All Fools day, the evangelist will find a certain number of believers in war for war's sake responsive to his mood. The prospect of his doing much in his regular line as a challenger of Satan is rather unpromising. New York keeps its head and is not excited or enthused over his promised appearance. By turning his tabernacle into a recruiting station and "counting Bill Sunday in up to his neck when war comes" he may hope to save the situation that needs saving if New York does not.

Writing of conditions in the state of Yucatan, Mexico, a correspondent of the Outlook has told how the restriction of the Catholic clergy to their clerical duties reduced the number of churches, to the apparent satisfaction of the people, who got along quite well without them and made no complaint of the deprivation. In harmony with conditions in Yucatan are those in the state of Sonora, as reported by Dr. W. A. Evans in the Chicago Tribune (March 26). Dr. Evans, who has recently returned from Mexico, says:

"To my mind the most interesting development of the last six years has been the complete abolishment of religion."

"There are no priests to confess the dying. I asked as to that and was told that some of the old peon women wanted opportunities to confess before they died, but that was the exception."

"I asked about burying the dead. They are buried without ceremony of any sort and the people seem satisfied. I asked about masses and other Sunday services. I was told that Sunday is like any other day. The old church-going custom merely lapsed without any sort of disarrangement of the other custom of the people."

"As an offset they have prohibition. In Sonora there is no pulque, no tequila, no drink of any sort, and no saloons. Eight years ago drunken men could be seen lying on the street and often a mounted policeman would be seen dragging a drunken man through the streets, using for the purpose a leathern thong fastened around the wrist. Now one sees no drunkenness."

It is but a few years since a professor in the Wesleyan University at Middletown, Connecticut, was discharged for saying in an address delivered elsewhere that he thought the community would be better off if all the churches were closed for a year. That is no doubt just as applicable in Connecticut and the rest of the United States as it is in Mexico, where the experiment is made with satisfactory results. Thousands of parishes east of the Mississippi that once had churches, now have them no more. They have sunk into innocuous disuse, and nobody cares. They were superfluous.

Mr. Joseph McCabe, the eminent English Rationalist and lecturer, who is now speaking in this country, accorded an interview to a New York Times reporter, in which he made some interesting comments upon the European war, especially in connection with the German nation and its chief military leaders. Many of his statements may come like a revelation to some persons in this country of German descent. When Mr. McCabe was asked by the reporter how he accounted for Germany's fall from being a nation of poets and thinkers, to what she is today, he answered in this way: "Germany was never a nation of poets and thinkers. Even Prussia could not degenerate from a standard it had never reached. In the days of Goethe and Schiller eighty per cent. of the German people were illiterate; and there were very few of the remainder who could read Kant's philosophy or the second part of Faust. Goethe had to impress his artistic standard even on the students of Jena University with a whip. You know what he thought of Berlin and the Prussian court." Germany has contributed her share to the world's fund of human progress, for which other nations have shown a becoming gratitude. About a century or more ago there was a great creative spiritual energy in Germany, as Mr. McCabe remarks. "It led Europe in such different fields as poetry, music, metaphysics, liberal theology, and the manufacture of beer." Today, it is said, Germany has lost that lead "in almost everything except in music and applied science." The unprejudiced man has no desire to see the German nation recede from its once high position; and it ought to be the hope of every one, when the war is over, that from the ruins of a decadent Germany there may arise one of the finest commonwealths known to our day.

Some acknowledgments by George Washington of the services of Roman Catholics in the war of the Revolution are printed in the Columbiad of Hoboken, N. J., which is an organ of the Knights of Columbus. Washington was not a bigot, and therefore he did not join Protestants in discriminating against the rights of Catholic citizens, and he denounced as "monstrous" the custom of burning the Pope in effigy on Guy Fawkes day, in the presence of Catholic-Americans. According to a statement by Theodore Roosevelt in one of his books, the Irish Catholics took small part in the Revolution except as British soldiers, but America received, as Washington said, "important assistance from a nation [France] in which the Roman Catholic faith is professed." The Columbiad is welcome to the comfort it can derive from the liberalism of Washington, who once expressed his indifference to the Christian faith by writing of some men he proposed to take into his employ that "if they are good workmen they may be Mohammedans, Jews or Christians of any sect, or they may be Atheists." The Catholic paper, however, goes beyond the truth, in our opinion, when it quotes the statement that "our great Washington had a full-length painting of Mary Immaculate hanging at the head of his bed, and one day remarked to Father Marechal, afterwards archbishop of Baltimore, 'I cannot love the Son without honoring the Mother.'" That incident has the earmarks of a myth. Washington was reared in a church (the Episcopalian) which regarded as defender of the faith the king who in his coronation oath swore to have nothing to do with the superstition of Mariolatry.

From the Boston Traveler we learn that "Mrs. Marilla Ricker, lawyer, of Dover, N. H., once candidate for governor of New Hampshire until declared ineligible by the Supreme Court, has announced that she may now run for Congress in the special election to be held May 29 to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Congressman Sulloway." Mrs. Ricker is our best missionary and among the best of our writers. If she gets the departed Mr. Sulloway's place THE TRUTH SEEKER is likely to get quoted on the floor of the House, while sample copies are distributed in the lobby. Of her candidacy Mrs. Ricker says: "It seems that the Republicans are much mixed on the question of who shall be chosen to take Sulloway's place. We have one congresswoman from Montana and I think we might have one from New Hampshire. And if the question remains unsettled much longer I shall offer to take the place, and I am inclined to think I could fill it." No doubt of it whatever.

The test of Christian faith that is given in an appendix to the gospel of Mark, which Jesus arose from the grave to add, is that "they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing it shall not hurt them." We should say that faith strong enough to cause any one to make this test would be the real thing. Yet observe the result. We quote from a United Press dispatch to the Evening Journal, Dallas, Texas:

"COLUMBIA, Miss., March 23.—In an effort to prove to followers of a religious organization that a rattlesnake bite was not harmful to the 'sanctified,' Steve Reagan's wife is dead and he is expected to die."

"Reagan let the snake bite him Monday night at a church meeting. Today he became violently ill and because of chagrin and failure to prove his point he persuaded his wife to enter a suicide pact."

"They both took poison and Mrs. Reagan died within two hours."

"Physicians say Reagan has little chance of recovering."

Both the "serpent" test and the "deadly thing" test failed, thereby resembling all the promises of scripture which we now recall.

Alluding to the probable capture of Jerusalem by a Christian army, which it characterizes as "one of the picturesque episodes of the present war," a religious exchange notes that "there are some 70,000 people living in Jerusalem, 40,000 of whom are Jews, 10,000 Moslems, and 20,000 Christians of various denominations. Thus, although it is the center of great Christian traditions, Jerusalem is still a Jewish city. The Turk, however, has ruled Jerusalem for nearly thirteen hundred years except for the one hundred years after it was captured by the Crusaders and made a Christian city in 1099." All visitors to Jerusalem have remarked on the fact that while different Christian sects have possession of the paying attractions of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, the presence of Mohammedan soldiers is necessary to keep the various exhibitors from fighting with one another. What might happen were the Mohammedan guard to be removed?

A prize of $3,000 is awarded by the French Academy of Moral and Physical Sciences to Cardinal Mercier of Belgium in recognition of his patriotism and courage in the presence of the German invasion. Mercier is undoubtedly a good scrapper, and has done what he could to make the German occupation of Belgium uncomfortable. The prize may be wholly a testimonial to his merits as seen by those on his side of the question, and it may be partly a rebuke to the pope, who instead of supporting him has endeavored to convince him he should keep quiet.

The history of civilization is the history of successions of brave "Heretics" and "Infidels," who have denied false dogmas or brought new truths to light.—Robert Blatchford.

OBJECTS.

It is the object of THE TRUTH SEEKER to educate the people out of religious superstition. It denies the inspiration and infallibility of the Bible, and asserts the human origin of that book. It denies the existence of the theological heaven and hell, but as to the existence and immortality of the soul neither affirms nor denies. It waits for evidence.

THE TRUTH SEEKER upholds the theory of Evolution, believing that to be the solution of the question of the origin, growth, and development of the animal kingdom, including man. THE TRUTH SEEKER believes that the answer to the questions Whence? and Whither? can be given only by Science.

THE TRUTH SEEKER holds that morality and ethics—or man's relation to man—are entirely independent of creed or religion, and are founded on rules developed by experience.

In current politics THE TRUTH SEEKER takes no side or part. In general it holds to the principles of freedom enunciated by the Founders of the Republic.

THE TRUTH SEEKER believes in Free Speech, Free Press, and Free Mails; in full discussion of all sides of all subjects, and affords those having new and worthy thoughts, clearly stated, a generous and welcome hearing, each contributor being responsible for his own opinion. We neither indorse an idea by printing it, nor condemn it by exclusion.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is the recognized medium of communication between the Liberals of the country, and is edited each week for their information, instruction, entertainment, and support against religious error and mental slavery and in maintenance of their equal civil and religious rights as citizens of the United States.

The Editor invites communications on the subjects to which these pages are devoted.

POLITICAL PRINCIPLES.

(THE NINE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.)

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in the Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privileges or advantages shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

HOW WAS THE BIBLE MADE?

From R. A. Dague, Colorado.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 17, under the caption "Paganized Christianity," Dwight Spencer, of Oklahoma, says:

"I have just received a copy of a little book written by R. A. Dague, a writer of some prominence, in which I find the statement—

"He [Constantine] convened the council of Nicea and compelled all the warring factions to come together and unite on one book as the 'Word of God.' Of the 308 manuscripts submitted, 233 were rejected and burned, and 75 were, after much wrangling, put into one book and labeled 'Holy Bible.' The emperor put a stop to nearly all the communistic practices of the early Christians, and injected into their doctrines most of the creed and many of the forms and ceremonies of paganism. In brief, he 'paganized' the Christian movement, and it has remained pagan in all its teachings and practices until this day." (Page 13: Is the Bible Infallible?)

"Mr. Dague does not tell in his book where he got his information. We would surely like to know where it came from. But Mr. Dague is like many others who feel that they need Jesus to popularize some theory or movement.

"Mr. Dague goes contrary to John E. Remsburg, Dean Dudley, Wescott, and to all the authorities I have been able to consult, when he says the Bible was made under the directions of Constantine at the Council of Nicea, A. D., 325. Also, to our mind, Mr. Dague is assuming too much when he says Constantine changed the character of Christianity by paganizing it."

Among other authorities I quoted was Ernst Haeckel (professor at the University of Jena), the distinguished scientist, historian and scholar. I am surprised that Mr. Dwight Spencer overlooked my quotation from Prof. Haeckel on the 9th page of my booklet, Is the Bible the Infallible Word of God? On that page I say:

"In Haeckel's 'Riddle of the Universe,' page 311, under the head of Primitive Christianity, the author says: 'As to the four gospels we now know they were selected from a host of contradictory and forged manuscripts of the first three centuries by the 318 bishops who assembled at the Council of Nicea in 325 A. D. The entire list of gospels numbered forty; the canonical list contained four. As the bishops could not agree, they determined to leave the selection to a miracle. They put all the books (according to the Synodical Papyrus) together under the altar and prayed that the apocryphal books, or those of human origin, might remain there, and the genuine inspired might be miraculously placed on the tables of the Lord, and tradition says, that really occurred, Mathew, Mark Luke and John leaped up onto the table.'"

I quoted a few other authorities to the same effect. Henry M. Tichenor, in his book, "The Creed of Constantine," on pages 26-27 also quotes Ernst Haeckel and adds:

"As gleaned from history it would be a spectacle to even stagger the faith of the most bigoted to view the make-up and proceeding of the First Council of Nicea. Call to your mind an assemblage of the most ignorant, illiterate cunning ward-healers that ever came to your notice; the Council of Nicea was far more ignorant and more illiterate and more cunning than these. It was an age so degenerate that it was already fit to plunge itself into the abyss of the Dark Ages. Presiding over these 318 priests, sat the coarse, bloated-faced Constantine the murderer. Such was the Council of Nicea, inspired of God to canonize a holy scripture and proclaim a religion that damns to eternal torture those who deny it."

In a spirit of candor I must admit that church history is quite hazy, fragmentary and unreliable prior to the 15th century. Christian writers have written voluminously trying to disprove the tradition that the Council of Nicea compiled the New Testament scriptures, but the Rev. George Coleman, scholar and author, as do other writers, admits that "the weight of historical authorities sustains the statements of Ernst Haeckel." Other writers say that this first Council of Nicea did select 75 books out of the 308 manuscripts, but the conference broke up in a row and left no written records of their action. Ancient tradition was that they compiled the books of the New Testament. Some historians say there was more than one council held at Nicea. The "Holy Bible" made by the Council of Nicea was not generally accepted for a century after its compilation. Hot disputings raged from 327 A. D. to 363 A. D., when the Council of Laodicea endorsed the 75 books of the Constantine, Nicea Bible. This action of that convocation did not, however, stop the wrangling over what manuscripts were inspired by God, and what were not. This dispute went on until the days of Martin Luther and Protestantism, when nine books were cut out of the Constantine (Catholic) Bible.

Now, as to my authority for the statement that the early Christians practiced Communism. Rollin's Ancient History (London Edition, Vol. IX, page 312), says:

"For over 200 years all Christians were communists who held the land and waters as well as all timbers and precious metals, etc., in common. The lot was cast in deciding all questions and the assembled commune judged all disputes. This bold democracy was held in abhorrence by the pagans, who trafficked in lands and took profits from other's labors."

Tertullian, one of the early Christian writers, said:

"All is common with us except women. Jesus was our man, God and brother. He restored unto all men what cruel murderers took from them by the sword. Christians have no master and no Christian shall be bound for bread and raiment. The land is no man's inheritance. None shall possess it as property."

In his debate with Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Priest Lambert said:

"The great Agnostic forgets that the Christian church for the first 200 years stood for communistic rights and that the laborer received all the fruits of his toil."

Charles E. Sheldon, in the Daily Leader of Milwaukee, Wis., says:

Constantine paganized Christianity and was the source of the destruction of communism. To quote an ancient author we are indebted to Zosimus in regard to Constantine, saying one of the early Fathers conveys to us the facts we need to establish the claim of his part in the destruction of communism.

He says Constantine stands as the pivot over which for ages the two great parallel schemes of religion balanced. Nearly all the noble, original thoughts, sentiment, humanity, economic democracy and communism were wiped out under him, Socrates' "Hist-Eccles," III-C-XI, taking the story from Zosimus' "Hist Romaika."

Good encyclopedias declare that this author can not be accused of a deliberate misrepresentation of facts. We here get the information that Constantine was ambitious, unscrupulous and cruel and that it was through his cunning plots, even to the extent of murdering his own family, that he, step by step, rose to the full control of his empire.

Zosimus remarks that Constantine's crimes were so great that when he applied to the pagan priesthood for forgiveness and absolution those clericals refused to grant forgiveness. This forced him to make his supplication to the Christian priests, who forgave him, took him with all his sin and thenceforward Christianity was adopted. This was the real basis of the Constantinian deal which at once legalized Christianity (see Ward's "Ancient Lowly," volume II, pages 686-687).

Mr. Spencer says:

"Mr. Dague is like many others who feel they need Jesus to popularize some theory or movement."

That paragraph makes me laugh out loud. For half a century I have been anti-mathematized and denounced as an Atheist, infidel and heretic so many times by the orthodox Christians, that when I read in

THE TRUTH SEEKER the remark of my unknown Oklahoma critic that I "needed Jesus to popularize my published writings", I indulged in quite a bit of hilarity.

ATHEISTS AMONG COLORED PEOPLE.

From Gordon Owens, Illinois.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

It was with keen interest that I read on page 168 in your issue of March 17, 1917, the statement of Cardinal Gibbons relative to all colored Americans being Christians. The Cardinal states he has never yet seen or heard of a colored Atheist. I should like to inform his Eminence that all colored people are not religious dupes.

I am one colored person who am an Atheist and proud to be one. If his Eminence ever comes to Chicago, let him call at my house and I shall be very glad to introduce him to a good many colored Atheists.

Why didn't the Cardinal state the reason why most people of color are deeply and naturally religious? Held in slavery for 250 years by white Christians, only allowed to read the Bible, and taught only to obey their masters, and that God willed them to be slaves because they were the descendants of Ham, and today burned, lynched, jim-crowed, disfranchised, etc., by white Christians, is it any wonder that colored people are so religious and look to some God for aid?

Another reason, Cardinal Gibbons is, because colored people as a rule don't read very much. They know nothing of the history of Christianity, the Catholic or Protestant churches, and nothing of the vile deeds they both have committed in the name of God. When colored people learn of these facts they will remain in the Christian faith just as long as a snowball would last in the Christian hell.

For the past two years I have been reading up on Christianity, and this summer I intend to lecture on same and disseminate some of my knowledge on this subject to some other non-knowing people of color.

I am a member of the Chicago Free-thought Society, the Rationalist Association of North America and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

I am enclosing two letters to let THE TRUTH SEEKER know what at least one colored person is doing for Rationalism.

CRANKS AND CRANKISMS.

From H. M. Martin, West Virginia.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker.

In the comments of Mr. Bunge on an article taken from Der Schweizer Freidenker appearing in the March 24th TRUTH SEEKER, wherein he remarks that "no organization has ever succeeded without strictly definite aims and principles and application of those principles. All indefinite moves are lost. Open forums where any indefinite thinker and crank may unload his mental garbage will never lead to the final victory of Rationalism in this country," contains much food for thought and reflection.

Rationalism is not a cranky movement if we can only prevent cranks from gaining the ascendancy, and diverting it from its true aims.

While a great many have refused and still refuse to accept the religious views of Franklin, Jefferson, Huxley, Spencer, Ingersoll and a host of other eminent Rationalists, yet it has never been laid to their charge that they were cranks.

The intelligence of the world accords to them great powers of mind, profundity of thought and sane solid reasoning.

But the crank is almost irrepressible. He is a bumptious, intolerant and suspicious fellow and, if his peculiar fads and fancies are not accorded such a reception as he fancies they are entitled to, he seeks other pastures and attributes corrupt motives or sinister influences to those refusing to accede to his special hobby.

As a rule he is a superficial fellow and has just enough smattering of knowledge along some line to delude him into a belief he is a pundit and not enough to make him a philosopher.

He is generally a well-intentioned fellow and it is useless to undertake to reform him and it is impossible to convince him.

He poses as a Freethinker which to him means the rejection of all authority and the substitution of his own individual opinion as his infallible guide, and it is folly to undertake to quote as authority other Freethinkers of much wider experience, clearer vision, extensive knowledge, and broader acquaintance with affairs.

He is incapable of rising to the heights of mental grandeur and of realizing what real great men like Ingersoll, Spencer and Huxley really were.

His mental horizon is too restricted to see them in their immensity and the view he does get of them is distorted by his own disordered vision.

They are wholly incapable of the deeper reaches, wherein great minds grapple with, to them, hidden things.

They ignore fundamentals and make a hobby of some impractical ideal.

It is a glorious and magnificent thing to rise above prejudice and to think large and get a clear perspective, and to only a few has this boon been given.

In religion the crank is not so obnoxious, as religion is not based so much on reason as upon faith, while Rationalism is based altogether upon true reason, and fantastic reasoning destroys the whole harmony of the Rationalistic movement.

The crank is generally a fanatical, crusading fellow attacking indiscriminately all existing conditions and institutions.

He assails every official act, legislative, executive or judicial, while perhaps nine times out of ten, the very same acts were the performance of Rationalists in fact, if not in name, for my observation has taught me that as a rule the people elevate to positions of honor and trust only those of more than ordinary intelligence and capacity, and those of more than ordinary intelligence and capacity are generally Rationalists on the quiet, although prudence may prompt them to keep their opinions to themselves.

To my mind crankism has been the bane of the Freethought movement.

A great many of the more prosperous and influential of our citizens have been repelled by the wild harangues and intemperate speech, absurd and irrationalistic statements and incitement to disorder and revolution of so many parading as Rationalistic propagandists.

It takes money to disseminate Rationalistic ideas and Rationalism should wage no war on wealth and do all in its power to secure wealthy recruits. The idea that wealth is an evil is an old religious superstition.

As Mr. Bunge says, we should have organization, and it is my humble opinion, this organization should have some kind of an examining board to pass upon the competency of Rationalist missionaries, and grant them commissions, if found proficient, and exercise a kind of a censorship over their utterances, otherwise the movement will lack harmony and consistency and will degenerate into a babel of confusion.

This examining board should consist of our very best, practical and hard-headed men of business affairs and genius for organization.

Irresponsible men with some cranky idea to exploit, posing as Rationalists, will do the cause immense harm, if allowed to become recognized exponents of Rationalism.

The readings of the great Rationalist writers and speakers should be given hearty encouragement and no doubt a far greater number of solid and enduring Rationalists have been made by reading Spencer and Ingersoll than all the speaking propagandas that have been carried on in its name.

A WORD ON DIVORCE.

From C. H. Eshleman, Michigan.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I have several times written communications for THE TRUTH SEEKER in which I have protested against dangerous views on the sex problem, and on marriage, expressed by various writers. Now I am writing again, this time taking issue with Marshall J. Gauvin. On page 146 in the issue of March 10, he is quoted as saying that "marriage should lose its binding force when one or the other ceases to be happy in it." How about the children, Mr. Gauvin; aren't they to be considered at all? Does it make no difference whether a child's own parent rears it or not?

I want to say to THE TRUTH SEEKER readers exactly what I think about this subject. Divorce, while in exceptional cases allowable, should in nine out of ten cases be very difficult to get. The cases are very rare where a couple can not live together if they both earnestly desire to do so. In case one is determined to break up the union, the place for that person is in a prison or an asylum, in a vast majority of cases. The question whether the man or woman is so supremely and blissfully happy is secondary. The paramount questions are: have the children brought into the world by this union a permanent and happy home, and are they receiving the best possible care and training for happiness and usefulness in life?

In the cases of people of genius, where a divorce would enable one party to engage in work that would contribute greatly to achievement in art, literature or other lines, then a divorce should be granted; but where it is merely a case of the ordinary Tom, Dick and Harry, or Sarah, Jane and Margaret getting loose from the partner professedly for some highly spiritual or metaphysical reason, but actually because another buck or pullet has been gazed upon whose comeliness more strongly appeals to the physical passions, then away with the whole business. Prison sentences, asylums, horse whips would be more in order.

RELIGIOUS DISCUSSION.

From H. T. Blatchley, New York.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

A recent article in the Literary Digest speaks of the "Infidel" propaganda of a paper in the city, and mentions debates. Can it be that some of the sect peoples are willing to defend their views in public discussion, or is this merely the skeptical among themselves?

Today senior Senator, James W. Wadsworth, Jr., addressed a large meeting at the Men's Forum at Binghamton. He says "Discussion in a Democracy is healthy," and deplores the caucus or gag rule he says now prevails in the House. Among the questions allowed at the close was the following:

"Perchance it may be that religion in its compromises with politicians and financiers is responsible for the present great distress. Don't you think it would be a good idea to have a real open forum of religion?"

The Forum Chairman replied: "He's a Senator!" and everybody laughed.

It was my privilege to hear one lecture by Colonel Ingersoll. Two sayings of particular note were: "If there is a God he'll leave out the latch-string till the last wandering boy can come home"; and, "I am not fighting Christianity but I am fighting the abuses of Christianity."

Truth needs not to court favor nor fear criticism.

FAMILY LIMITATION.

From J. L. Plowman, South Dakota.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I'm very thankful that there are those that can see and do not hesitate to express their views in favor of birth-control.

I'm a farmer and I always raise hogs in numbers to compare to the size of my corn bin, and I do not think a nation can justly demand a greater population than it is willing comfortably and respectably to support.

I believe a great population under the present "grab it all" system spells cheap slavery, misery, crime, etc.

WE DON'T ALL SEE ALIKE.

From E. Hogue Eliff, Illinois.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

The pious crank was suffering from an attack of pious loquacity and was running off at the mouth quite copiously with that free and easy indifference as to truth, reason and common sense, with which the "cheerful idiot" won his title. In a cocksure tone that defied doubt or argument, he was telling us a lot of things that he don't know about his God, but thinks he does; and I have reason to know that he expected us to believe that he gets his divine data at first hand, direct, through the grace of occasional personal interviews with the Divinity, with whom he claims to enjoy very intimate personal relations.

He was saying, "God is everywhere; you can see God in the rocks, in the rippling streams, in the beautiful flowers; you can see God in the trees and—" then I butted in like this: "Pardon me for interrupting, but I have been examining that big poplar tree across the way and for the life of me I can't see anything in it but a yellow cow."

"A what?" bawled the pious crank, turning to me with a look of blank amazement in which contempt and indignation found expression.

"A yellow cow," I repeated, seriously, somewhat surprised at my success in keeping my face straight.

"Well, you certainly have got the assurance of the devil himself," snarled the crank, "to stand up here in broad daylight and say you see a cow in that tree. What's the matter with you; are you drunk, or crazy, or just a natural born fool? You talk like all three rolled into one. A pretty figure a cow would cut standin' up in that tree with the limbs all a-growin' nearly straight up and the wind a-blowin' a hurricane."

"The cow isn't standing up," I explained; "she is hanging from a limb by her tail, like a 'possum," which sample of Mother Goose piffle seriously uttered, literally dumfounded the crank. A frantic gesture and a vicious glare was all the answer he could make. He was mad all over, for I think it began to dawn upon him that I was poking fun at him. I suspected from his silence that he was ransacking his limited vocabulary of pious invective, from which he proposed to select a bunch of the meanest, toughest adjectives he could find (not necessarily of "the other cheek" variety) with which to qualify the "shorter and uglier word" before handing it to me. But I think that he finally concluded that he couldn't do the subject justice, and decided to try a little saintly sarcasm instead, so with withering sarcasm he queried: "No doubt you've seen cows climb trees lots of times?"

"No," I protested mildly, "I never did see a cow climb a tree; in fact, I don't think they are built for climbing."

"You don't," chuckled the crank exultingly. "Then I'd like to have you explain how the cow got up in the tree."

"I am sorry to have to disappoint you again," I said, regretfully, "but I do not feel equal to the task. You see, it's like this: The circumstance bears a striking family resemblance to a lot of Mother Goose tommyrot and Jack-the-giant-killer, cock-and-bull stories found in your Bible which are called miracles, and God has specially warned us not to try to explain how these preposterous things could happen; and he has told us further in words to this effect; for you can't make head nor tail out of them, anyhow, or me either, as to that matter—all of which was entirely superfluous. As Billy Sunday would put it, 'You scientific mutts can take it from me, that it makes God fightin' sore for you to go nosing 'round his inspired word tryin' to get on to his curves. It is the limit of presumptuous blasphemy, and you'd better cut it out.' And when you ask one of these Bible expounders to explain how these miraculous stunts could be pulled off in direct opposition to natural forces and Nature's laws, and get him cornered, he has recourse to the old reliable biblical joker, 'God moves in a mysterious way His wonders to perform," and squirms out of that."

"Of all the rotten Infidel slush I ever heard, that is the rottenest. A man that talks like you do ought to be arrested and locked up."

Then I resumed: "I will admit, if it will mitigate my offense any, that this cow incident is in need of the services of an expert commentator, and, if you don't mind, I'll do a little construing, as I have a theory. This cow is no common scrub stock. She is the wonderful, immaculate, holy virgin, sacred heart, triple-sainted, piety-plated, holy angel 'sacred cow.'"

"There you go again with your sacrilegious lies. I've heard something about a sacred bull, the old ancient heathen had mixed up with their religion, but who ever heard of a sacred cow? I never did."

"Well, that is because you don't read the right kind of newspapers," I replied. "We have newspapers in this country now that can't be papal bulldozed, and they have the nerve and the patriotism to take the most vicious bull the popes ever turned loose by the horns, yank him around a few times and send him rolling in the mud; THE TRUTH SEEKER, Tom Watson and the Menace, for instance. If you would read them you would find out a lot about that cow. But we have the sacred cow in our midst, and she is cutting as wide a swath in the religion of this country as the sacred bull ever cut in the affairs of Egypt. They call it religion, but politics and graft is her long suit and always has been, religion being merely a thin mask. This cow claims miraculous powers and moves in a mysterious (pussy-foot) way her wonders to perform. One of the wonders she has performed is getting the majority of our politicians and public officials, and nearly all of the editors of our great dailies and magazines—the palladiums of our liberties, 'moulders of public opinion,' etc., so completely sacred-cowed that they are afraid to say their souls are their own. And when this cow commits a nuisance, which often happens, it is more fun than a box of monkeys to see these great editors hustling around to cover it up. As chambermaids to the sacred cow stable they are the most pusillanimous, servile, truckling bunch of Romanized political poltroons this country ever produced."

"Well, you ain't explained nothin' and I'm here to tell you," said the crank, defiantly, "that you don't see a cow in that tree, or anything that looks like one."

"You are right," I said, approvingly, "I don't see a cow in the tree for the same reason that you don't see your personal, material God there. But you made rather free to tell me what I talked like, so I rattled off a lot of silly nonsense about a cow just to show you by comparison what you talk like. The trouble arises from the fact that I am looking at the tree with the natural human eye, which is honest and reliable, while you are looking at it with the eye of faith, a mythical visual organ as tricky as the devil himself."

Enclosed find one dollar to continue my subscription. This is now going into the 42nd year. I never missed a copy. Yes, some woeful and wonderful advice I notice is given you how to run the paper, but never mind Mac, your editorial in a late issue tells the tale. W. A. SUNDAY AND INCOME TAX.

From J. J. Dooling, New York.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

When Mr. Sunday is asked about his income, he tells us to mind our own business. But here are questions any citizen has a right to ask: Is Mr. Sunday subject to an income tax? If not, why not? Does Mr. Sunday pay an income tax? If not, why not,

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

Abner Kneeland, April 7, 1774—April 27, 1844.

Abner Kneeland, the subject of this sketch, was one of the pioneers of Free-thought in the United States and also its martyr. He was born in Gardner, Mass., April 7, 1774, his father being of Irish descent, and his mother of English. He became educated in later life, his earlier years, up to 1803, being spent working at the carpenter's trade. In 1801 he became converted, joined the Baptist church, and began to preach. Universalism had taken hold of the minds of many people, and in 1803 it embraced Mr. Kneeland. He entered the ministry of that church, where he remained until 1811. He was so anxious to go to the bottom of the question of the inspiration of the Bible that he made himself familiar with the Hebrew, Greek and Latin languages that he might do so more thoroughly. This caused him to renounce Christianity, as he became convinced that its dogmas were all derived from Paganism. In 1825 he removed to New York city, where in 1829 he delivered a series of lectures on the "Evidences of Christianity." These were published. In 1831 he returned to Boston and began the publication of the Boston Investigator, a journal that was continued until 1904—a period of seventy-three years—when it was merged with THE TRUTH SEEKER. In 1833 Mr. Kneeland openly stated that he "did not believe in the God that the Universalists did." This caused his arrest, trial and conviction for "blasphemy," accompanied by a sentence of two months in jail. This occurred in Boston, the "cradle of liberty," but it was enough to make a Bengal tiger stand on his hind legs and laugh at that portion of the human race called Christians. Dr. Channing and a number of Unitarian ministers did all in their power to save the grand, gray-haired old man from prison, but the orthodox clergy were delighted and applauded the act.

While in prison he was visited by a young man named Horace Seaver, who there swore eternal enmity to every form of tyranny over the mind of man. Being now over three score years of age, Mr. Kneeland found it impossible to longer continue the publication of the Investigator. It passed into the hands of Mr. Seaver and Josiah P. Mendum, who conducted it until their death,—the former in 1889 and the latter in 1891. Mr. Kneeland moved west to the then new Territory of Iowa, settling on a farm near the town of Salubria. There on the free prairies of that new country he lived far away from his persecutors and died in peace on April 27, 1844.

When William Lloyd Garrison first came to Boston to expound his then despised Abolitionist teachings, every church in the city was closed to him. Mr. Kneeland gladly granted him the use of the hall in which he lectured. Besides "A Review of the Evidence of Christianity," Mr. Kneeland published "A Greek Testament, According to Griesbeck," "A Greek and English Testament, with Notes," and a report of his trial, conviction and imprisonment.

Wendell Phillips said that Abner Kneeland had broken the back of orthodoxy in New England.

Other events of which the past week is the anniversary are:

April 1, William Harvey, who discovered the circulation of the blood, born, 1578. Mary Dyer, Quaker, executed, 1660.

April 2, Charles Bradlaugh elected to Parliament, 1880. Mirabeau, died, 1791.

April 3, Theodore Parker and Wendell Phillips tried in Boston for assisting a fugitive slave, 1854. Washington Irving, born, 1783.

April 4, Peter Cooper, died, 1883. Slavery abolished in the District of Columbia, 1862.

April 5, Thomas Hobbes, English philosopher and materialist, born, 1588. A. C. Swinburne, English poet, born, 1837.

April 6, Raphael, born, 1483. Nine Demands of Liberalism first published, 1872.

April 7, Fourier, born, 1772. Channing, born, 1780.

How the Week Originated.

The week is not a natural division of time, like the day, the month, and the year, which are all determined by the motions, of the heavenly bodies. The rotation of the earth on its axis measures the day, the revolution of the earth around the sun determines the year, and the revolution of the moon around the earth is the basis of the month.

The week was probably at first a period of time, covering a few days, varying in different times and places, which served to determine some periodically recurring event in human intercourse, such as a religious ceremony or a public market.

At the present time in Africa, among different tribes, there are "market weeks," varying in length from four to eight days, and in the Congo the native name for week is identical with that for market. A similar custom prevails in many other parts of the world. Sometimes a particular day, coming after a fixed interval (always a fraction of a month) is set apart as a time of rest from ordinary occupations.

This idea would seem to have suggested the conception of the seven-day period that constitutes our week, the Almighty being thought of as resting, like a husbandman, after a certain number of days of continuous toil. This is the only week that has become universal throughout the civilized world. It unquestionably originated in Eastern Asia.

But just why or when seven days were fixed as the week's length is a matter of speculation. The number seven had a symbolic signification in ancient Palestine and elsewhere, and some have thought that the "seven planets," including under that term the Sun and the Moon, as well as Mercury, Venus, Mars, Jupiter and Saturn, furnished the original suggestion of the sacred or mystic number.

At any rate, the individual names of the days of the week are derived from the names of these heavenly bodies. In Latin the names were, in their order: Dies Solis (Sol's Day), Dies Lunæ (Luna's Day), Dies Martis (Mars' Day), Dies Mercurii (Mercury's Day), Dies Jovis (Jove's Day), Dies Veneris (Venus' Day), Dies Saturni (Saturn's Day). In French the Latin roots are discernible in the names Dimanche, Lundi, Mardi, Mercredi, Jeudi, Vendredi, Samedi; but our English list is based on Norse and Saxon roots—Sunday (Sun's Day), Monday (Moon's Day), Tuesday (Tiw's Day), Wednesday (Woden's Day), Thursday (Thor's Day), and Friday (Frigga's Day), although Saturday seems to be as well derived from the Latin Saturnus as from the Saxon Saterne.

A very curious astrological arrangement connected each of the twenty-four hours of the day, as well as each day of the week, with one of the planets, the order of succession always remaining the same and running in this wise: Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Sun, Venus, Mercury, Moon.

If the first hour of any day was the Sun's then the 8th, the 15th and the 22d hours of the same day would also belong to the Sun, while the 23d would fall to Venus, she being the next in succession to the Sun; the 24th to Mercury, and the first hour of the following day to the Moon. The next day after one beginning with a Moon hour would begin with a Mars hour, and so on, the day talking the name of the planet governing its opening hour.

There is one singular fact concerning the 25th of December which is worth knowing, at least as a curiosity. It is preserved by the old English chronicler Bede, who says that the ancient Angli, before their conversion to Christianity, began their year on the 25th of December, and that they called what is now Christmas night the mothers' night.—Garrett P. Serviss.

All About Father.

The following "exercise in English" came to light through some of the "Lend a Hand" workers at the Abraham Lincoln Centre, Chicago.

MY FATHER.

"My father is a well grown man, he is about six feet tall. His age is thirty-seven years old. He is a good looking man.

"He does not chew but he smokes a pipe or a cigarette. I like my father because he has a happy disposition. He has gray hair, black eyes. He has a mustache, but he has no beard. My father was born in Australia. He works in the I. C. R. R. shops. His work is making rivets which you put in the car to hold the car together.

"When he comes home from work he takes the paper and reads it. He likes my mother because she makes my father good soup. I like my father because he is good to me."

The Finger.

Though still in corners here and there
The seeping snowdrifts lie,
Like old King Winter's scattered bones
All bleached to the sky,
And though the woods are brown and bare,
The ground is hard and cold,
A tiny blade of tender green
Appears above the mould.

For Spring has wakened from her sleep
And heard the robin call,
And through the chilly garden earth
Puts up a finger small,
To feel if yet the vagrant wind
Has chanced to turn about
From bitter north to balmy south,
Before she ventures out.

—Minna Irving.

Unfortunate Words.

In a church in Ohio the minister gave out the hymn, "I Love to Steal Away," etc. The regular leader of the choir being absent, the duty devolved upon a young fellow of a timid nature. He commenced, "I love to steal," and then broke down. Raising his voice a little higher, he then sang, "I love to steal." At length, after a desperate cough, he made a final demonstration, and roared out, "I love to steal."

The effort was too much. Every one but the parson was laughing. He rose, and with the utmost gravity, said:

"Seeing our brother's propensities, let us pray."

Officially Classified.

In the Bureau of the Census at Washington acts against the law are recorded under a few general heads, such as murder, burglary, etc.

An officer of the bureau tells of a woman clerk who was puzzled by an entry she encountered in one of her slips. The crime as set down was "Running a blind tiger" (selling intoxicants without a license). After due reflection the woman placed it under the head "Cruelty to Animals."

Poor Baby!

The inventor of a new feeding-bottle for infants sent out the following directions to mothers:

"When the baby is done drinking it must be unscrewed and laid in a cool place under the hydrant. If the baby does not thrive on fresh milk, it should be boiled."

A Lesson in Grammar.

Grace's uncle met her on the street one spring day and asked her whether she was going out with a picnic party from her school.

"No," replied his eight-year-old niece, "I ain't going."

"My dear," said the uncle, "you must not say, 'I ain't going.' You must say, 'I am not going.'" And he proceeded to give her a little lesson in grammar: "'You are not going. He is not going. We are not going. You are not going. They are not going.' Now, can you say all that?"

"Sure I can," responded Grace quite heartily. "There ain't nobody going."—Harper's Magazine.

At Sunday School.

During a Bible lesson a teacher was trying to explain the parable of the tares.

"Can any of you tell me of any person like the evil one who sowed the tares?"

A hand instantly shot up.

"Well, David, what person do you say?"

"Please, ma'am, my mother."

"Why?" asked the teacher, in astonishment.

"Because," answered he, eyeing his patched trousers, "she sews tears."

Beset.

A teacher in a Boston public school received an examination paper from a little girl of ten years who wrote beneath the questions she had answered:

"If some of these questions are wrongly answered it will be because I have troubles of which the great world neither knows nor cares, therefore excuse wrong answers."

THE FREETHOUGHT BADGE PIN

Dedicated to all honest men and women—to those who can and are willing to reason—who constitute the grand army of progressive thinkers throughout the world.

An Emblem of Freedom and Progress

Represents no lodge, order or society, but is designed as a token of recognition for progressive minds of every shade of thought.

All claiming to be free from superstition, all who base their belief upon science and reason, should wear this emblem to speed the grand work of emancipating humanity from the thralldom of mental darkness.

This is conceded by artists and the trade to be the most beautiful Badge ever designed. Being a practical jeweler and designer of emblems of every description, as well as an enthusiastic worker in the cause of human progress, Mr. Wettstein has succeeded in combining in this badge the great want of this age and the future. It represents the Burning Torch of Reason, the Rising Sun of Science and Freethought, beautifully enameled in brilliant colors in contrast with the Night and Darkness of Superstition, enameled in black, and symbolizes the evolution of the world from the Night of Superstition to the Day of Freethought, Science and Reason.

"A pin whose torch and golden sheen,
Would grace the breast of Sheba's queen;
And will lend grace in coming time
To queens of beauty more sublime."
(Impromptu by Elizur Wright.)

As a token of recognition among Liberals of every shade of thought, either at home or abroad, it is especially valuable.

Made in two styles and by best workmen in the most artistic and substantial manner.

Considering amount of gold and artistic workmanship in the badge, no other badges in the world are sold so cheap. They will last for generations to come and increase in popularity and value until fear and superstition exist no more.

THE LETTER BOX.

E. T., Paris.—We should like to print Elbert Hubbard's profound thought on the inconsistency of ministers' buttoning their collars behind, but we have readers who would not stand for it. For purity of this paper surpasses Caesar's wife and approaches Mrs. Grannis. The Radicals are the Puritans of today in literature and food and drink. Their numbers are so small because the moral standard is held so high.

J. H., Pennsylvania.—You say you have been forty years a subscriber and close reader without making the acquaintance of the word "nugacities" until last week. Well, is it not worth waiting for? Some have not hesitated to say it compensates them for a year's subscription. It is a relative of the word "nugatory" you must have seen in the editorial writings of D. M. Bennett, who founded this journal. Mr. Bennett, in appealing to his subscribers for support, used to say that without their aid his efforts would be nugatory. The old root has now burst into blossom.

ELIZA GRAINGER DELESERNIER, Chicago.—One of our contributors has said that evolution along religious lines takes people from Catholicism to orthodox Protestantism, from orthodoxy to Unitarianism, Christian Science, New Thought, Spiritualism and Rationalism. So you will observe that the cult has its place in the evolution of religion. As for its verities, we do not suppose it has a single factual thing to its credit. Our subscriber in Tolland, Connecticut, Mr. George C. Bartlett, says Christian Science deserves some consideration because it abandons hell as the best hope of a majority of the human race.

GEORGE SEIBEL, Pennsylvania.—We have your leaflet exposing the New York newspapers as subsidized tools of the Allies, and must agree with you that the Evening Mail becomes "one of the few noble exceptions" because it is subsidized by the kaiser. Also, of course, those who want war are moved by commercial motives, and we are a pacifist for profit because the war and rumors of war have made the publication of THE TRUTH SEEKER cost an additional hundred dollars a month, and we would like to see the curse removed. Cherchez la longue verte. There are no pro-Germans in America but those who were born here and owe to this country the liberty and opportunity that Germany denied their fathers.

ALEXANDER KADISON, Brooklyn.—Yours is the first notice we have had of the death of Dr. Titus Voelkel last November. Born in Prussian Poland in 1841, he acquired a superior education, was teacher in the higher schools of Germany until 1880, and then became "sprecher" for a number of Freethought associations and editor of a German Freethought paper. He was prosecuted for blasphemy and served two years in one of the prisons of the Fatherland. We first met him about 1894, when he said that he had just completed his sentence and had come to America to enjoy freedom of speech. When the war broke out, however, he took the pro-German side and censored THE TRUTH SEEKER ferociously, using a red pencil to mark "lies" and "false" on its news items, and then mailing them to the editor. He removed from New York to Milwaukee without ordering a change of address, and thus we lost trace of him.

Sinai and Olympus

Parallels in Heathen Myth and Hebrew Scripture.

By a Texas Pagan.

PICTURES BY RYAN WALKER.

This is a lecture by a Texas Pagan, which has been illustrated by another. The text is what the title describes, a comparison of the heathen myths with the Hebrew tales told in scripture. The illustrations are exquisite bits of satire and wit, made by a genius with the pencil, and each is a gem. Text and pictures together, the book is certainly one of the wittiest ever produced, while the information it contains is solid and reliable. It will be a source of pleasure to every Liberal, and is at the same time a splendid Freethought lecture. We guarantee its quality from start to finish. 115 large octavo pages, 75 illustrations. Illuminated cover, fine paper. Price, 50 cents

Marriage law reform is a subject which is likely to assume greater prominence in the near future. DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

Great Women? These for Instance.

In point of argument I have not been answered! Mary Monico mistakes much of her own satire for logic and for the rest, she is very like those who preach "don't do as I do, but do as I say."

She has herself chosen a career instead of "devotion to household duties, the natural sphere," etc. I wonder why she does not prefer the rocking of a cradle by her own fireside to the stage. She has in other words given herself the double cross in that she has not sought the "peace and rest" that comes as payment for the scrubbing of floors and babies. Take some of your own medicine, Mary, for there be those among us who would like to know how the real things affect you.

Until three years ago, mine was a life of cold calculating business, and that was quite natural to me; since then I have been "devoted to household duties" in my mother's home; and how unnatural the chasing of dirt has been you will only know when you have sampled it long enough to judge by actual experience.

Your comparison of women in politics with the consumptive and the musket is fatal. The consumptive is ever too willing to keep his room and accept all the care that may be given him. If material wants drive him to do otherwise, so long as his strength may allow, the fault is not his. So the suffrage movement may be but the escaping of steam from a too strong pressure on women in general.

Now, Mary I shall have to tell you, you are neither Anarchist nor Rationalist; for unlike the Rationalist you are not awaiting evidence as to what woman may become when a complete freedom shall be hers. You are instead a prophet, and your prophecies belong between the covers of a dead bible. Like a true monarchist you have declared that woman's place is at home and she shall not be allowed to leave her precinct. Is there anything in all the teachings of Anarchy that would tend to confine woman anywhere? If there be anything that teaches whole-souled liberty it must be Anarchy!

Because of woman's past suppression she is (if I may borrow a phrase from Emma Goldman) in the "diaper stage" of existence, and to brutally attack her defenseless state is the height of cowardice. So much for deserving the spanking.

If we are to influence the men in a "delicate" and "refined" manner in order to attain our purposes, how long, Mary dear, will it take to refine them sufficiently to give us a long-suffering liberty? And do you think the "delicate refining" process will do away with child labor, capital punishment, and feed the hungry? Not having the vision of a seer I cannot tell.

Very timidly I suggest that it may be the men like a well-corrected figure (not to mention other foolishness) and that is one reason why we have the corset evil. Boldly I declare, let all the men go on a marriage strike if women persist in wearing corsets and working in the sweatshops, and you would see a sudden change.

With my "great lack of mind (soul) and body knowledge" I'm going to ask Mary to point out the fanaticism of Dr. Montessori, Emma Goldman, Margaret Sanger and Madame Curie, the French chemist. Just these four as a starter.

To ask that any woman should compare with Spinoza, Ingersoll or Bruno is stupidity, for no man, let alone woman, can compare with another. Each in his own sphere stands apart from all others and increases or decreases in greatness according to the contemplating mind. So that some would say Voltaire was greater than Ingersoll or vice versa. To say that there have not been and are not today great women is to offer the world a lie.

If the women of the past had a hand in creating religious beliefs, why is it Buddha, Mohammed and Christ are not females? Even God is of the male gender—it would seem that somewhere along the line the women should have placed one of their own sex first. It beats my "understanding," Mary girl, how women can be so negligent of their rights.

Did Mary Monico ever hear of Hypatia, of whom it is said "such reliance was placed on her judgment and sagacity, that the magistrates used frequently to consult her on important cases"? But it augurs ill for Mary's cause that such a woman should have lived to disprove Mary's pet "natural talent" theory.

Did Mary ever hear of Joan of Arc, who as a child was able to general an army into victory? Or Popess Joan, "who during the course of her reign did not imitate the knaveries, the treasons, nor the cruelties of the pontiffs of the ninth century"? Platina has this to say of her, "She met with few that could equal, much less go beyond her."

How about paralleling the educational systems of Montessori and Ferrer? Though they be so much alike, Mary will still insist that Dr. Montessori should not have strayed from the paring of potatoes because, forsooth, woman isn't "level-headed." Or does Dr. Montessori "exhibit a great lack of psychological (how Mary likes that word) and physiological knowledge?"

And that wonder book depicting the life of the slave—the book that caused strong men to weep—that it should have been written by Harriet Beecher Stowe. Of course Mary knows that Mrs. Stowe missed her "nature" calling of washer-woman.

Any one with half an eye ought to see that all women are steeped in the same mold and they cannot possibly rise above the dish-pan. How I would like to see Mary Monico with a scrub-brush in one hand and a frying pan in the other exhorting the women to return to their "natural" tasks, for they are all alike anyway, and if Teddy R. would help out with his race suicide song, there would be no more "sporadic" cases of woman's prowess. And who in thunder doesn't know Teddy R. would make a better president than Marilla Ricker for instance?

Ellen Key, a disciple of Spinoza, is world renowned as a writer of ethics, but she is an "incomplete" spinster and has never had a child. Mary will tell you she ought to be refining some man while she darns his socks.

And that diamond in the rough, Mother Jones, ought not to be left flying around helping "the boys." Can't somebody catch her and nail her with a broom?

I've hammered on Emma Goldman and Margaret Sanger just because they happen to be right under Mary's New York nose, but Mary hasn't smelled them yet.

Doesn't Kate O'Hare challenge any man to debate, and didn't Holy Pete take her up and then run away in Holy Fright at her "feminine logic"? But Kate is on the wrong track; she ought to be counting beans for hubby's dinner. Are there any more at home like Kate? Surely...

There's Elinor Glynn with her naughty tale of "Three Weeks," and didn't it set the world agog! But how could Elinor do it when she isn't a he?

My! that "calculating" Hetty Green—oughtn't she just to be dead!

And "hysterical" Dr. Mary Walker made even the government recognize her pants! Isn't she the "self-made man" and wouldn't I just like to be in her trousers! What are we coming to!—Pants?

Whatever ails Editor Macdonald to let a dunce like Mary Monico get into the Lie Seeker columns? Do you think he'd allow it if he were a she? Why can't he compel her to exercise her "natural talent" of hash-making? And can't her old man make her stop "barking up the wrong tree"?

Ain't it hell, boys! Why don't you gather in all the petticoats; supply them with plenty of house-keeping tools and never let them out again! You know they are about to leave the "diaper stage" of existence, and there is some evidence that they will be able to hold their own with the sterner sex in any field of endeavor. Boys! Boys! Are you going to stand idly by and see that happen! Forget that old-fashioned chivalry and have some sense! For if you don't, Mary Monico will get your Nanny next.

Was there ever a famous Russian mathematician—a woman? Find her, Mary. But what's the use? you won't listen on that ear. And take this from Pres. White of the University of Michigan in the early seventies: "The best pupil in Greek for several years, among 1,300 students, has been a young lady; the best pupil in mathematics in one of the strongest classes of our Institute is likewise a young lady; and several among the best pupils in natural science and the sciences in general are likewise young ladies." Then comes McBendrick of Glasgow: "After having taught female students for 20 years, I would sum up my observations with the statement that many women accomplished as much as men in general and that many men do not accomplish as much as the female average."

Mary, wouldn't it be a good thing for your "delicate mental equilibrium" if you studied Bebel? Really you've no idea how many facts he has given us, and G. M. won't let me quote the whole book.

How I love the learned boys, for they are helping us to help ourselves and you can just bet they remember, "he who would be free must himself strike the blow." Do you think there is any chance of Mary learning that? And do you suppose she wants to exercise the woman's prerogative of having the last word, or are her pen-drippings just so much bluster? Search me!

THE MODERN LIFE DRAMA.

"The world is but a stage on which man plays many parts." . . . —Shakespeare.

But under present circumstances the majority of the people are compelled to play an inferior part, while a few assume the role of the master over his slaves.

Today we have a "system" of production and distribution known as capitalism, of which profits and exploitation of labor constitute the very foundation.

There are two prominent parts being "played" in this world drama. One part may be called production, which of necessity includes distribution. This important part requires very many players. These constitute the working class. The other part being played is that of the villain. This part requires but few players, which make up the capitalist class.

We have arrived at the climax of the play and just now the "villain" has the "hero" throttled with the terrible dagger of militarism held threateningly in the air. We are waiting breathlessly for the dagger to descend or for the "victim" to overpower the villain and save himself from a terrible destruction.

It requires more than "mental development" on the part of the "victim" to rise to victory. The victim in this case is the working class, but is divided into various groups called labor unions which, as at present constituted, are more or less hostile toward one another. This division within the ranks of labor helps to keep the masses in poverty and subjection.

It matters but little whether we are possessed of initiative or not so long as capitalism lasts. We cannot "rise above" our environment by "our own individual efforts." We must, as workers, unite under the banner of a distinct revolutionary political party and industrial union and institute The Industrial Republic of Labor.

WALTER FREEMAN.

THE BODY IS IMMORTAL, NOT THE SOUL. OR THEOLOGY REVERSED.

"The law of conservation of energy and the transmutation of forces";

"The universality of natural law";

"The descent of man from animals";

"The fundamental forms of the entire organic world";

"The localization of the functions of the brain," are all proven.—Prof. Ludwig Büchner, M.D., "Force and Matter."

"The properties of matter are eternal, unchangeable, intransferable."—Dubois Reymond.

"We know of no matter which does not possess force, and on the other hand we know of no forces which are not joined to matter."—Haeckel.

"Matter and force are not separate entities, but different conditions of one and the same thing."—F. Vignole.

"Matter and force are separable only in thought, in reality they are one."—A. Mayer.

The law of the absolute indestructibility and permanence of matter, known as a settled fact no longer to be denied since early in the 18th century; together with the later proofs of the indestructibility or conservation of force or motion discovered in the following century, prove that matter and spirit, body and soul, exist only in unity—as one—in the whole universe of nature.

From the myriads of atom-groups contained in one grain of salt (so small as to be scarcely susceptible to the taste), to the planet itself and everything existing in or on it, all deriving their energies from the sun, there exists no motion or force apart from matter; nor consequently can the intelligence or soul exist apart from the animal body.

This latter idea was indeed accepted long previous to its being proven as a fact, by the greatest authorities and thinkers as far back as Goethe, and no proof to the contrary has ever been forthcoming.

Of what use then to expatiate on the self-sustaining, self-existing human soul of the theologians and its immortality, when such an entity does not exist in the world's knowledge; that which is but an emanation from the material body as the flame from a candle, an outcome of the working of the brain, which in poets and writers we call inspiration; in artists, genius; in mechanics, invention and so on.

Rather is it not clearly proven that it is the material body only that is immortal, which reverts to its constituent parts in the chemistry of nature from whence it arose—the eternal, of which it was and is ever a part.

Why even attempt a scientific disproof of the fantastic theological theory of a future heaven and hell for the soul, which bases its authority on a fetch absolutely devoid of any foundation, viz., the fabled story of Adam and Eve which (by an evident interpolation) initiates a theory unrealized and unknown throughout the entire Jewish religion with which this theological myth purports to be connected—the original laws and revelations given to Moses, whose only promise is "that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee."

Has it not always been clear to the unbiased rational minded student that this myth is but a whip held over the minds of the credulous? an endless source of power and material profit to the self-styled "Vicegerents of God" who invented it; the sequel of which is, not the right to life's enjoyment, but the sardonic advices, "be patient under your god appointed burdens"; "take up life's cross uncomplainingly"; "they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with its lusts" (nature); freely interspersed with "freely ye have received, freely give"; "lay not up for yourselves treasures on earth"; "love not the world," etc., etc.; which translated by the rational mind reads, "pay the piper for the masses, praises and prayers sung by proxy, the gorgeous rituals, the cardinals' palace, and the grand edifice of mummery to the unlistening ether!"

Why is not this enlightening knowledge, these truths of modern science, these teachings from the greatest scientists and thinkers, imparted to the young in our public schools and colleges, instead of school boards busying themselves with the question of pro and con of Bible study, of ancient myths and falsehoods, which they evidently know nothing about?

Is it not vital that the teaching of such mythical balderdash as truth be suppressed by law?

Do we say that the gold brick swindler is a genius and that it is the fault of the credulous farmer that he is deceived? No, we put the swindler in jail.

Why then is the lesser evil punished and not the greater? Why are these men dubbed doctors of learning allowed to deceive the public and abuse the minds of the young with impunity?

AURORA THUNDER.

"THE OTHER CHEEK."

This startling bit of news I see, Of old John D., his saintly son; A pliant Judge approves his plea For a permit to tote a gun. I fear young John's been seeing things, That to him, look dark and squally—Dreams of sudden uprisings Of rude men who might grab all the Tainted treasure they have laid up In their heaven of Wall Street trading; So young Johnny "gets his gun," and in blood he fain would wade up to his Knees? Ah, no, my son; hired gunmen do his wading. If you would start something with John, By smiting him beside the beak? You would best not wait for him too long to turn the "other cheek." In St. John's Sunday School one learns, Of meekness and the Christian graces; but the "other cheek" he now turns, His right hip pocket now embraces. Saintly John seems strangely het up, Blood of the lamb is in his eye, If you don't want your tombstone set up, That "other cheek" you'd best pass by.

HOBERT MURRAY DIES.

From J. G. Hollenbeck, Arizona.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

On March 15 Hobert Murray died at the home of my son in Salida, Colorado, at the age of 80 years. He had been in failing health for two years and for six months or more did not take interest enough in the world to read even THE TRUTH SEEKER which he had taken for 30 years or more. I had known him intimately since 1880, and no better man ever lived. He was kind and generous and charitable to such a degree that he had left but a few dollars—just enough to give him a decent burial at his death. He was a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER and an occasional contributor to its columns for many years. His end was peaceful as he had wished; he simply faded away and was gone. His old time friends gathered, and laid him to rest, respecting his wishes that there should be no church services or ostentatious display. May he rest in peace.

SEVENTH EDITION — REDUCED PRICE

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxies of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

A Spring Outburst.

Of spring, long have the daffy poets sung
With good intent,
And their warbling gabs are again unslung
To large extent.
For spring approaches it, is rather near,
So now is time
To tint our springlike atmosphere
With silly rhyme.
They talk of flowers and birds and bugs
With flowery style
And cough and sneeze and sip the drugs
And try to smile.
They thrill, they chirp, and talk of spring,
With gifted tune—
Poor spring! while 'tis of thee they sing,
They wish for June.
Poets, you've done your share, so run along
And don't deny
That birdies sing a sweeter song
And sing no lie.

Thunder and Theology.—Two negroes were caught in a terrible thunderstorm in the South and took refuge in a barn, but before they could enter they were completely drenched.

The thunder crashed and pealed between flashes of lightning and blinding dashes of rain. One of the darkies thought maybe a little strong language would ease his mind; but his companion remonstrated with him.

Near the Mark.—The minister of a Scotch village being away on holiday, a young deputy took over his duties.

During his long journey north he had caught cold, and arrived at the village inn late on Saturday night with a huskiness which threatened to spoil his preaching powers next morning.

After being shown to his room he suddenly decided to have a glass of hot lemonade and rang the bell, which sounded rather undecidedly. When the servant appeared he remarked pleasantly: "That bell seems to be like myself—a bit hoarse."

"Ay," replied the girl, calmly, "It's cracked."—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

A very frank book; serious, scholarly, convincing.

THE CHRISTIAN HELL

From the First to the Twentieth Century

By

HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work. Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

JUST OUT ETERNITY

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

This Is the Book We Have Been Waiting For

The Belief In God and Immortality

A STATISTICAL STUDY

By JAMES H. LEUBA

Professor of Psychology and Pedagogy in Bryn Mawr College.

The work is the result of an inquiry among men of science — biologists, sociologists, historians, psychologists — as to whether they believe or want to believe in a prayer-answering God and in continuance of life after death. The answer is altogether different from what might be expected in view of the frequent affirmations of the supernaturalists that belief in Christianity, or at least its fundamental dogmas, is held by the majority of the men of science.

It puts into the hands of Freethinkers exactly the information they want on that subject, with the facts and figures verifying it.

As a logical conclusion, founded upon the general aspect of the case, we have held that science leads its votaries to a rejection of such undemonstrable propositions as the existence of gods and the survival of the "soul" when the body is dead. Here we have the evidence, in statistical form, which confirms our view.

To the inquiry into the attitude of the scientists there are added statistics regarding the thought of college students regarding the same religious dogmas.

The author is himself a man of science, an authority in his special branch, which is Psychology, and he knows and sets forth the origin and history of the beliefs with which he deals.

No recent book has attracted more attention from the press, or presented such a serious problem to the supernaturalists.

NATURE'S ETHICAL CODE.

It Provides a Moral System Contrasting With Religion's Hit-or-Miss Affair.

BY MARTIN L. BUNGE.

THE point has been argued in THE TRUTH SEEKER, during the winter months, whether or not the morals of Rationalists, Freethinkers, or Monists were too indefinite and lax to permit the spread of these movements. Even in the central-nervous system of "Rationalists," the inherited structure of certain cells bears traces of the modification into unsound prejudice by influence of the powers of superstition on the cerebral organs of forefathers, to the extent that they believe the philosophy of Reason and Truth, while satisfying to the mind, may produce indefinite and impure morals, and that while the superstition of medieval ages may be insane, it produces definite and pure morals.

Whoever believes in the old proverb adopted even by the Bible—"By their fruits ye shall know them"—would do well to purchase the instructive book "Crimes of Preachers"; then analyze the records of police courts, of prisons, penitentiaries, and houses of correction; then the history of Spain, Italy, Ireland, France, Mexico, Poland and any other country where the religious pest has had a strong hold, and he will find that the more religious influence, the more crime.

But leaving this test aside—also the European war after 1900 years of Christian influence—let us ask the question: "What is religious conduct, and what Rationalist conduct?" and thereupon see which one is more definite, more pure.

Religious morals signify a code of conduct "revealed" to some "divine" man, some Moses, Buddha, Christ or Mohammed, Joseph Smith or Swedenborg, Mrs. Baker Eddy or Billy Sunday; or Paul, or Matthew, or John, or James, or Habakkuk, or whoever has caught the credulity of the ignorant masses; each code being interpreted by hundreds of different founders of subreligious sects and factions.

We find that religious codes permitted polygamy and polyandry, and that the Christians slowly followed the example of reasoning Greeks and Romans and reluctantly adopted monogamy. We find that the saints of the Bible, in their code of morals, deviated so much from today's code that if they lived among us as they lived in Bible times they would be interned either in a penitentiary, a house of correction, or an insane asylum.

We find that the Bible teaches war and mass murder; that the Bible God exults in the slaughter of newly-born babes, and in the ravaging of virgins and female children as long as they were not of Jewish origin; that he commands the Israelites to steal the vessels of gold and silver from their Egyptian neighbors; that he orders young wives to be stoned to death when they are unable to prove their virginity to the satisfaction of an ignorant and suspicious husband; that he institutes slavery, and permits a master to beat his female or male slave to death with the only condition that he or she shall not die while the whipping is going on, but shall live till the next morning, "for he is your money." We find no abomination imaginable that is not permitted or ordered by Jehovah.

We find that Christ held a low conception of woman and of marriage, and advised his followers rather to mutilate themselves for the kingdom of heaven's sake than to look upon a woman. We find that he so habitually indulged in wine that the Jews called him a wine-bibber; that he "made" or brought new wine to the guests at the wedding in Cana, after the guests already were "well drunk"; that he instituted his "sacrament" with intoxicating drink; that he told the people: "Resist not evil"; that he preached a philosophy in which the rascal survives and the average citizen, stupefied by his precepts, submits to all outrage, and crawls, a backboneless coward, before evil and exploitation.

We find that the most senseless and cruel wars have been created and blessed by religious authorities; that slavery, persecution, burning of witches, torture of heretics and massacres have been instigated and carried on by religious people; that the most cruel and inhuman acts have been perpetrated by Christians; that the worst institutions of serfdom and exploitation have found their support in religious authorities, that religion is an indefinite, impure system of hatred and enslavement; that the countries where Christianity controls the schools are the most ignorant and criminal.

There are people who believe a code of morals has been implanted in man's heart, and that the so-called conscience is the voice of God that reacts in case of "sin." If it were true that a perfect God had planted an infallible code in the hearts of men, then this "conscience" would be the same all over the globe. The fact is that the Jew's conscience will be troubled if he eats leavened bread on Easter day, while the non-Jew's conscience is not troubled. The Catholic's heart begins to palpitate and his "voice of God" becomes audible if he eats meat on Friday. He goes to the priest, who fines him, and his "voice of God" is quiet. All know the story told by Ingersoll of the Jew who in a case of ravenous hunger ate bacon, which act is supposed to upset Jehovah's nerves. When it happened that afterwards a thunder storm broke loose, in the pangs of his conscience he believed that the whole creation had been put in uproar on account of his "sin." A little bacon would not have that effect on the most of us. Why? Because we have not been taught that way. The Thibetan woman marries twelve husbands without pangs of conscience, because the voice of God tells her it is all right; the revelation to Joseph Smith in the Book of Mormon told him polygamy was commendable. We believe differently, and with ten wives or more, like the saints of the Bible, would be extremely uncomfortable in mind. Conscience is not the source but the result of a code of morals, and may be as unreliable, indefinite and corrupt as the revelation to Moses, Joseph Smith, Mohammed, or Christ.

On the other hand, the morals of the Rationalists, Freethinkers, or Monists are definite, clear and clean. That is the reason Rationalism produced men like Lincoln, Paine, Ingersoll, Huxley, Wallace, Haeckel, Burbank, Burroughs.

Rationalist morals are not based on revelation, bibles, inspiration, hallucinations, or dreams, but on the scientifically established facts of nature.

In my article "The Situation," page 183 of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Vol. 44, No. 12, I said in regard to the philosophy of Monism or Rationalism: "A Rationalist is not a man or woman seeking freedom to believe anything according to whim or sentiment. A Rationalist strives to have his mental activity in harmony with the facts of the universe. The dualist may believe that three persons are one; the Rationalist can believe such a statement as little as a fine musician can agree to a discord; the tone of his mental consonance is tuned after the eternal symphony and will not yield to a dissonance."

I assert the same position in regard to conduct—"morals." In any circumstances, only one act is right, and the contrary is wrong; all others more or less wrong. Just as I can not believe in the heliocentric theory and the globular form of the earth, and at the same time hold that the statements of Moses implying the contrary are also true and inspired by a perfect being; likewise I can not hold that the killing of a single man may be wrong, and the mass-murder of a different nation just. One thing is either right or wrong, not both; if there is indefiniteness it may be in our knowledge, our consciousness of the universe, our depravity inherited from Christian forefathers; but there is no indefiniteness in nature.

But what is the main principle that underlies nature's "code of ethics"?

The main principle of all activity of the Universe is to create life, more life, better—that is, more differentiated life, more refined life; and because the following of this natural tendency means happiness to us we might say: To create happiness. Therefore some one has said: "Rationalist morality implies a course of conduct that brings the greatest amount of happiness to the greatest number of people with injury to the least number." I take one exception to this explanation inasmuch as it still leaves the possibility of impairing the happiness of some. I hope that we shall gradually develop an economic and social system by which every one can be made happy and make himself happy without injuring any one.

Is war right or wrong? The Christian teacher answers: "If your emperor, or president, or any magistrate tells you to go to war, it is right, for you must obey all magistrates and there is no magistrate except by God. Nothing happens that God does not will. God told the Israelites to destroy the Canaanites who lived where the 'children of God' wanted to live. God helps his nation in every war. We have a just cause, and God will help us to destroy our enemies and save the first culture on this globe. On the other hand, killing is sin. But God will forgive you because you do this for the flag of your country, for altar and throne, and your monarch." The Rationalist says: "War is utterly wrong. It destroys life and the results of human labor. It is contrary to nature's tendency in creating energies."

Herbert Spencer in his "Data of Ethics" says: "Let us ascertain what good and bad mean. In which cases do we distinguish as good a knife, or a house? What trait leads us to speak of a bad umbrella, or a bad pair of boots? The characters here predicated by the words good and bad are not intrinsic characters; for, apart from human wants, such things seem to have neither merits nor demerits. We call these articles good or bad according as they are well or ill adapted to achieve prescribed ends. The good knife is one which will cut; the good house is the one which duly yields the shelter, comfort and accommodation sought for; the badness alleged of the umbrella or the pair of boots refers to their failures in fulfilling the ends of keeping off the rain and comfortably protecting the feet, with due regard to appearances. So it is when we pass from inanimate objects to inanimate actions. We call a day bad in which it rains when we wanted to go to a picnic; we call the same day good when we need rain for our crop. If from lifeless things we pass to living ones, we similarly find that these words in their current application refer to efficient subservience. The fitness of a horse, a dog, an ox, etc., refers to the fitness of their actions for effecting the ends men use them for, ignoring all other attributes of these creatures as beings adapted to support human life and happiness. And those doings of men which morally are indifferent we class as good or bad according to their success or failure. A good jump is a jump which well achieves the immediate purpose of a jump. . . Also under ethical aspects we take the meanings of good or bad according as the adjustments of acts to ends are, or are not, efficient. This truth is somewhat disguised. The entanglement of social relations is such that men's actions often simultaneously affect the welfares of self, or offspring, and of fellow-citizens. Hence results confusion in judging of actions as good or bad; since actions well fitted to achieve ends of one order, may prevent ends of the other orders from being achieved. Nevertheless, when we disentangle the three orders of ends, and consider each separately, it becomes clear that the conduct which achieves each kind of end is regarded as relatively good; and is regarded as relatively bad if it fails to achieve it. We see that we regard as good the conduct furthering self-preservation of individual, society, and universe. . . Well-adjusted life-conserving acts, acts to bring up well progeny, and acts which further the complete living of other beings, we call good; those that hinder individual or universal life, or are badly adjusted to development of individual or universal life, we call bad."

There is absolutely no case where the application of these principles by a well-informed reasoning man will leave any doubt in regard to the goodness or badness of any act.

The morals of a Rationalist are definite, and they are pure when not adulterated with unnatural desires of tyrants or priests or other exploiters, as are all religious morals, which are made or modified for a purpose—for the benefit of certain selfish schemes.

Only when by a systematic effort of all reasoners the system of superstitious, hypocritical, unnatural religious "morals" has been broken, and Rationalist, definite, pure morals prevail—only then will men enjoy the full happiness of an advanced age.

The most infamous popes, the most heartless and fiendish bishops, friars and priests were models of mercy, charity and justice when compared with the orthodox God—with the God they worshiped. These popes, these bishops, these priests could persecute only for a few years—they could burn only for a few moments—but their God threatened to imprison and burn forever; and their God is as much worse than they were, as hell is worse than the inquisition. —R. G. Ingersoll.

The most extraordinary of all the things called miracles, related in the New Testament, is that of the devil flying away with Jesus Christ, and carrying him to the top of a high mountain, and to the top of the highest pinnacle of the temple, and showing him and promising to him all the kingdoms of the World. How happened it that he did not discover America, or is it only with kingdoms that his sooty highness has any interest?—Thomas Paine.

Small service is true service while it lasts;
Of friends, however humble, scorn not one;
The daisy, by the shadow that it casts,
Protects the ling'ring dewdrops from the sun.

Trial by Ordeal—The Crucifixion

I was amused when I read that in London, England, at the trial of the prisoners charged with conspiring to murder Premier Lloyd George and Arthur Henderson, the lawyer acting as attorney for the defendants startled the court by suggesting a "trial by ordeal." "Trial by ordeal" is the medieval form of judicial trial, in which in place of evidence, supernatural aid is invoked, as in a test by fire, water, poison, or other agencies.

I see nothing for Christians to cavil about, when the Mohammedan lawyer suggested a "trial by ordeal." It is biblical and must be as efficacious now as it was years ago, and the sixteenth chapter of Mark, eighteenth verse, upholds it. If it was true then, it is true now; if it was a lie then, it is false now. If I had been the judge I would have said the whole story was a lie from the beginning. This Mohammedan lawyer wanted his clients to walk with bare feet over hot ploughshares in order to prove their innocence. This Mohammedan lawyer was a consistent Christian. The judge evidently had no faith in "trial by ordeal," but was not honest enough to say so. He simply said: "It has been abolished," as much other biblical stuff should be.

If you wish to read pious fabrications, read the last chapters of the four gospels, wherein is related the account of the crucifixion of Jesus. I believe that no truth is in either one of these accounts. It is fortunate for us that the early Christian church preserved more than one gospel. Contradiction is fatal to any doctrine or any theory, and where there are several accounts of an event, no one is wise enough to select the true one. It is generally safest to throw all so-called sacred writings into the secular waste basket. If one writer says that a man was riding a white horse and another says that he was riding a black horse, it is pretty evident that the man was riding a bay mare, or was traveling on foot. I know that a dozen eye-witnesses may describe an accident in a dozen different ways, but when one witness paints a scene in one color and another witness in a totally different color, there is no question that the scene was beyond description. So when one historian relates that a pope was assassinated, while another historian tells the world that he died of hunger, I am inclined to believe that the second historian was afraid to tell the truth.

Agreement of statement does not make a thing true, when there are several witnesses, for all of them may be liars, but contradictions in the different accounts of the crucifixion of Jesus do not contribute to harmony in Christian faith.

In pointing out the discrepancies in the narratives of the crucifixion I am defending no theory of my own. I believe there was no crucifixion—I am trying to show that faith is not clinging to the "rock of ages," but is sinking to ignominious death in the quicksands of falsehood. If a murder had been committed in a certain locality and the crime had been witnessed by several persons, it would seem as though an intelligent story of the occurrence could be had, but when one says the murderer was a negro, and a second one says he was a Chinaman, while a third insists that he was a Russian, the only sane conclusion that a jury could reach—with no corpus delicti—would be that there had been no murder. This is the only rational verdict in respect to the different accounts of the crucifixion of Jesus in the four gospels.

The first item in these accounts is where Jesus was taken in charge by the soldiers of Pilate. Matthew says that the soldiers stripped him and put on him a scarlet robe. Mark says that they clothed him with purple. Luke says he was arrayed in a gorgeous robe, and John, with a truly royal imagination, makes his hero wear the kingly color of imperial purple.

The next item to which our attention is called is the bearing of the cross on which Jesus is said to have been crucified. Matthew informs us that Simon of Cyrene was compelled to bear the cross. Mark and Luke agree with Matthew. John disputes the three and declares that Jesus himself bore the cross. If Simon carried the cross, Jesus did not carry it.

Another item which we wish to notice is the drink offered to Jesus before he was crucified. Matthew informs us that the drink was vinegar mingled with gall. Mark says the drink was wine mingled with myrrh. Luke says that the soldiers offered him vinegar, while John does not mention the subject.

The question "Who crucified Jesus?" is a very important one. Matthew declares that the soldiers of Pilate did the deed. Mark says the same thing. Luke has no clear idea as to his execution. John makes out that the Jews killed Jesus, and then says that the soldiers crucified him.

The superscription set over the head of Jesus as he hung on the cross is a matter of interest. This must have been seen by all, and it is difficult to understand how there could be more than one report as to how it was written. Matthew informs us that it read, "This is Jesus, the King of the Jews." Mark says it read, "The King of the Jews." Luke says it was in Greek and Latin and Hebrew, and read "This is the King of the Jews." John says that Pilate wrote it and put it on the cross, and that it read, "Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews." In this conglomeration who can select the truth from fiction?

It is our duty to bear in mind the fact that there is no historical account of the crucifixion of Jesus; that not a single contemporaneous writer refers to such an occurrence. Now if Jesus had been put to death on the cross within a short distance of Jerusalem, is it sense to believe that such an act would not have called down upon the heads of his executioners the condemnation of the populace, or that some historian among the people would not have referred to it? I am forced to conclude, after reading the whole story of the crucifixion, that there was no crucifixion, that the whole thing (cross, Jesus and all) is pure invention; that the tale is a religious fable told to sustain the character of savior which had been given to Jesus by the Christian church, and that the writers of the four gospels were priests who would rather lie for God's or the pope's glory than tell the truth.

In reviewing the evidence of the event of the crucifixion it is plain that if Matthew was right when he said that a scarlet robe was put on Jesus before he was killed, Mark must have been color-blind when he said that the robe was purple. So in regard to the one that bore the cross; if the first three gospels gave this honor to Simon, and rightly so, then John was mistaken when he said Jesus himself carried his cross. There is a wide difference between vinegar and gall, and wine and myrrh, and either Matthew or Mark was misinformed in regard to the drink offered to Jesus.

But perhaps the most serious discrepancy in the story is found in the different readings of the superscription placed over the head of Jesus after he had been crucified, and we can only conclude that there was no cross and no victim hanging on it over which had been placed any legend about a king of the Jews.

It is a matter of fact that the four gospels are four dramas written by forgotten authors; that their hero has no history in contemporaneous literature; that he is a person of religious value without historical endorsement, and that he never lived save in the imagination of ignorance and superstition. In my opinion the story of the crucifixion is cruci-fiction. MARILLA M. RICKER.

The Jesus Controversy.

So far as any additional evidence to the Jesus controversy that my opposition can produce is concerned, I still contend the argument is exhausted. I linger with them merely to convince TRUTH SEEKER readers of this fact. All that is really pertinent they have already said. The argument amounts to just this: Certain men, presumed to be authorities, have expressed an opinion adverse to the authenticity of a passage in Josephus that I contend there is no evidence against. One of two passages therein is so manifestly a forgery that there is no division of opinion about it. To influence the readers' judgment Mr. Morris brings forth additional evidence from learned critics that the passage whose spuriousness is not in dispute is spurious. What relevancy has such superfluous evidence to the question at issue? As Dr. Hooykaas and Dr. Campbell both knew that there were two references in Josephus and only referred to "one passage," the implication is they deemed the other either unassailable, or, as other critics had done, held that it did not refer to the Jesus of the gospels at all, but to some other unknown claimant to messiahship. When we read Drews properly, this is the alternative he holds in reserve. He is not sure about its spuriousness, and so, as Taylor had done before him, adds: "Even if its authenticity were established it would still prove nothing in favor of the historical (i. e., the mythical gospel) Jesus. The passage only asserts there was a man by the name of Jesus who was called Christ, and this is in no way extraordinary." Certainly not. As Drews' theory gave him a bias against the reality of Jesus he was willing to rest his judgment on the opinion of certain theologians who had no more evidence against it than himself. "Eminent theologians" were only too willing to "let the tail go with the hide," when they discovered that the only passage for them worth saving had been proved fraudulent. They deemed it far better that Josephus should not have mentioned Jesus at all than to have referred to him in such an inconsequential way. The very meagerness of his reference is really a denial of the whole marvelous and incredible gospel story. The extraordinary part about it is not that there was a Jew named Jesus who claimed to be Christ, for there were many such, but that Josephus should have, by implication, located one with such a title alive after the time of the alleged crucifixion, and at the exact period that the New Testament itself, as I have shown by internal evidence, fixes for the existence of its romantic man-god. That is a feature that neither Drews nor any of the critics of this passage ever thought out. In default of evidence against the authenticity of the passage it reverses the whole order of probability.

When these eminent critics cannot really prove the spuriousness of the twentieth chapter of Josephus' "Antiquities," neither Morris nor Wakefield is likely to. When I said that Mr. Morris's opinion was "not worth the paper it was printed on," it was with the distinct knowledge that the opinion was not the opinion of the authorities he quotes; and he cannot shelter himself behind them. Not one of them would make the unwarranted declaration that the evidence against both passages was of equal validity. An intrinsically worthless opinion, however, may have great commercial value with ignorance, as instance the writings of Mother Eddy or Joe Smith.

Mr. Morris ventures to do what I said could not be done without destroying the sense of Josephus. Has he been successful? Let us see. To illustrate, he abridges Josephus to read: "He brought before him one whose name was James, and some others." Why should Josephus separate an unknown and unidentified James from "some others"? If they were all unknown he would lump them, and say "sundry individuals" or "certain persons." Is there any sense in singling out an unknown James and mentioning him separately from the others? I think not. Josephus mentioned James because he was the most prominent character in the group, and this prominence arose from the fact that he was "the brother of Jesus who was called Christ." No other prominence is attributed to him, and no other reason can be assigned for the mention of his name. You will search in vain through all of Josephus' works for a case where he refers to a man by a common name that he has not previously separated from others of like name by title or parentage. Mr. Morris's effort is abortive.

There is nothing, however, to prevent Mr. Morris from making another substitute that will ignore James altogether, and fill in with as many characters as he can imagine. Guess-work has no limit. I want proof that some previous volume of Josephus contained such a changed statement. Mr. Morris can go on guessing what he pleases and believe what he pleases. His argument is, as I said, "exhausted."

Dr. Wakefield now owes your readers an apology for his apology. This "incautiousness" has gone to the point of falsification; whether on account of obfuscation, merry-making, or mendacity I leave to him to explain. He says that "instead of further denying the interpolation in Josephus he [I] now alleges an interpolation by some one in Origen of the words 'ought to have said.'" He further adds, "He [Eccles] advances the new hypothesis that his copy of Origen has really been interpolated." And finally, "by first denying and then" alleging an interpolation in Origen of the words "ought to have said" I have shown how "desperate" is my situation! "I can hardly believe," Dr. Wakefield "is serious in alleging" that I allege "the words 'ought to have said' are interpolations"; for such a confused and misinterpreted jumble I have not seen in THE TRUTH SEEKER since another correspondent accused me of denying the truth of Darwin's theory of natural selection. The whole reiterated statement is as false as false can be. I have never alleged that I had a volume of Origen to be interpolated; for I said to find out the falsity of his denial of my quotation taken from it, as found in an appendix to my Josephus, I had to go to the Congressional Library to disprove. I said the words in every translated volume I examined were identical with those I quoted, even to the clause "ought to have said." What Dr. Wakefield does not see is that Origen, while stating what Josephus "ought to have said," also adds what he did say "as one not remote from the truth." And Dr. Wakefield affirmed that "no ecclesiastical or profane writer" had ever heard of such a quotation from Origen.

I am not concerned whether Origen deliberately lied to Celsus in that part of his statement wherein he affirms that Josephus attributed the destruction of Jerusalem to what had been done to James the Just, or whether he was misled by some marginal note or other tradition, I only know he used the exact expression which in his Commentary on Matthew, written years before, he stated as appearing in Josephus' "Antiquities," Book 20, chapter 3, and that save the words "the Just" the quotation still appears there. If Dr. Wakefield knows of a volume of Josephus containing the words "the Just," let him produce it. That I hold to be a spurious addition and commentary by Origen himself. I want no guesses; I want proof.

The quotation shows the desperation or Origen to find evidence of a "historic Jesus," if by historic we mean an individual whose life and death verified the gospel record. It is really a refutation of that "history"; and smarter theologians than Origen now see this, and are devoutly willing to let it go along with the later forgery. It shows conclusively that no historian save Josephus had ever referred to Jesus the Christ up to that time, and he only in such a way as to falsify the gospel story. I am astonished that Freethinkers cannot see this. But the mythodelphians outnumber me, and I will waste no more time on the subject. Dr. Wakefield is in a mire of contradiction, and I leave him there.

DAVID ECCLES.

The Great Failure.

If nineteen hundred years are not sufficient to demonstrate the failure of Christianity, how much longer are we expected to wait for a practical demonstration?

And then, again, what is Christianity when it is represented by more than seventy sects that cannot agree on its meaning, and are all at variance with the same source of information to draw from?

With lack of unity among the sects and schisms, we are still able to reach a very good comprehension of what Christianity is, for we have no trouble in learning what it has tried to do since it was founded; and the purpose of any religious movement is enough without perfect harmony in details among those who accept it.

The primary object of Christianity is to save sinners from going to hell; its secondary object is to present a code of morals to govern society and make it possible for people to live in peace and harmony, by taking Jesus with his life and teachings as a guide.

It was expected when Christianity was founded that the whole world would accept it, and every knee would bow to Jesus, the man-God, in due course of time. But the world is further from the realization of such a thing than it was at one time in the past, for less than one-third of the people on the globe are now professed Christians; and in every orthodox church decay and disintegration are going on.

Christianity is dying of dry rot and stagnant ideas with as much certainty as is an aged man afflicted with paralysis and loss of vital forces. It reached the zenith of its powers before the Reformation, and since then has never had the same virility and such absolute dominion over the minds of men. As its object was to convert the whole world to a belief in Jesus and his mission, and by so doing to save from the fearful wrath of God, all mankind who would accept it; and as it has been able to do nothing of the kind, with no possibility or probability that it ever can or will, what more is needed to reveal its failure?

As a religion it still clings to life and manifests the same hope and courage as a consumptive in the last stages, who never desponds of recovery; but hope was never anything but a mental tonic to spur one on with renewed exertions; and while it is now playing that role in connection with Christianity, that divine humbug is being slowly relegated to the things that were by the unavoidable decrees of fate, which reigns and rules triumphant in all the affairs of men and gods.

As nothing is immortal in this world, to expect Christianity to be, is to discard the testimony of human experience and to believe in the impossible.

The world has seen too many religions come and go for any one, if well informed, to suppose Christianity is exempt from an invariable rule; so that, while its complete extinction, like heathen mythology, may be postponed for centuries, yet it is destined to fade away and be replaced by—what? No man knows; but—with the past for a guide in judging—by something better, since there could be nothing worse.

The history of Christianity and all Christian nations is one of bloodshed and warfare, and no people that ever claimed to be civilized have held human life cheaper or been so frequently engaged in wars. To write the doings of these meek and lowly pretenders, blood is more suitable than ink, for they have caused rivers of it to flow since the fourth century, when they became a governmental force under Constantine, or what we now term a "world power."

While prating of Jesus as the Prince of Peace, they have gone forth to battle with prayers for victory addressed to him, which, when analyzed, meant he was expected to help kill their enemies; to wound, blind and cripple, or, with contagious diseases to sweep off untold numbers, as is the case in all wars. They have held religious services before battles and after, and the priest and the soldier have always held close and intimate relations with each other. Never was a war waged where the priest was not an active factor in giving encouragement and spurring the soldiers on; and never did he fail to assure them that death meant immediate entrance into the joys of heaven, where God and Jesus waited their coming to participate in the endless song and dance around the great white throne. No Christian soldier ever expected anything else, for without that hope and promise none would have gone into battle and risked their lives; any other fate would have made them cowards and unfit for successful butchers. The Christian soldier without the incentive of heaven would make a poor fighter, and though he was never promised seven wives or honors, like the Mohammedan soldier, no doubt he was led to expect some angel awaited his coming, for soldiers in all ages have been notoriously fond of women; and heaven without them would be a mighty dull place. Of course reference is now made to the time when all soldiers were Christians, and it applies directly and properly to all who are today in the great European contest. Every ruler in this great conflict, incomparable with any previous war, is a professed Christian, though many soldiers are not; and being the deciding force in making war, what is more evident that this fact: that Christianity has no restraining influence in preventing men from killing each other in battle? In that respect it has no effective standard of morals; and as it introduced no new and untried kind of morals that have ever been used by its devotees and professed followers of Jesus, no one can deny its failure as a moral force; and, as it has failed in nineteen hundred years to reach and convert two-thirds of the people on the globe, what else is it but a failure as a religious institution?

We now see very clearly what a fraud and a failure it is; and if any priest or preacher can give one good reason for keeping it alive, by forcing it into children—the only possible way it can be preserved—it will receive distinguished consideration from every rational thinker who sees it.

It is of no use to defend Christianity because of its "new" morals, such as love your enemies; do good to them that persecute you; do unto others as you would they should do unto you, with all the impractical things in the sermon on the mount; for no Christian lives who practices any of them, or ever did; and if that is the case, and I defy any one to prove the contrary, Christianity has not one single merit that should keep it alive. And when we reflect on what a curse it has ever been to humanity, who can object to the most speedy death that time and fate can bestow upon it?

CHANNING SEVERANCE.

Revelation is a communication of something which the person to whom that thing is revealed did not know before. For if I have done a thing, or seen it done, it needs no revelation to tell me I have done it, or seen it, nor to enable me to tell it, or to write it. Revelation, therefore, cannot be applied to anything done upon earth of which man himself is the actor or the witness; and consequently all the historical and anecdotal parts of the Bible which is almost the whole of it, is not within the meaning and compass of the word revelation, and, therefore, is not the word of God.—Thomas Paine.

The historical character of Moses has not been established, and it is doubtful whether the name is that of an individual or that of a clan. The alleged origin of the Ten Commandments is purely legendary; it is probable that they were framed not earlier than the time of Amos. It is admitted even by conservative critics that the original worship of the Israelites was not of an ethical character.—Philip Vivian.

Infidel! The name has been borne, good Christian, by some of the noblest of our race. I take it from you with a smile. I am an easy old pagan, and I am not angry with you at all—you funny little champion of the Most High.—Robert Blatchford.

We talk of religion. Let us talk of truth; for that which is not truth is not worthy the name of religion.—Thomas Paine.

The Lost Fight for Peace.

AS THE TRUTH SEEKER has counseled its pacifist readers to show themselves to be good losers should their efforts to keep the country at peace prove unsuccessful, we shall have to take our own advice and refrain from murmurs when the worst has come. There is nothing to be done but make the best of an unfortunate outcome of the negotiations with Germany.

The pacifist is unpopular these days, but he may console himself with the thought that he might be worse. He might as the result of perverse celebration be a pro-German. We are saved from that, and can only view with puzzled wonder the American of German descent who while living and acting as the citizen of a democratic republic can make professions of sympathy with the worst autocracy that has raised and lost its head in this century. Dr. Eliot has criticised the Christian soldier who in the hymn "goes forth to war, a kingly crown to gain," as actuated by the meanest motives. We comment on the inconsistency of any republican yearning for a kingdom in the skies and praying for it to come on earth; but those foibles belong to the domain of religion wherein consistency is unexpected and out of place, and are matters of belief and not of fact. The imperial German government is a fact, a condition and not a theory. How may one enjoying democratic privileges and natural rights stand for it, with its God-intoxicated, swaggering and sword-rattling kaiser, prating of divine right and "my" army, and its pretorianism, with epauletted coxcombs who amuse themselves by sabering inoffensive citizens who forget to get off the sidewalk at their approach, or to give them the best seat at a show? Only distance can make such a view enchanting, or even tolerable.

In his address to Congress President Wilson said: "We have no quarrel with the German people. We have no feeling toward them but one of sympathy and friendship." Those are our sentiments. Even a prokaisering German-American has our sympathy and friendship, but our comprehension does not take him in. He is die Welträthsel—the riddle of the universe.

The prowess of Germany in war is not going to threaten seriously the integrity and welfare of the United States, which can carry on the war as an industry for the next fifty years and meanwhile gain in strength. But see what the causeless and inexcusable war has done to Germany. She has not made a new friend except the sultan of Turkey, and has made enemies of the principal nations of the earth. Her commerce has been blown away. Her ships that were the admiration of passengers on our river craft lie decaying in the Hoboken and other North river docks. They are said to represent a cost of $30,000,000 in material and human labor. The ports of the world are closed to them. They cannot trade in Orient or Occident, nor at the antipodes. The shipping of Germany is reduced to those wasps of the sea, the submarine assassins. As the German people are as much as anyone else the sufferers, they have our sympathy. If they are not hostile to us, they have our friendship, and were they to follow the example just set by the Russian people they would excite our applause.

Discussing the war in a Times interview, Joseph McCabe affirmed that the humanitarians bear a heavy responsibility for hampering preparations for war in France and England, because "bullies thrive best in an atmosphere of meekness," and the mailed fist cannot be met with soft gloves. That is deplorably true. When war is inevitable the public humanitarian propaganda has to be suspended; but hope is not lost nor abandoned. The peace spirit can lie dormant while the winter of war is here, and come forth afterwards to resume. In the meantime the pacifists will render their country the service it has the right to expect.

Passing the Lie to Jesus.

The obvious fact having been pointed out by a New York clergyman that the adoption and approval of the methods of the evangelist now with us is a choice between Jesusism and Sundayism in favor of the latter, Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., retorts: "What difference does it make what methods Billy Sunday uses so long as he saves men?" Mr. Rockefeller must be cosmopolitan in his religious beliefs.

The scriptures have told us that there is no other way under heaven and among men whereby they may be saved except the gospel of Jesus Christ; and that is not the Sunday gospel. Furthermore, Christians are instructed that all who come among us teaching something else are to be anathema. Billy Sunday incurs this curse. He does not use the "methods" of Jesus.

Jesusism is full of inconsistencies and contradictions, but it bulks on the side of non-resistance and what is called "love." For example, Jesus made love of God and man the first and second "great" commandments: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God," and "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Acknowledging his indebtedness to the Old Testament for this doctrine, he added: "On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets." He spoke of his God as a father, and looking out over a mob he said: "These are my brethren." But listen to Sundayism:

"The doctrine of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man is the worst rot that was ever dug from the pit of hell, and every minister who preaches it is a liar."

Jesus was a minister and he preached the doctrine, hence he is a liar. Can Mr. Rockefeller acquiesce in the methods of one who says this of Jesus? While in Philadelphia Sunday prayed: "To hell with all hiding under the name of religion who mock at the Bible and sneer at your divinity, O Jesus!" Perhaps Jesus would rather have his divinity doubted than be called a liar in plain words.

Jesusism is "judge not that ye be not judged"; "resist not evil"; "Father, forgive them." Sundayism judges and condemns, sending to hell as many as it claims to save. "If Bob Ingersoll is not roasting in hell, then God is a liar and the Bible not worth the paper it is printed on." "There goes old Darwin; he's in hell now." "When Edward Everett Hale died his soul took a bee-line for hell." "It's a good thing I'm not God for fifteen minutes. If I were I'd fill all your papers with obituaries and fill freight cars with the dead." "If you come up here you had better have your picture taken—your wife wouldn't know you when you get home." That is Sundayism.

Contrasting Jesusism with Sundayism, another "lying" doctrine of the former is found in the return of blessings for curses, and love even for enemies. Sundayism affords the corrective. Says the evangelist: "You have heard some of these mutts ask, 'What would Jesus do if he were here today?' He'd skin 'em, that's what he'd do." That amounts to another charge of falsehood against Jesus—the saying of one thing and meaning another.

Pursuing his course of deceit, detected and exposed by the evangelist, Jesus gave a series of secular, human and wholly non-theological commandments to a man who wanted to know how he could be saved. The instructions were: "Do no murder; do not commit adultery; do not steal; do not bear false witness; honor father and mother, and love your neighbor as yourself." The man could take it from him, but did not need to take him with it. (See Matthew xix.)

Sundayism denies in toto the saving power of these precepts. The man who observes them and the man who does not will go to perdition together unless they confess Jesus. Such a statement occurs in his printed discourses, and closes with the defiance: "You don't like it? I don't care a rap whether you do or not. You'll take it or go to hell."

To the Christian sect that exalts the humanity of Jesus, Sundayism shouts: "God, the Unitarians say you lie. Why don't you kill 'em?" If they believed in a murderous Christ, the Unitarians might retort: "Jesus, the Rev. W. A. Sunday says you are a liar. Why don't you kill him?"

For an evangelist to set up his tabernacle and profess to introduce people to Jesus as a personal savior is not a sign that Jesus will acknowledge him as his agent. "Many," observes Jesus, "will say unto me, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them: I never knew you; depart from me."

Sundayism has said: "If a minister believes and teaches evolution, he is a stinking skunk, a hypocrite and a liar." The evolutionists surely will not accept Sunday as their exponent, or as one to bring them recruits. Sundayism also holds: "Every minister who preaches the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man is a liar." Christ was such a preacher. Can Christians who embrace Jesus as their personal savior take at the same time the hand of Billy Sunday, who has denounced him as a liar for preaching the brotherhood of man?

A Governor's Censures Upon Freethought.

The Freethinker of today is frequently moved to congratulate himself that he is living in an age when men are disposed at last to look at human affairs from the standpoint of unprejudiced thought. The spirit of toleration which has developed in the world since the days of Voltaire, who gave the most effective impulse to that much-desired condition, starting into activity many correlative forces for good, has led some Rationalists to hope that the era of free thought and free speech had really arrived in our generation, and that no person of education and standing would today wish to endanger his name and reputation by withholding from mankind the right to think and speak as individuals.

Every now and then, however, by the utterances of some prominent Christian, the sincere Rationalist receives a painful shock which shatters his hopes and compels him to consider anew the degree of progress thus far made by the Freethought movement in our modern world. A case in point is that of the speech made by the governor of the state of New York at the time of the opening of the Billy Sunday Tabernacle in this city on April 1. The propriety of the governor being present and lending his official influence to such a sectarian gathering as that meeting brought together, is a matter we will not consider at this time. We wish simply to note some of his remarks made on that occasion, as reported by the daily press.

The papers were unanimous in the statement that the governor rebuked those who have withheld their indorsement from Sunday's evangelistic campaign, by asserting that "only the mean and stupid will dare to put themselves in opposition to the bright promise of the Sunday meetings." The adjectives chosen by the governor to describe those persons who "dare" to differ with him in his gubernatorial pronouncements, do little honor to the qualities of his mind and heart. New York's governor is wholly entitled to his own opinion regarding Billy Sunday or any other religious fanatic that now or formerly assisted in making religion appear ridiculous as well as incredible; but for him to use the power of his office to malign those who have the best of reasons for their disapproval of that irreligious mountebank, may be very good politics though it is certainly bad citizenship.

Those who have denounced Sunday's theology and methods are neither "mean" nor "stupid," nor are they inclined to be as lightly concerned about these phases of the matter as the governor declared that he is when he announced that he was "not greatly concerned with the theology of Mr. Sunday," nor had any "large interest in his methods." We don't expect a state chief executive to know much about theology or religious methods of evangelism, but we do expect him to tell the truth about his fellow citizens, and not to disseminate a false impression in regard to their right and ability to think for themselves as well as his excellency. The governor's speech sounds like a bit of old Russia. He seems to have forgotten—if indeed he ever seriously realized—that we are now living in the twentieth century, and that the intelligent man will no longer permit the expression of his personal judgment to be throttled by any other man, not even the governor of the great state of New York. The governor's remarks were an insult to free thought and free speech which will not soon be forgotten by the enlightened part of the community.

After attacking the personal right of Freethought in order to support Billy Sundayism, the governor assails the American sense of decency by this sinister observation: "It may offend the fastidious to hear some of his [Sunday's] phrases." The man who made this remark either could never have heard Sunday preach or his ideas of decency must differ seriously from those held by respectable people generally. This is the first time in our knowledge that the character of Sunday's pulpit language has been measured by the mere fastidiousness of his hearers. As a matter of fact, his vulgar and profane drivel has been condemned everywhere, even by the various divisions of religionists themselves. On the very day that the New York governor proclaimed his indorsement of this crude product of religion, Rabbi Wise, a liberal Jewish leader, presented a true study of the man, and the conditions which gave him birth as an evangelist, in a discourse delivered in Carnegie Hall, New York city. Commenting on a prayer offered by Sunday that the Lord would cause hell to loose its grip in Philadelphia and precede the evangelist to Boston and New York, the Rabbi said: "This is not merely drivel, vulgarity and blasphemy, it is the apotheosis of low selfishness, masking in the guise of high religion." Sunday has formulated his doctrine of eternal damnation in these words: "Look out, or you will be struck out three times and then get a swat on the head forever." To say that people are fastidious when they object to such degrading speech in the pulpit, is to set a premium upon low thoughts and low ideas, and comes with a sorry grace from one who because of his high position ought to lead the community in all that makes for its intellectual and moral enlightenment.

No one is specially interested in the New York governor's opinion of Sunday and his peculiar methods of work, but everyone is interested in the strictures which his remarks seem to place upon the right of every man to think for himself. The spirit of intolerance is by no means dead in our various communities. The Rationalist has no desire whatever to coerce the believer into a change of opinion to fit the former's views; the cause of all the trouble in the world of thought has been the fixed determination with which the believer has always tried to enforce his religious notions upon others who felt no interest in them. The Rationalist is well aware of the astounding aberrations of the human mind, and that, as Vitale says, "even the most ludicrous follies find heads that are made to believe in them"; nevertheless, he is always the foremost to accord the right of free thought to every sincere thinker, whether he think on the line of religion or the line of naturalism.

Rationalism contends for a principle, not for a set of opinions. We are more concerned about the right of freedom of thought than we are about any particular type of human thought; for once allow that each man has the right to think for himself, and all the results of such thinking will easily adjust themselves in the great world of honest efforts in pursuit of truth. To cast a slur upon the unsympathetic intelligence of a people because of the work of such a man as Billy Sunday is, to say the least, a matter of very bad taste for a governor of an American state to engage in. It is always a difficult thing, in judging the words and actions of government officials, to distinguish between the man and the politician; but whether as a man or a politician, the governor of New York added nothing to his reputation when he sought to intimidate the thinking part of the people from expressing their honest opinion as to the sayings and doings of a very questionable character.

Jus Gentium.

The Jus Gentium, or Law of Nations, was the code, imaginary rather than written, which applied to the relations of Rome with other states, the Common Law of the nations. When the Roman empire vanished in the nations of modern Europe the principle survived. Like a germ it has pushed towards the light. Heretofore no one disputed it, though few saw whereunto it would grow. Nations as units have their justification, but not as hostile units, only as units in the large body of humanity. Humanity is the unit. As Nature is one, man is one. Any sincere belief in Nature involves a belief in the solidarity of humanity.

Once the counties of England were warring kingdoms. England only emerged in their fusion under Edward the Elder. America had the advantage of starting with the fusion; our great civil war was to prevent division. The United States covers a continent. Each state is independent, but the United States is a nation.

Shall we call it a certain trend of evolution, or shall we regard it as the beckoning ideal, which we are called on to realize? There should be a United States of Europe; as the kingdoms of the Heptarchy became England, the states of Europe should become at last Europe. Long ago, at the beginning of the nineteenth century, it was said, "There are no longer nations in Europe, but only parties." It seemed as if democracy bound the people together more than the idea of the nation to which the particular people belonged. Royalists were one, Ultramontanes were one, more than the English were one or the French were one.

But one of the most curious movements of the nineteenth century was the creation and the strengthening of national ideals. Italy, which for centuries has been, as Metternich phrased it, "a geographical expression," became a nation. The innumerable German kingdoms and dukedoms became a nation. Even the conglomerate of Slavs and Czecks and Germans, gathered under the crown of the late emperor, Francis Joseph, became a kind of nation. The national idea fostered the national consciousness, and set the nations on the path of military armaments, a rivalry of futile preparations for imaginary wars; at least, so it seemed at that time.

But who in those days could have prophesied that out of this reestablished idea of nationalism should have developed the greatest and most destructive war known to history! War, however, whether of arms or tariffs, cannot permanently be endured as democracy triumphs. The people have no quarrel with one another. They are kept asunder by interested persons, a mere handful, who profit by their estrangement. But the time is surely coming when they will decline to fight with their brothers, and will demand for peaceful development the wealth which is at present wasted on armaments.

Gradually, in the contemplation of the awful war which is now devastating some of the fairest portions of Europe, mankind is waking up; it sees the huge tragedy of its estrangement, the fair earth marred by the quarrels and misunderstandings of brothers. It is fast learning that autocracy is weakness, secured by craft, maintained by force, only to perish in panic and demoralization. It is therefore the first principle of government to obtain the most considerate, the most unbiased, and the most unhindered expression of the people's will. This is the democracy which political prophets from the earliest ages desired to see. Its day has dawned. Towards it Europe has moved with a slow, unrelenting course. Its full realization is the problem of today and of the future. The high politics of the future will be peace.

The "State" of Purgatory.

I like definitions, for the reason that they shed so little light on what you wish to know, which leaves you free to give your own definition. Lots of definitions are one thing or another, but who is to decide which? When we are told that purgatory is "a state or a place of purification after death," how do we know whether it is a city or a sorrow.

I like places better than states, that is, mental or moral conditions. Now, a place is definite. You can find it, but a condition is not permanent. It may be outgrown or otherwise lost. When a person speaks of heaven, I wish to know whether he means a salesgirl's vacation or the residence of his divine majesty with his royal servants. So when a person has anything to say about hell I am anxious to learn if it be Billy Sunday's hot place for scientists and philosophers or one of Doré's pictures illustrating Dante's Inferno. I want sure ground under my feet when I travel a religious highway.

I realize that it is difficult to define what no one knows anything about, but the remedy for this difficulty is to say so, to admit one's ignorance. But the church would die in ten minutes if it told the truth about its doctrines. As long as it can pass faith for facts it can live, but when the people see the deception which has been practiced upon them it is good-bye forever to religion.

Some persons seem to think that Freethought is the icy point of existence for human hearts, whereas there is nothing further from the fact. The greatest happiness is where there is the greatest freedom. There is no joy in a prison. Why? Because there is no liberty. It is the same with a church. The mind is not free. Man must have freedom to doubt and deny as well as to believe and accept.

Purgatory is not a summer resort nor a winter retreat. It is neither a state nor a place; it is a lie, and one of the nastiest lies of Roman Catholicism. It is a lie to get people's money, a swindle, a cheat. It is an underground fraud. It looks as if every doctrine of Roman Catholicism was made for persons without sense, without intelligence. The doctrine of purgatory would not deceive a well-educated mule, and yet millions of Roman Catholic men and women swallow the humbug. It is time that this swindling scheme was ended and ended forever. If it cannot be abolished by education then abolish it by act of legislature.

Any priest who takes one dollar for "masses for the dead" should be prosecuted for getting money under false pretenses, and I believe that any judge in the United States would find him guilty.

The church should be compelled to do one of two things—prove the existence of purgatory or shut it up forever. There is no doubt that the shutters would be put up.

It exists only in the stupid faith of Roman Catholics.

L. K. W.

An Episcopal minister near New York came out in opposition to a concert for the benefit of the National Special Aid Society because it was to be held on Good Friday, and he raised the point that this was "putting patriotism ahead of Christianity." With him it is the church first and the country afterwards. We get a chance to judge of the loyalty of the church in such instances. There are Episcopal ministers, as well as Catholic priests in America, who need to be indoctrinated with the Religion of the United States.

GOD AND MY NEIGHBORS.

With Side Reference to Books Religious and Secular, Critical and Inspired.

I am disappointed because I cannot make the colporteur of sectarian religious books see that the book on which his creed is based is self-contradictory. But my sister says to me, "I am surprised that you would waste your time trying to demonstrate anything of the sort to anyone who is making his living out of the Bible."

In the preface to his translation of the New Testament, Dr. Moffatt speaks of the theory of verbal inspiration as having been given up. To be sure theologians have been compelled to lay aside that theory, but how do they manage to accept as the words of Jesus long discourses such as the one given in chapters xv and xvi of the fourth gospel? This must have been written long after the time of its supposed delivery. The memory of those who heard it could not be trusted to retain it and report it correctly. And to make the matter more difficult, we are told in the gospels that the "babes" of Jesus did not understand some of his sayings till long after they were uttered. One does not remember, as a rule, that which he does not comprehend.

It seems that whenever a certain statement was needed to clinch a point, some one recalled just the act or word of Jesus that would answer the purpose. The disciples of Pythagoras answered all objectors by saying, "The Master himself said so." This was no doubt the method used by the early Christians. So the so-called words of Jesus are full of irreconcilable contradictions, so many different speeches having been put into his mouth by different persons, each having some dogma to uphold or purpose to gain.

In "The Christ," Remsburg says that in John vii, 8-10, which in the authorized version reads, "Go ye up to this feast: I go not up yet unto this feast; for my time is not yet full come. When he had said these words unto them, he abode still in Galilee. But when his brethren were gone up, then went he also to the feast, not openly but as it were in secret," there is in the original no equivalent of the yet in the clause "I go not up yet unto this feast"; that in making the revised version the American translators wished to omit the interpolated adverb, but that the Oxford men would not suffer this!

In an attempt to verify Mr. Remsburg's statement, I consulted a Greek testament in which the Greek and the King James version are given in parallel columns, the volume being an output of the British and foreign Bible society. In it I found the Greek expression for not yet (houpo) in both clauses of the sentence, "I go not . . . full come."

Then I consulted a translation by James Moffatt, D.D., Litt. D., Yates professor of New Testament Greek in Mansfield College, Oxford. In this the passage reads: "Go up to the festival yourselves; I am not going up to this festival, for my time has not arrived yet." So saying, he stayed on in Galilee. But after his brothers had gone up to the festival, he went up too, not publicly but as it were privately.

The part of 1 Tim. ii, 11-15, relating to women and childbearing is rather puzzling. In the authorized version it reads as though woman, poor thing! if saved at all, is to be saved by making herself useful as a bearer of children. In the revised version the meaning is no more clearly expressed. Here there is another additional meaning suggested, that is, that woman may be saved by the office of Mary in bearing the Christ child. But this is not in harmony with the context. Dr. Moffatt renders the whole passage thus:

"A woman must listen quietly in church, and be perfectly submissive; I allow no woman to teach or dictate to men, she must keep quiet. For Adam was created first, then Eve; and Adam was not deceived, it was Eve who was deceived and who fell into sin. However, women will get safely through childbirth if they continue to be faithful and loving and holy as well as unassuming."

Though as translated in the A. V. or the R. V. the passage may have the meaning given in Dr. Moffatt's translation, in both the old translations the meaning is not clearly expressed. Of course, as it stands in Moffatt's version it is a bit of clerical fiction. Being faithful and loving and holy (whatever that may be) and unassuming do not get women safely through childbirth.

Dr. Moffatt omits Paul's advice to Timothy, regarding the use of wine. Says he: "The words,

'Give up being a total abstainer; take a little wine for the sake of your stomach and your frequent attacks of illness,' are either a marginal gloss or misplaced."

Tom's boy says, 'I can tell you how to dry off your cow. You just milk the milk out on the ground. That will dry her off in a hurry.'

"Dick," says I, "do you suppose it matters to the cow whether I milk her on the ground or in a bucket?"

"Well," says Dick, "poppy says that will dry up a cow."

I look at Tom. He blushes and says, "Dickie, we have to tell boys something to keep them from wasting the milk."

Tom's method is the popular one, especially in religion.

Little orphan Annie had gobble-uns that she used to make the children good. Two big black things got away with the little girl that made fun of every one.

There were some saucy children that laughed at a queer old crazy man, and two big bears got forty-two of them. (Sec. 2 Kings ii, 24.)

The deacon's wife says that God never sent those bears after those little children. God would not do so cruel a thing. It was the devil. The deacon's wife has the advantage of the ancient Hebrews. They had to lay everything to Jehovah, whereas she has a devil to lay all the mean things to.

But when I ask her if God is not supposed to have made the devil and to be letting him have his own way in the world and thus God is to blame after all, she says, "I can't talk with you; you get me all mixed up."

Some claim that Paul does not teach the resurrection of the body; they ground that claim upon several statements in what are supposed to be his writings.

But to me it is plain that Paul does teach the resurrection of the body, at least of a body. He is not clear as to how nearly the risen body will resemble the buried one. But he mentions certain differences. What is said in 1 Cor. xv, 51-53 seems to cast some light on Paul's ideas of the difference between the two bodies, the animate and the spiritual.

"Here is a secret truth for you: not all of us are to die, but all of us are to be changed—changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trumpet-call. The trumpet will sound, the dead will rise imperishable, and we shall be changed. For this perishing body must be invested with the imperishable, and this mortal body invested with immortality."

Martin Luther is quoted by Remsburg as saying, "St. James's epistle is truly an epistle of straw."

And I wonder if Martin's dislike of James arose from the fact that the apostle lays much stress upon the value of deeds as contrasted with faith. Luther's pet saying was, "The just shall live by faith." His theology rejected the doctrine of penance and extolled faith. Hence, he would not be pleased with the theology of James, which seems to be that of the early Christians. Luther was perhaps a Pauline Christian.

James was hard on the rich. Perhaps he wanted them to come across with the dough. Let me quote from Dr. Moffatt's translation:

"Come now, you rich men, weep and shriek over your impending miseries."

"You have been storing up treasure in the very last days; your wealth lies rotting and your clothes are moth-eaten; your gold and silver lie rusted over, and their rust will be evidence against you, it will devour your flesh like fire."

"See, the wages of which you have defrauded the workmen who mowed your fields call out, and the cries of the harvesters have reached the ears of the Lord of Hosts."

"You have reveled on earth and plunged into dissipation; you have fattened yourselves as for the day of slaughter; you have condemned, you have murdered the righteous, unresisting."

Then James, having threatened the rich with the Day of Wrath almost upon them, turns to console the "brothers" with the thought that the kingdom of God is at hand.

"Be patient, then, brothers, till the arrival of the Lord. See how the farmer waits for the precious crop of the land, biding his time patiently till he gets the autumn and spring rains; have patience yourselves, strengthen your hearts, for the arrival of the Lord is at hand. Do not murmur against one another, brothers, lest you are judged; look, the Judge is standing at the very door."

Bishop Edwin S. Lines of Newark, N. J., is quoted as denouncing the "influence wealthy parishioners are permitted to hold over a certain element of the church."

Bishop Lines may denounce, but that is all there will be to it unless he succeed in fooling a few. Wealth is power, and in an institution supported in most part by voluntary contributions, wealth is sure to control. To the church the soul of a rich man is worth more than the souls of many poor ones. And necessarily the clergy must be included in the "certain element" unduly influenced by the wealthy. He who controls my supply of bread and butter can do as he pleases with me.

Tommy says, "I have to be pretty careful with my apples. If I put one in my desk and it falls out on the floor, the teacher makes me give it to him, and I never see it again."

"What do you think he does with the apples, Tommy?" ask I. "Does he carry them home with him in his stomach or in his pocket?"

"I reckon," says the child.

No; Professor Felix is not an Infidel, not even a Socialist. He is a Sunday-school teacher.

Pete has a pretty sensible girl. She is working hard in school, but some of her geometry problems are too difficult for her to solve.

Her father says to her, "Why don't you take them to Mr. —? I'm sure he would help you gladly."

"Papa," answers the young student, "I think it best to keep pegging away at them myself. I hope to be able to study them out, and I do not like to be helped. Some of my classmates are always being helped by one or another. They show up pretty well in recitation, but on examination day they go to pieces. I want to develop power to do things unaided."

Dr. Conway tells in his autobiography an interesting bit concerning the elusive prophet of Nazareth. There is a fragment of the gospel to the Hebrews, quoted by someone whose name I do not recall, in which Jesus expresses himself very positively against sacrifice. And Dr. Conway's opinion is that, if he opposed sacrifice, the priests had a reason for wanting to put him to death, as any vigorous opposition to sacrifice endangered their business.

Reading in Dr. Moffatt's translation the Sermon on the Mount, I was struck by the words, "I desire mercy and not sacrifice." And there is the story of the scourging in the temple which is understood by some biblical scholars as relating to a probable attempt to drive out of the temple animals brought thither to be sacrificed. Some of the Hebrew prophets seems to have revolted at the bloody and senseless rite, to have discovered that good behavior is man's most acceptable offering to God. And the Essenes are said to have believed that Jehovah preferred flattery to sacrifice. Dr. Conway says: "Buddha, who rejected gods, after his death was made a god. Jesus, who condemned sacrifice, was after his death made the great sacrifice."

This theory presents the man Jesus in an attractive role, that of one whose humanity revolted at the cruelty and absurdity of worship by slaughter. ROBINSON CRUSOE.

Avoid Credulity.

The word "credulity" is derived from a Latin word "credo," "I believe." As used in modern English, the word credulity means the disposition to believe a thing is true without sufficient evidence. Or, in other words, a credulous person is one who believes a thing is true without having a good cause for believing it to be true.

From the earliest records of the times when men first began to think, there has always been a belief that every effect must have a cause. It was this idea that has made all human progress possible. Now, credulous people believe in cause and effect, but they mistake the cause by letting some other person tell them the cause.

Superstition is the result or effect of credulity. Everything that perplexes and puzzles the thoughts of men was thought to have had a design. The priest or holy men of all ages have claimed that their idol or god was the cause and director of the things that they could not understand. Instead of demanding the proof for the claims of the priest or saints, the credulous people believed to be true whatever was told them as truth.

When a person got sick, the priest said that a god, a demon or spirit was the cause of the sickness, and that to get well the afflicted person must say prayers and make sacrifices for having offended the god by some improper word or deed. The credulous people believed all the priests told them, and the result was that the priests put the world under their power and control. For hundreds of years, it was a crime punishable with death to dispute or disbelieve the words of a priest or preacher.

When a storm, volcano, flood or any other terrific event occurred, the priest would tell the people that some god sent the fearful event as a punishment for the evil deeds or words of some one. The only way to get the offended god in a pleasant humor was to pay the priest to pray for the forgiveness of the offending person. The priest told the people the only way to escape disaster was to pay him (the priest) to pray to a god not to send the dreaded afflictions. The credulous people believed what the priest told them. The priest got rich by following his trade of praying for so much money a prayer, for all the people would buy prayers, thinking they would benefit them by preventing any dreaded calamity.

Tyrannous kings held power by the support of credulous people. The king would tell the people that a god sent him to rule them. The credulous people would believe the king and the king then had power to do anything that suited his desires with the property and lives of the people.

The king and the priest went into a copartnership. The king was owner of the people's bodies and the priest was owner of their souls. If one disobeyed the king, the priest threatened to cause the soul to be sent to a fiery hell and eternally burned. This would frighten the offender and cause him to obey the king. If a person should disobey the priest, the king would have his soldiers punish the body of the person and the person would be forced to obey the king or be killed. Thus was the human race made slaves by kings and priests by credulity, one of the worst qualities of the human mind.

The greatest foes to Progress are Ignorance and Credulity. If there is one fault that should be avoided with more care than another, I believe that fault is credulity.

JOHN M. MORRIS.

A Culprit Confesses.

The great world war was over. A Hague conference had convened, at which all of the important nations were represented. Despite failure of previous conferences, it was expected that real work would be done to bring about world peace. In order to do such effective work, however, it was first necessary to learn the cause and locate the responsibility of the war just closed.

Each participating nation was to be put on trial before the world tribunal. Each was separately indicted, and the indictment was in two counts. The first charged direct and malicious causation of the war; the second, negligence in not endeavoring to prevent it.

The trial began with the customary interrogatory put to the defendants, "Are you guilty or not guilty as charged in the indictment?" One by one representatives of the defendant nations answered "Not Guilty." The trial proceeded and one by one they offered evidence in support of their pleading. Witnesses testified, documents were introduced, and conditions leading up to the war were reviewed, all tending to exonerate each defendant. Verbatim statements of the several contending rulers, introduced in evidence, were clear and unmistakable in their expressions that war was undesired and peace fervently prayed for.

As the chances for fastening the guilt on one or more of the accused slipped away, the members of the tribunal became greatly worried. Eagerly they grasped the slightest discrepancy in the testimony of witnesses while the genuineness of official records was questioned, but all without fruitful results. The trial was closing, and it was clear that each defendant had established a clear defense and that the verdict of the tribunal must be "Not Guilty." But this meant disaster, and the darkest gloom was settling on the faces of the advocates of peace as they saw their last and supreme efforts doomed to the scrap-heap of previous futile plans.

In this moment of intense feeling the huge mahogany door of the tribunal chamber was pushed open and the upturned eyes of the world's diplomats beheld the entrance of a most unusual figure. The newcomer was tall, yet solidly built, and dressed in a garb most quaint in style and pattern. His countenance wore an expression of mingled mockery and humor. He walked down the center aisle of the chamber, directly in front of the tribunal, before casting a glance in any direction. His figure and manner secured attention and his audacity in so unceremoniously interrupting this august assemblage commanded respect. After assuring himself by a slow and comprehensive glance around the chamber that all were ready to hear him, and with the cynical smile playing even more noticeably around his lips, he began to speak:

"Gentlemen, the masquerade is over. I have deceived you long enough. Long repeated winning with marked cards has grown dull. I am familiar with proceedings here and with the charges in your indictment. I come to answer to that indictment and to both counts I plead 'Guilty.'"

Bewilderment was now the expression on every face. The situation was preposterous. The stranger would have been seized immediately as an insane crank had it not been that his manner and address so awed the assemblage that they were afraid to start anything. Meanwhile he seemed to enjoy their perplexity, and looked cynically and mockingly about. Finally the chief of the tribunal found his voice, and with a forced effort at harshness demanded, "Who are you?"

"Ah," smiled the visitor, "you do not recognize me, yet for long you have claimed my intimate acquaintance. I am God, the anthropomorphic god of the Christians. I am the personage to whom you and your fathers and your father's fathers have bowed your knees in submission; before whom you have clasped your hands in helplessness and closed your eyes in ignorance. It is I who am the cause not only of war, but of all human misery. I am the first and proximate cause, for origins of everything spring from me. Is this not your philosophy, gentlemen? Clearly, then, I am guilty as charged in the first count of your indictment. Furthermore, I and I alone could have prevented this war. You have all asked me to interfere, each in his own behalf, but I chose to let you wear yourselves to depletion. Does not the religion of each nation here represented recognize that I alone can prevent any and all human injustices? I stand, therefore, guilty as charged in the second count of your indictment.

"Now, gentlemen," he continued, "do with me what you will. I am nauseated from dealing with you. I have laughed at your follies in permitting my outrages all these centuries. My game was to see how long I could deceive and outwit you, but the end seems so far off that I am tired of it and wish to be rid of you and your servile flattery. You were ready to disband and for another thousand years consider peace a dream. You would never have located the guilt had I not chosen to disclose myself. This is my last derisive laugh at your expense.

"I plead guilty and ask that you put me to rest beside the gods of antiquity. I plead guilty, but I charge you with greater guilt. Your crime consists in not long ago casting me upon the scrap-heap of mischievous and useless deities.

"I have only enough interest in you to offer one suggestion. Now that you are rid of gods, arise from your knees and be men. The power lies within you; the resources are at hand. Fashion the world into a joyful, happy heaven, and let me rest."

HARRY HARRINGTON.

Transmission of Intelligence.

Charles Henry DeLacey has come to the front in these columns with another chapter of the old, old story that seeks to prove the truth of religion by appealing to what we do not know. The existence of phenomena that science could not explain has ever been the opportunity of the religionist, every kind of him, from the vender of charms and the worker of miracles for lucre, to the most spiritual minded who put their trust in a God of love and righteousness. Every one of them stands on the same ground with the primal savage who knew that a spirit dwelt in the rocky cliff that gave back his words because the plain view made it evident that no material agency was there to speak the words, yet the echo came back.

The constancy of the phenomenon gave the answering spirit a claim to consideration above that of the modern spirit which does not respond except to certain persons, and not to them unless conditions are "right." Naturally the nymph or goddess Echo became the best attested member of the mythologic assembly. Her claims to existence could be proven by any one at any time. If Mr. DeLacey and his colleagues would or could bring such a uniformity of evidence to support their claims it would be unnecessary to label Sir Oliver Lodge "a world authority in physical science" (to whom?) and announce that he has electrified the thinking world by declaring that he has absolute proof that his son, killed in battle, still lives in the spirit world. Some who have read Sir Oliver are of the opinion that the public he has electrified is rather the non-thinking part of it, that which inclines instead to credulous belief.

Just as the spirit Echo died a natural death when the nature of sound was discovered, or rather that the belief in her existence had always been a mistake, so the whole advance of science—the conclusions of the whole world so far as it is based on experiment and investigation—has been the death of the personality or powers of the once immortal gods. Their supposed existence was due to man's attempt to explain what he did not understand. Whatever man could see a reason for needed no god to explain. When he encountered a thing that puzzled him he invented a god with whatever power was necessary to account for the mystery. The gods long since ceased to roll the sun and stars through the sky; few of us send for a sky-pilot rather than a doctor when sick. Should the kaiser prove mortal the godly firm of war makers of which he is junior (or is it senior?) member is likely to give up business. Religion has little on its hands in these latter days except the care of the churches and spirit seances. These are practically one so far as science is concerned, for they alike seek to explain phenomena by postulating a spirit agency outside of matter—which is not even a variant from the exploded theory of the echo.

The problems that the spiritists explain are no more mysterious to us than the echo was to the ancients. Perhaps far less so. The development and transmission of intelligence depends on the quality of brain and nerve tissue—unless we accept the religious doctrine that "all is mind," in which case it becomes hard to see the sense of cumbering it with material hindrances. Spiritists base their claims largely on the transference of intelligence without using the usual channels. Ordinarily the idea is telegraphed from the brain to the vocal organ, which causes vibrations of air, the quality of which conveys the message to the listener's ear, which turns it again into a telegram that reaches the brain. The transference of thought from brain to brain without using all this cumbersome machinery of talking seems but a matter of the further development of brain power, the taking of another step in the process of evolution. Is there anything more mysterious or improbable in the brain's developing the power to send and receive intelligence "by wireless" than that it should develop the power to think at all?

The evidence on which spiritists base their claims stands analyzing no better than that presented as inspired truth. It is not that Materialists are hostile to a continued existence. They share the universal love of life. "Show us the father [or any other spirit], and it sufficeth us," but do not expect to catch old birds with chaff. A few whiffs of opium smoke will make the brain see wonderful things. Alcohol produces a variety of effects on it. The range of effects that can be produced on it by different drugs, different environment, different emotions, is unknown. What the love of Sir Oliver for his son may lead his brain to conceive is beyond me. It has long been known that though the senses are our only source of knowledge, their testimony must be subjected to the most searching tests. Jugglers and sleight-of-hand performers are said to duplicate the achievements of test mediums.

The exponents of spiritism are greatly at variance among themselves. Until they agree upon the essentials of the unseen world, it is not fair for them to insist on the acceptance of their conflicting testimony. Until they can give us a foundation better than that on which once stood the whole tribe of gods, devils and spooks now happily vanished, I for one feel bound by the evidence presented to accept the materialistic theory that matter, with its wonderful properties and intricate relations, is sufficient to account for all phenomena.

O. J. GIBBONS.

Los Angeles Liberals.

On March 25 the Los Angeles Liberal Club closed its doors until the first Sunday in October, Mr. Charles T. Sprading preaching his last "sermon" for awhile, the subject being "Liberty," especially considering the recent bloodless Russian revolution.

As your correspondent has attended every meeting of this six months' course I will say that there was a larger audience this last night (March 25) than at the first lecture.

"Liberty and the Russian Revolution" was a popular topic, and Mr. Sprading ably handled his subject, selling a number of his books, "Liberty and the Libertarians" in connection therewith. He showed that so far as liberty is concerned the Russian revolutionaries are further advanced in their ideals than the German Socialist authoritarians. This was due to the teachings of Michael Bakunin, Peter Kropotkin and Leo Tolstoy.

Looking backward we find that on March 18 Mr. Sprading gave the Spiritualists a run for their money, as his subject was "Does Death End All?" While he agreed that many scientists, such as Camille Flammarion, Cesare Lombroso, Sir Oliver Lodge, etc., accepted the hypothesis of the Spiritualists, there were other just as great and noted scientists who after a sufficient investigation had considered that the evidence was not conclusive as to believing man lived after death of the physical body.

To my mind, however, the best of the March lectures was that on "Charles Bradlaugh," delivered March 11. This was a biographical lecture, showing the evolution of a spirit desiring freedom and the struggle of genius to make itself manifest against a conventional and conservative society. He showed how Mr. Bradlaugh struggled for many years against poverty, disease and bad conditions in order to make his message heard, and that just as he was on the eve of his greatest success the body disintegrated and the man died. This is one of the ironies of fate with many of our really great men.

One of the features of the last few months which I have heretofore failed to mention is the sweet singing of Margaret Tate, who has given us much musical entertainment in this way.

In conclusion, let me say in commenting on Mr. Sprading as a lecturer, that while not the orator that Wm. Jennings Bryan is he is a clearer and more logical speaker; but strange as it may seem, the world has more orators than logicians in the lecture field.

JOHN A. MORRIS.

A Scriptural Study.

"He which testifieth these things saith, Surely I come quickly; Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus" (Rev. xxii, 10).

There are millions today in this attitude of expectancy; some with dread, others with rejoicing; some abjectly hopeless of obtaining the desired goal, others feeling sure of being accepted. These latter, having presented themselves "a living sacrifice" for their Master's use, are filled with a holy joy at being thoroughly consecrated; and, being above the power of sin to harm, they cry with John, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

What is it that has been delayed so long? What is it these millions are looking forward to with rejoicing and dread? It is the consummated Christ—he that is to come with healing in his wings; to put down death and sin; to wipe away all tears; to bring everlasting peace and joy—so they have been led to think and believe.

Jesus is to be the head. His consecrated following (his church) is to be his body (Col. i, 18). This body was a premeditated scheme, for does not Jesus say, "A body thou hast prepared for me"? (Heb. x, 5); and, as no one can come to Jesus "except the Father draws them" (John vi, 44), the formation of this body is entirely in his hands. This body is to be composed of a limited number, 144,000 (Rev. vii, 4; xiv, 1-3). Its members must all be virgins (Rev. xiv, 4). God, in choosing only virgins, seems to have forgotten his injunction of "increase and multiply"; and, again, "It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him an helpmeet for him," and has repudiated the inspired words of Paul in Eph. v, 25-30. The parents of these members of the body, not being virgins, would have no part or parcel with it. This precludes the idea of families being united in heaven. This body will be composed entirely of spinsters and bachelors. Having missed their chance of nuptial bliss while on earth, it will be denied them in heaven (Matt. xxii, 30). A great many we know with a more-holier-than-thou expression that hope to be members of this body have wives and children; but according to this immutable edict of Jehovah they will be locked out in the cold—or heat, as the case may be—notwithstanding their hopes and beliefs.

The members of this body have all presented their bodies as living sacrifices to God (Rom. xii, 1), to do with as he chooses. Have they considered well what that means? Sin has broken loose once, even in heaven. It may break out, possibly it has broken out on all other celestial bodies. If so, Jehovah may require these consecrated ones to keep their pledge; to perform the part of Jesus on earth; to die for the sins of those upon these various orbs. Probably, in their selfish desire to be saved, they never gave this aspect of the case a thought.

There is another use for this consummated Christ which I believe has been generally overlooked. In John i, 51, we read this, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, ye shall see the heaven opened, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the son of man." As this was spoken in the future tense, it did not refer to Jesus but to the perfected Christ. This simply makes of Christ and his body a ladder; a connecting link for the angels to travel on, something like the ladder Jacob saw in his dream. In all probability, the feet of this Christ will rest in hell, while the head takes in the scenery of heaven. This is no supposition on our part, for are we not told, "It [Christ] is as high as heaven; deeper than hell" (Job. xi, 8); and again: "Whither shall I go from thy spirit? If I ascend up into heaven thou art there; if I make

MR. SATAN speaking: Delighted to see you, Billy. Welcome to our city. You are a man after my own heart. We understand each other. The People are the prey. They are the suckers. my bed in hell, behold, thou art there" (Psa. cxxxix, 8). God knew, before the foundation of the earth, that those he had made perfect in the beginning would fall so low in sin that they would not believe his teachings, "even though one [Jesus] rose from the dead" (Luke xvi, 30). He has, in his infinite mercy, provided a way of escape in spite of them, for, are we not told in Isa. xxviii, 18, "Your covenant with death shall be disannulled, and your agreement with hell shall not stand. So when you wake up in hell and are assured it to be a fact your doubts will vanish and you will want to depart" (Prov. xv, 24). Under these circumstances, all you will have to do will be to cry out, by reason of your affliction, from the belly of hell and he will hear you (Jonah ii, 2). The rest is easy. Get in line with the angels of God and climb up the body of the consummated Christ to heaven (Amos ix, 2). Then sit ye down and sing with David, "Thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest hell" (Psa. lxxxvi, 13). V. SPRAGUE.

The challenge of W. J. Bryan to Atheists to produce "a better book than the Bible," is still in circulation. It comes to us now in a copy of the Signs of the Times from a reader in the state of Washington. The challenge is several years old, and at the time it was made Mr. Bryan received a number of acceptances from Rationalists, including M. M. Mangasarian of Chicago. But he did not make his bluff good; he never intended to, although he must have been strongly tempted to try it when the Free-thinkers of Los Angeles offered him $5,000 to meet one of them in debate. A better book for priests to use in befuddling the human intellect and making fools, fanatics and lunatics could hardly be compiled offhand; but for the useful instruction to be got for its pages we long since expressed our preference for a variety of works, including a last year's Almanac.

Nineteen religious denominations were found to be represented among the 127 inmates of the Reformatory at Ionia, Mich., and only three men admitted no church connection. The investigation was made last fall by the Pathfinders' Club, and reported in the Detroit Journal. Connection with a church is not the same thing as connection with moral conduct and a law-abiding life.

Christians do not want freedom of thought. They pray for freedom from thought.

NOTES AT LARGE.

The Roman Catholic church is always much alive in the discovery of new means for the dissemination of its peculiar doctrines. A series of motion pictures dealing with Catholicism, the scenarios of which are to be written by Catholic prelates, will soon be manufactured and released under the direction of the church. The object of the films, it is announced, is "to spread Christian truth." The first production, to be called "A Dream of Empire," will deal with the times of Napoleon and Pope Pius VII. It has been prepared by the Right Rev. J. C. Anderson, auxiliary bishop of Boston. The second picture, in eight reels, will be the work of the Right Rev. F. O. Kelley, a Monsignor and Catholic author. This film will be entitled "Christianity." The entire series is to be known as "Catholic Truth Films." If the right to present religion in this way is conceded to that church, a similar privilege should be granted to others to present the reverse of the picture—the Spanish Inquisition, the persecution of the Albigenses, or that memorable eve of St. Bartholomew's day. If sixty millions of people in the United States believe and are willing to declare that Roman Catholicism is false, root and branch, why should not this great majority enjoy the same opportunities for expressing its opinion publicly as is accorded everywhere to the members of the papal institution? If a false religion may not be opposed, then it ought never to be preached. Roman Catholics demand the right to speak in public against all other types of religion opposed to their own, but will not allow in a single instance—if they can prevent it—any person to denounce their religion. The fault of such an unreasonable situation rests not alone with the members of the church, but with that large body of political grafters and time servers with whom America is crowded, who, in spite of a hypocritical respect for religion, which they ostentatiously parade at times, are really afraid that their own positions will suffer injury if they do not, as a matter of policy, protect the activities of Romanism, which has so many ways of striking back at them. No country can be considered free where its citizens are prevented from denouncing any form of injustice and wrong whether appearing under the guise of religion or of politics. Many men are still easily scared with the notion that there is something sacred about religion. They still have a latent fear that the church has power to injure their prospects in the future world; hence the caution and temerity with which they move when the case involves activity on the part of a religious denomination. There is nothing sacred about religion. When all men deeply realize this fact, then will the battle between reason and superstition be waged in earnest.

Not unexpected news, printed in the New York World under the head, "A Flock of Saloons Waits Revival Throng," is contained in the following:

"Of course the Billy Sunday revival and its attendant crowds MAY not have anything to do with it—BUT—every Harlemite who uses the One Hundred and Sixty-eighth street subway station smiles knowingly as he or she sees saloon proprietors of that neighborhood preparing for action. No store space adapted to saloon or cafe uses, with a long list of saloon keepers as past tenants, can stay vacant for months and then burst into bloom just in time to quench the thirst of the Sunday followers without being noticed a little bit.

"Goldberg and Gersten, at No. 1116 St. Nicholas avenue, for instance. Any inhabitant of those parts will tell you how long that place was in darkness. About three months ago, however, about the time the tabernacle began to be talked about a LOT, very encouraging activities began to gladden the hearts of the observing Harlemites.

"L. Arcomona, whose cafe at No. 1166 St. Nicholas avenue has been open but a few days, just moved from No. 1110 on the same street, so that he is not a newcomer, but—he has prepared for the crowd he hopes to catch on the way TO the meetings for four bartenders, when heretofore he has never needed more than two.

"John Burns, who has taken the place just vacated by Arcomona, is the newest arrival, and he is starting out with every confidence in the next few weeks."

As this corresponds with what was reported from Paterson when the revivalist played his engagement in that city, there is reason for believing the inference true that the saloons are mobilizing to meet the revival crowd. For it is to be understood that the revival is a show, a fair, a bazar, a circus. At one place where it made a six weeks' stand an earnest Christian arose and in a loud voice characterized it as a music hall. He was arrested for disturbing a religious meeting, but the charge did not stick. When the crowd ceased swarming about the Paterson tabernacle, several saloons closed their doors. The promoters of the revival claimed it as a result of Billy's attack upon booze, but the proprietors of the saloons pointed out that their licenses had expired and they were about to shut down anyway. The same thing happens where these revival crowds congregate that occur wherever there is a swarming of the multitude, at a political convention or religious conference. There is a spree on the side, and the excitement engendered by the occasion may lead from the hall or tabernacle to the movies, to the saloon, or to the disorderly house. Migratory women will be found, but perhaps not reported upon as the saloons are, in the same vicinity.

The perennial Bible-in-the-schools bill is before the legislature of Minnesota, being championed by no less a personage than Dr. George E. Vincent, president of the State University. As quoted by the Minneapolis Tribune, Dr. Vincent offered three reasons for holding that the bill represents "a reasonable and wise public policy."

"First, the Bible has permeated our literature; it is a literary asset of very great value.

"Second, our whole moral system is inexorably bound up in and a part of the Bible.

"Third, with the stress placed on material things in this day we must strive to keep alive the spiritual interpretation of life, no matter whether in the terms of one religious denomination or another."

The value of the Bible as a literary asset has been acknowledged by men who would reject it as the foundation of a moral system. It can be quoted to sanction a score of vices and crimes, and that number includes about all the vices and crimes anyone is likely to practice or commit. But as a literary asset it would still be with us even if excluded from the schools, where its coarseness and barbarity are likely to do the most injury and its literary value to be least appreciated. Most persons' school days are over before the beauties of literature have begun to appeal to them. Better leave such of those beauties as the Bible contains to be discovered in maturer years. Neither do school children get hold of any "spiritual interpretation of life" from the Bible or any other book or teaching. They are taught to believe a quantity of myth and fable, the imposing of which on immature minds is a gross injustice to them. The Bible may be introduced with propriety in college to students who are taking the course in comparative religions and mythology; its obscenities should bar it from a place among the fairy tales of children, and therefore from the schools, even were there not also the objection that its use involves the state in religious teaching which is not the secular function. There is reason always to suspect the candor of men like Dr. Vincent who commend the Bible as a text-book for the benefit of the pupils. Their object is less to promote the education of the young than to keep the Bible to the front and prevent it from being retired to the shelves where other "literary assets" are preserved. The pupils do not need the Bible; the Bible needs the pupils to save it from the obscurity it cannot escape with only its merits to preserve it.

The police are not always responsive to the demand of bigotry that free speech be suppressed. The other evening a young man was talking and selling liberal literature at an uptown corner, when a religious woman summoned a police officer and asked that he be placed under arrest for insulting her religion. After listening to the speaker and finding no fault in him, the officer refused to act. The woman then telephoned to police headquarters the falsehood that a speaker against religion was creating a vast disturbance of public order, and succeeded in getting two officers and a sergeant rushed to the spot. These hung about for some twenty minutes taking in the lecture, and then advised the woman that if the talk did not suit her she would do well to go home, as the speaker was wholly within his rights and no disturbance appeared to have occurred. Some of the guardians of the peace are perhaps becoming acquainted with the truth that liberty is the mother of order.

But there are other and less hopeful events. The authorities higher up appear to be in fear of the consequences of free speech on the safety of the realm, as they call it in England. On April 4 a non-resistant named Deutsch was addressing a gathering in Madison square and expounding from his Bible the peace doctrines of Jesus which he had marked for reference. He is one who calls himself a Christian and is opposed to the Secular speakers. Because he was inveighing against war, and perhaps because of his Teutonic name, he was taken off his soap-box by a police officer. As there had been no disturbance, and as Deutsch had committed no offense further than to express his views as a Christian who took the words of Jesus as his guide, Mr. Irving Meiowitz, a Secularist and an enthusiastic defender of the rights of all to be heard, mounted the vacated stand with the remark, "I have got up here to vindicate the right of free speech and to protest against its violation by the arrest of Mr. Deutsch." Thereupon he also was taken into custody and locked up. On the following day he and Deutsch were fined $10 each on a charge of obstructing traffic, although that was not the cause of their arrest, and the court refused to have the matter of free speech introduced or the right pleaded in defense. Is there not something fetid in the judicial atmosphere when in a professedly Christian country a Freethinker may be arrested and fined for defending the right of a Christian to expound the teachings of Jesus?

We should never know how much liberalism there is among school teachers except for the complaints of the preachers. The Rev. Edward J. Bond, a Methodist minister of Pottstown, Pa., in a protest against unbelief being taught in the schools, contributes two instances, which we quote from the Sunday Visitor:

"Some time ago a student of our high school came to me and said:

"'Mr. Bond, is there a hell?'

"'Certainly,' I replied.

"'Said the student: 'My teacher at school says: "I don't believe in a hell and no one can make me believe there is. Of course, this is just my own opinion."'

"'Another instance of the same kind of harmful teaching came to my personal notice. I was instructing a young person from our high school preparatory to his being received into the church, and stated the principles of Methodist polity and the necessity of belief in the scriptures.

"'What do you mean by belief in the scriptures?' said the student. 'Does that mean believing the story of Moses, the flood, Noah, Jonah and all that? Why, our history professor said they are only myths.'"

The teachers must find it easier to dismiss Noah and Jonah as myths than to advance any convincing reason why the pupils should take them as historical.

When a Roman Catholic exchange avers that it has "consistently opposed and denounced the practice of teachers' agencies requiring applicants seeking appointments to state their religious beliefs," we can testify to the truth of the statement; but we are still inquiring why Catholic schools do not begin the reform by themselves abandoning the practice. The Catholic pulpit is everlastingly inveighing against our colleges because the professors are "Atheists" or non-Christian men. They are not satisfied in censoring the religion of their own teachers, but would dictate the belief of those in secular schools. There are said to be public schools in New York where a teacher cannot get or hold a position unless a Catholic. Perhaps the idea of our Catholic contemporary is to abolish the test in Protestant communities to facilitate the placing of Catholic teachers who would not be wanted were their religion known.

President Wilson's war address to Congress, having stated that "the day is come when America is privileged to spend her blood and her might for the principles that gave her birth," closes with the words, "God helping her, she can do no other." So our President owes his theological peroration to a distinguished German, to wit, Martin Luther, who, having decided to stand for safety first, exclaimed, "Gott mein Hielf; ich kann kein anderer." In the news of even date we observe that Emperor William, in a letter to Imperial Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg, winds up with the phrase, "God is with us." If God is with Germany he is not going to help America, and we should be better pleased if Mr. Wilson had omitted the invocation, or at least called upon some other deity than the old German Gott, who is now in partnership with the heathen Allah. A God is known by the company he keeps. All this flubdub looks alike to us, but if the President must have a theological ending, what is the matter with "the considerate judgment of mankind and the gracious favor of Almighty God," which at least is a native product? Did he want Germany to feel like the eagle on discovering that the shaft that had pierced him was tipped with a feather from his own tail?

In kindness, we assume, the following was written:

"PORTLAND, N. Y., March 26, 1917.

"G. E. MACDONALD—Dear Sir: I am writing you a message to warn you of your condition, concerning your welfare pertaining to the Living God, your creator. You are to face him and to give an account of the deeds done in the body. You are to face a just God. These words are to be spoken on the Day of Judgment. I am warning you for your welfare."

"ROBERT WEAGRAFF, Box 146.

"P. S. You can use my name if you wish.—R. W."

What is it supposed that men have to fear from a just God, provided the "deeds done in the body" compare favorably with those he is himself responsible for? Mr. Weagraff's warning finds us and leaves us undisturbed; and if the judgment day comes around, as foretold, we shall take advantage of his permission to use his name. Mr. Weagraff will at least have to concede that we treat his communication respectfully and soberly when the temptation to do otherwise is strong.

Mr. Robert Fitzsimmons, once the world's champion pugilist, who in his youth missed the ministry because of his love for athletics, was duly baptized into the Baptist ring in Los Angeles, Cal., last month by the Rev. J. Whitcomb Brougher, pastor of a church of that city. Mr. Fitzsimmons will become a soul-saver. He says:

"I feel that I can do a great amount of good or I would not enter evangelism. I am studying the Bible 'between acts,' you might say, and when I start after converts I'm going to try just as hard as I ever did in my championship battles."

The pugilist has seen the opening that evangelism offers to persons who have made themselves famous or notorious in some other calling, particularly persons of the underworld. It seems more in keeping that a pugilistic has-been should open a saloon, but perhaps evangelism is just as appropriate. We never heard of an ex-pugilist like Fitzsimmons, an ex-ballplayer like Sunday, or an ex-outlaw like Al Jennings taking the Freethought platform.

The will of John H. Ludwig, filed last week in the surrogate's office of The Bronx, this city, included among its bequests $25,000 to the Thomas Paine National Historical Association for the erection and maintenance of a home for needy members of the Society. It also gives $15,000 to the Rand School (Socialist), $5,000 to the Socialist morning paper, the Call, and $10,000 to blind soldiers of Germany. In religion Mr. Ludwig was nominally a Lutheran, but he associated with Liberals.

A few years ago the trustees of a public library in a large Western city refused to accept THE TRUTH SEEKER as a gift and place it on file. The refusal proved temporary, however, and later the paper was taken in. Recently we have been refreshed by receiving orders from the librarian for a number of the books we publish or advertise and sell. So the thought of men are widened with the process of the suns.

OBJECTS.

It is the object of THE TRUTH SEEKER to educate the people out of religious superstition. It denies the inspiration and infallibility of the Bible, and asserts the human origin of that book. It denies the existence of the theological heaven and hell, but as to the existence and immortality of the soul neither affirms nor denies. It waits for evidence.

THE TRUTH SEEKER upholds the theory of Evolution, believing that to be the solution of the question of the origin, growth, and development of the animal kingdom, including man. THE TRUTH SEEKER believes that the answer to the questions Whence? and Whither? can be given only by Science.

THE TRUTH SEEKER holds that morality and ethics—or man's relation to man—are entirely independent of creed or religion, and are founded on rules developed by experience.

In current politics THE TRUTH SEEKER takes no side or part. In general it holds to the principles of freedom enunciated by the Founders of the Republic.

THE TRUTH SEEKER believes in Free Speech, Free Press, and Free Mails; in full discussion of all sides of all subjects, and affords those having new and worthy thoughts, clearly stated, a generous and welcome hearing, each contributor being responsible for his own opinion. We neither indorse an idea by printing it, nor condemn it by exclusion.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is the recognized medium of communication between the Liberals of the country, and is edited each week for their information, instruction, entertainment, and support against religious error and mental slavery and in maintenance of their equal civil and religious rights as citizens of the United States.

The Editor invites communications on the subjects to which these pages are devoted.

POLITICAL PRINCIPLES.

(THE NINE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.)

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in the Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privileges or advantages shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

THE REV. THOMAS COAKLEY.

From L. F. W., Pennsylvania.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

The Sunday Visitor, a rabid sheet published by the notorious Father Noll of Huntington, Indiana, has for a regular contributor, one Rev. Thomas Coakley, who is one of the smoothest products of the Jesuit school of sophistry. Nearly every issue of the journal of misinformation mentioned, if not all of them, contains an article by "Papa Tom" that is well calculated to add to the cultivated lethargy of those already lulled into profound mental slumber by the priests of Rome. Some of his utterances are surely gems when it comes to expressing damnable fiction in such a manner that his dupes will accept it as unquestionable truth.

In the issue of that paper for January 28 of the present year are some rare jewels of thought that fairly scintillate rays of light, in the Roman Catholic sense. Just listen to this profound utterance:

"The rule that applies to natural truths, applies also to truths of the supernatural order." Natural truths are those that can be demonstrated by some process, while nothing that can be dubbed supernatural is capable of demonstration. It must be taken on "faith," and faith proves nothing—except the credulity of millions who are led into curious mental conditions by doctors of sophistry like Father Coakley.

"There is no more difficulty in believing the truths of religion than there is in believing the facts of everyday life." Facts are things that do not need to be proven. Religions are all matters of faith. All religions are bolstered up by certain moral precepts that came from human experience, not from any supernatural phenomena. In fact no religion has ever produced a morality. On the other hand the most immoral practices have originated through the instrumentality of the priesthood of some one or another brand of religion. Here is another sparkler.

"It requires a greater act of faith to be shaved in a barber shop than it does to believe in the Blessed Trinity."

Now will you believe that three times one is one, you dullards?

A barber is known to understand his business, at least if he does not he does not continue business long. Not one man in ten thousand ever thinks of the barber's trade as a matter of faith; it is solely a business transaction that relies on the dexterity of the barber and his knowledge of the angles at which a razor must be held. Accidents resulting from incapacity in a barber shop are so rare that it requires no faith for a man to submit himself to the hands of an experienced barber. It requires ignorance and credulity to believe that a man can be his own father, his own son and a ghost at the same time. No man has ever seen a god nor a ghost, and as for a combination of father, son and ghost, we'll leave belief in such an impossibility to the class of beings upon whom the Father Tom class rely for an easy living without work. The next brilliant thought follows:

"It requires a greater act of faith to submit to a surgical operation than it does to believe in the Last Judgment."

To be sure one must have faith in the education and skill of a surgeon to rely on his being able to save one from disability or death by an operation. But we have the knowledge that others have submitted to the same ordeal and have been saved from disaster by it. As for the Last Judgment, a really intelligent person who uses his reasoning powers cannot but see the absurdity of such a doctrine. When we realize that no man can for one moment imagine the countless quintillions of human beings who have lived and died during the millions of years human life has existed on this planet, and that one cannot pick up a handful of earth that does not contain particles of what at some period formed parts of many men, we can understand the impossibility of a resurrection of the body. No god has the power to reassemble the elements that once constituted one human body, leaving the myriad quintillions out of consideration. The priest deludes each postulant into believing that he is of vast importance in the universe, when in reality it is not so.

Through natural processes we come into existence; we live our little span of life and then we go back into the soil; and no amount of talk by a priest can prove otherwise. Bodies interred in what the priest designates as consecrated ground go through the same process of disintegration that is the fate of all other bodies. Only the chemical transformation called petrification can hold the body in its form or outline, and even petrifications rot in time. As for the soul, or spirit escaping into space to live on indefinitely, no matter what you believe, there is absolutely no tangible proof of the assumption. Listen to the next claim of Father Tom.

"It requires a greater act of faith to make an ocean voyage than to believe in the Infallibility of the Pope."

In this statement I cannot agree with "Papa Tom" at all. It is not alone faith that admits of our taking an ocean voyage, for knowledge has something to do with it. We know that ships have been made by competent and honest builders that have made many voyages and returned to the home port in safety. We also know that there is always an element of risk in a trip on the ocean or on any body of water, as well as on land. Faith will not save any one at any time when adverse natural forces take a part in the proceedings. To believe in the infallibility of the Pope or any other man requires faith that is not justified by historical facts. Because a priest has been elected to the head of a religio-political system by an aggregation of priests does not make him infallible. No man is infallible, and the Pope is only a man notwithstanding his election. There has not been a Pope of the Roman Catholic church who has proven by his acts and pronouncements that he is a whit different from any other man, except that he has been more wily, crafty and unscrupulous than the ordinary individual. Many doctrines promulgated by popes have been anything but divine. The history of the Roman Catholic church for a thousand years is a continuous record of heartless, inhuman atrocities. The Popes proved themselves infallible foes to human progress. They could always be relied upon to antagonize scientific research and invention—unless it were new machines and methods for the torture of those who dared to think independently of the church.

"We have more of a guarantee that the Holy Eucharist is the Body and Blood of Christ than we have that the food we partake of daily at our tables is genuine food, and not poisoned or adulterated."

We have no guarantee whatever that a bit of bread and a little wine has been turned into the body and blood of Christ by a priest mumbling a few words in Latin over them. The fact that a man who puts on skirts and gaudy apparel, has a boy swing a censor accompanied by lofty strains from an organ and a surpliced choir, does not prove an impossibility has been performed. As for the food question, the same greed that actuates the priest dominates the purveyor of food, and his dishonesty goes away back prior to the Mosaic period. Ever since the priests of the Bible period assisted in the robberies and murders recorded in that man-made book, greed has been fostered by the priesthood. They are as greedy for wealth and power as they ever were, and they cannot truthfully deny it.

Says Father Tom: "We have a greater guarantee of the certainty and reality of the next life than we have for the existence of the North Pole. God himself has guaranteed the existence of a future state."

That ought to satisfy even spiritualists. But the guarantee does not guarantee. We know that a revolving globe has an axis. The world is a revolving globe and the north and south ends of its axis have been dubbed the North and South Pole. We know this by analogy. As for a future state, no god can guarantee it, for gods are all of human manufacture and are therefore no more intelligent than their creators, and if they exist in actuality can do no more than man can. The God of the Hebrews and Christians was created by the Jews, and can guarantee nothing and never could. The power that controls this universe pays no attention to the affairs of men as far as the wisest man knows, and the cataclysms of nature strike the just as well as the unjust.

"We have more certainty for the existence of Purgatory than we have for the existence of the canals on Mars. The infallible Word of God has guaranteed the fact of Purgatory, but the canals of Mars are doubtful existence, and astronomers still dispute about them." Thus declares Father Tom.

"The infallible word of God!" With all its contradictions and absurdities, its fake history and its horrible record of brutal atrocities, its unscientific declarations, even Father Tom cannot prove the Bible infallible. The fact is, it has been proven to be most fallible by the "higher criticism." As for Purgatory, even the Pope himself cannot locate it. It does not lie upon skeptics to prove it does not exist; it is for the priesthood to prove that it does. Popes, Cardinals, Archbishops, Bishops and common priests claim the power to forgive sins. If they could do that, and still allow souls to suffer in purgatory till a price is paid as a bribe to them for the release of such tortured souls, it is not at all to their credit. It proves the priesthood to be anything but god-like. Rather it shows them up as fiends in human form, for none but fiends would willingly allow poor tortured souls to remain in such torment a moment. When Father Tom can show us maps, charts and photographs of purgatory, and samples of the materials that furnish the flames of that region we will debate the subject with him. We are from Missouri, so to speak.

The balance of Father Tom Coakley's article is sophisticated buncomb, and no more worthy than the parts we have quoted. It merely shows the sort of mental pabulum fed to the faithful ignoramuses that constitute the laity of the Roman Catholic church. It is Father Tom's sort who are trained in Jesuit schools to dole out such intellectual fodder to their cohorts. It is his kind of people who cast aspersions on our institutions, and seek to destroy them. If such as he who would overthrow our liberal democracy and substitute the rule of the god-man on the Tiber. The shame of it is that loyal Americans are so slow to arouse to the danger that confronts us. While the people sleep, Rome entrenches and arms her Knights of Columbus and other militant societies.

Even Father Tom Coakley's fulminations have little effect on the sleepers—except to lull them into sounder slumber.

ARGUMENT FOR TOLERANCE.

From C. F. Randall, Capron, Oklahoma.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

The Catholic church is forever combating the public school idea, and those opposed to Catholicism are condemning the parochial schools in unmeasured terms. The church declares that the public school is detrimental to the moral advancement of the pupils. The anti-Catholic asserts that the parochial school is conducive to ignorance and superstition rather than to education, and that the church's attitude toward our educational institutions is intolerant, and this is a fact that cannot be controverted. This has been proven by various writers for the Freethought press; and especially for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Yet, this same intolerance is manifested more and more in its columns by its contributing editor, who, in most instances is one of the most fair and unbiased critic of religions, and religious institutions.

On page 148, first column and fifth paragraph of the March 10 issue, the claim is made that all "lovers of American institutions" should "at once demand * * * that the parochial school be abolished."

All lovers of liberty should do nothing of the kind. If such methods are intolerant in Catholics, it is no less so in Free-thinkers; and such suggestions come with ill grace, and an entire absence of consistency, from those making the claim for liberality that we do, and injure our cause a thousand times more than any argument we may offer, can do it good. The Catholics are as much entitled to teach their views, and to teach them in their own way, as any one, so long as they do not use coercive measures to compel their adoption.

AN OPINION UPON MARRIAGE. From H. V. Honn, California.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Although a seismic disturbance of brimstone and ink always occurs in my system, following the perusal of Brother Eshleman and other moralityasters, the antidote which I saw in Comrade Kusel's remarks, saved the editor from receiving the brunt of the cataclysmic eruption. Since, however, Comrade Kusel has in a way been flustered by what amounts to mere chiding, for having expressed his opinion, it seems meet that someone step into the breach who is willing to sponsor all he has said, and more, and be in no wise appalled by Brother Eshleman's private opinion that he is very naughty.

There is but one source of moral law, viz.: "Thus saith the Lord," and but one result, namely, ostracism, persecution, and meddling. And not until that infamous epithet, bastard, is erased from the world's languages, can civilization free itself from the abiding contempt of all men, worthy of the name of humanity.

On the other hand the sole rational arbiter of morality is profit; that which is profitable to a community, the people do. It is a common blunder of self-appointed moralists, blissfully to ignore the true subject of moral science. Moral science concerns itself, not with what people ought to do, but with what people do. Natural law founds morals in fact, but moral theories are rooted in fancy. This factual basis is borne out by the origin of both words, moral and ethical, which in Latin and Greek, respectively, mean custom. The moral theorist's anxiety is aroused, not so much by the inherent character of an act, as by its departure from the prevailing custom. Advancing age, rooted in the customs of its own generation and birthplace, views the exotic and the novel with alarm, and jealously cries out, "O Tempora! O Mores!" upon the shifting scenes and times.

It would be interesting to know which phase of marriage Brother Eshleman so zealously champions. Is it the Continental Marriage, in which the betrothal is romantically consummated by the parents, and the indispensable dot shrewdly haggled over by the two sets of papas and mamas; the International American Marriage, of savory barter and sale; the marriage of necessity; elopements in haste and divorce at convenience; all of which are equally "sacred" in christendom. Or turning to generalities, the hypocritical monogamic pretense, which characterizes all of these varieties.

That marriage assures the father that "the offspring are his own," is amusing, since it must be evident to the most casual observer that motherhood is a matter of fact, while fatherhood is a question of faith, under the most stringent espionage.

Thus natural law lays the responsibility of this moral act upon the integrity of character of the persons concerned, just where all moral responsibility should be placed.

Concerning the service rendered by the parents to the child, the most authoritative students of the subject are inclined to the opinion, that under an equitable system of economics, the biologic usefulness of the father would end before the birth of his offspring. Certainly under the present system, the pitiable struggle of the poor man to get a modicum of what belongs to him, and the mad scramble of the rich man to get his utmost quantity of what does not, reduces the paternal service to an indirect one, which a trust company could perform equally as well.

It is contended by all moralists that marriage is the safeguard of the home, and the home the foundation of civilization. Were I the most implacable enemy of the home, I could ask no more damning indictment against it. But personally I think less ill of that popular institution. For as it is written, "A tree is known by its fruits," civilization, in all conscience, is rotten enough.

If it should be said that the morals of my disquisition "smack of the brothel," I shall in no wise be disconcerted. For it has long been shown that civilized marriage is closely related to prostitution. Havelock Ellis gives the consensus of opinion among the great sociological students of the world that it is an indispensable bulwark of marriage; that the horror of the one institution, is the sacrifice laid upon the altar, for the existence of the other. At least the fact not to be gained is that only in the shadow of civilized marriage sit "those who keep love's vigil for pay." Prostitution and booze follow the missionary and civilized morals.

AGNOSTICISM VS. SPIRITUALISM. From J. W. Thomas, Nebraska.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I agree with friend Hopkins that Agnosticism is a condition, a psychological condition. Not a position, but a negative condition. Spiritualism is a science, therefore, is positive and constructive or progressive. Agnosticism is know-nothingism and do-nothingism. It is mental stagnation. It seems to me, although Agnosticism is diametrically opposed to Christianity, they are very much alike. They both oppose mental and spiritual progress. They both teach a negative philosophy. Christianity teaches it is impossible for a man to be anything but a sinner. It is impossible to do anything by himself. Christianity being the Absolute it is foolish and wicked to try to go beyond it or question it. Man must not think or reason, but calmly surrender his birthright or reason and submit to blind faith the Absolute. This philosophy has kept the people in darkness and ignorance ever since the days of Constantine. But as the public schools are developed and the masses of the people become educated, Christianity is passing away. Likewise, Agnosticism, as Mr. Hopkins says, teaches that it is impossible to know anything about a future life. Absolutism again. Nothing to do. Everything has been done that can be done. It has been "absolutely proven" that man can go no farther. Make the most of this life and calmly submit to Fate. I tell you there is no such thing as the Absolute. All life is eternal. The very fact that man has evolved from lower life is proof that he is continuing to evolve and will continue to evolve to all eternity. Why should evolution bring us this far and no farther?

Then what are you going to do about all this spiritualistic evidence and phenomena? We know there is such a thing as spiritualistic phenomena. Approach a thousand people, especially of mature minds, and they will say they have observed or experienced those phenomena in dreams ("come to pass") visions, clairvoyance, etc.

In the Encyclopedia Americana is this statement under Psychical Research: "It has been widely felt that the present is an opportune time for making an organized and systematic attempt to investigate that large group of debatable phenomena designated by such terms as mesmeric, psychical and spiritualistic." That was in 1882 when the Psychological Research Society was organized in England. In 1884 a branch society was organized in this country. Now what has been the outcome from that thirty years of systematic and scientific investigations of those societies—composed of the best people of England and America? I've never heard of any of them becoming Agnostic, though they were decidedly Agnostic at first. At present there are 1,200 members of the American society and 600 in England.

In the presence of all the great mass of spiritualistic evidence, both subjective and objective, it seems to me it is impossible for anybody to remain unconvinced of the wonderful and glorious fact of immortality. But there are people at the present day who "don't believe the earth is round" because they can't see round it. "There are none so blind as those who will not see."

But I doubt, after all, Mr. Hopkins, if you are really an Agnostic, and absolutely certain that "it has been demonstrated beyond any doubt whatever that no man knows or can possibly know anything whatever about a condition beyond life here." Else why do you say you hope and wish that Spiritualism is the unadulterated truth? The very fact that you have hopes and desires proves that you are not satisfied with your condition. Your absolute negative condition. "There's nothing to it."

HUMANE MEASURES. From E. C. Rose, Washington.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Prof. W. T. Shaw of Washington State College, in an able pamphlet on ground squirrel control, advocates "humane" measures in their extinction. Let me answer from the pioneer's point of view—a pioneer homesteader in the mountains.

When the ground squirrels eat your clover, grain, potatoes, strawberries, and garden truck; when the mice bite holes in a new Stetson, and the wood rats start house-keeping in the cabin in your absence; when the red ants eat the sugar and the black ants start to commandeer the butter packed fifteen miles on shank's-mare; when the woodticks injure your cattle and yourself, besides being potential carriers of the deadly mountain fever, and the humble and unobtrusive bedbug joins the ground squirrel in bringing gratis the germs of the black death; when the black gnats fly in your ears, and the no-see-ums in your eyes; when a June frost hits the garden with an awful swat; when the tax assessor comes in the door while the fabled wolf—who is no fable at all—grins at you from the door-step; when thoughts of the flesh-pots of back-east come to taunt you at your feast of hog-boosum and brown beans; when the phonograph warbles "I wonder who's kissing her now"; when the first gray hairs come in your beard; when "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick"; say, Mister, it's hard enough to be human, let alone "humane."

Let's get back to first principles, and the very first one ever established by man or his gods is that self-protection is Nature's first law.

I read somewhere that he that liveth by the sword shall die by the sword; also, "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth," both of which are good law and good logic, and apply to beast as well as man. Cruelty is unnecessary pain, that is, pain unnecessary to human life and control of the world; and if the vivisectionists helped one human child by torturing all the animals in the world they would be justified. Agitation for humaneness is carried on by those tender (I almost said tenderfeet) ones who have never faced and defeated on their own merits the stern and malignant powers of Nature; whose bread is buttered by others, who imagine as Kipling put it, that policemen, street lamps, and brick pavements come in the course of nature, or as they would say, by Divine Providence. The professing Christian is the loudest crier against the necessary miseries that are a part of the cost of existence, yet he sees no inconsistency in believing that his God will torture for eternity such men or mice, and to omnipotence they must appear about the same size—as disagree with his self-appointed spokesmen on earth about the unknown and the unknowable.

MEDIUMSHIP DEFENDED.

From G. C. Bartlett, Connecticut.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

No one who has intelligently examined the proofs of mediumship, would ridicule the same. Mediums, or so-called psychics, have a gift, a power to deliver truthful messages purporting to come from spirits. Personally, I am not convinced that disembodied spirits have any connection with the messengers; but this fact remains, that no scientist or another has explained how this trick is done; where the power comes from.

Sir Oliver Lodge investigated the subject for many years before he was convinced, and Conan Doyle has been an investigator for thirty years. Nearly all, if not all, of the original members of the Psychic Research Society were at the commencement skeptics. No, find out how it is done before you ridicule.

Illustrated.

A feature of the work is the uncovering of the phallic principles in Christianity, to which the key is given in a series of illustrations.

"The Christian Mythology" is printed on light but substantial paper, convenient in size, handsomely bound in cloth, with gold sidestamp, and is provided with a sufficient index and a Bibliography that guides the reader to works drawn upon as authorities. The unpretentious little volume will bring light to thousands who know nothing about the origin of the dogmas they believe or the rites they practice.

INFIDEL DEATHBEDS

BY G. W. FOOTE.

An account of the passing away of the noted Freethinkers of the world, to which are prefixed brief accounts of their lives and of the work they did for mental liberty. "Infidel death-beds" have ever been a fertile theme of pulpit eloquence, and the clergy have drawn harrowing pictures of fear and terror and recantations and repudiation of sentiments held when living by the great Infidels of the world. This book shows that such sermons are "just preaching," and totally false as to statements. Every Liberal should have it for reference. The author founded the London Freethinker, and was one of the ablest writers in England. Price 25 cents.

CHILDREN'S CORNER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS YOUNG AND OLD

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

Theron C. Leland, April 9, 1821-June 3, 1885.

The subject of this sketch, aside from being a man of great ability, was one of the most active in the work of Freethought in his generation. Theron C. Leland was born in Cattaraugus county, New York, April 9, 1821. He was brought up on a farm, and was educated at the Wesleyan Seminary of Lima, New York, where he was graduated with the highest honors. He was gifted with an active mind, and while teaching school was brought into contact with Fourierism, a then form of Socialism. This was advocated by men of the character of Horace Greeley, William Ellery Channing, Charles A. Dana, George Ripley, Park Godwin, Albert Brisbane and others well known to literary fame. Mr. Leland became a convert and a propagandist of this new form of society. He devoted considerable time to lecturing on its merits. While doing so he was brought into contact with phonography, then in its infancy and, like nearly all new ideas, considered by many to be a fraud. Mr. Leland at once mastered it, and took up the work of teaching and expounding it from the platform. At one of these meetings a man arose and made a long tirade against phonography. While he spoke, Mr. Leland took down his words, and when he had finished read the speech to the audience. This was a complete demonstration, and the cause of his getting many pupils. He taught the new system of writing to the daughter of President Fillmore, to Edward F. Underhill, later of the New York Surrogate Court, to the well-known Theodore Tilton and to Ethan Allen. As court reporter he reported in the Supreme Court Daniel Webster and Rufus Choate. When the great Hungarian patriot, Louis Kossuth, made a tour of the United States, Mr. Leland reported his speeches for the leading New York papers. In 1853 he reported the proceedings of the first Woman's Rights convention ever held in this country, and in 1862 received the very responsible appointment of government stenographer at the New York custom house. He stood at the head and front of his profession.

Mr. Leland had long been a Freethinker, and at the fourth annual congress of the National Liberal League was elected secretary, which position he held three years. These were trying days for Freethought. D. M. Bennett had just been liberated from prison, and during his long struggle he found in Mr. Leland a true friend and defender. In conjunction with T. B. Wakeman, Leland edited the official organ of the League, Man, a journal that did not pay; but while working on it Mr. Leland supported himself by teaching shorthand evenings. He was a man of great heart and delightful temper, with a keen wit, of which the following is an example. When Mr. Bennett returned from his trip around the world, after being laden with honors elsewhere, a reception was given him in New York. Mr. Leland was called upon for a speech. He drew a picture of Mr. Bennett honored and respected, and compared him with his enemies, many of whom, especially Comstock, were under public condemnation, and then said: "This is a case of where it was the man who lived and the dog who died." Mr. Leland's wife, Mary A. Leland, was a woman of considerable literary ability and a natural poet. They had two sons and two daughters. Of the latter, Rachel (Lilian Leland) has achieved fame as a writer, and Grace is Mrs. George E. Macdonald. Mr. Leland died June 3, 1885. Mr. T. B. Wakeman, in his eulogy said that Theron C. Leland's death impressed his friends as though the graceful and the beautiful had fallen away from their sight forever.

Other events of which the past week is the anniversary are:

April 8, Wilhelm Humboldt, scientist, died, 1835.
April 9, Bacon died, 1626. Lee's surrender, 1865.
April 10, Austin Holyoke died, 1874. Grocius, historian and liberal, born, 1583.
April 11, Edward Everett born, 1794. G. E. Macdonald born, 1857. Charles Reade, novelist, died, 1884.
April 12, American war opened by assault on Fort Sumpter, 1861. Phillips imprisoned for selling "Rights of Man," 1793.
April 13, Thomas Jefferson, unbeliever, born, 1743. Sir John Herschel died, 1871. G. J. Holyoke born, 1817.
April 14, Lincoln shot, 1865. Josiah Warren died, 1873. Four men burnt for heresy at Smithfield, 1556.

Overmatched.

It was a first-class smoking car, and it had been wantonly invaded by a mother and a howling baby.

The big fat man in the corner stuck out as long as he could. Then he protested.

"I wish to goodness the company would reserve special carriages for howling brats!"

"Taint a brat!" snapped the mother hotly. "An 'e don't howl 'alf as much as you did at 'is age, by the look of you now!"

Then to the baby.
"Baby, see the ugly man! Baby, see the ugly-wugly, monkey-ponkey, piggy-wiggy old man that took the first prize at the ugly-wugly show! Ssh-sh! Baby keep quiet, else the nasty-pasty, doggy-woggy faced old—"

But the train stopped just then, and the big fat man waited for no more.

Late Bulletins.

An editor of the Far West dropped into church for the first time in many years. The minister was in the very heart of the sermon. The editor listened for a while, and then rushed to his office.

"What are you fellows doing? How about the news from the seat of war?"

"What news?"

"Why, all this about the Egyptian army being drowned in the Red Sea. The minister up at the church knows all about it, and you have not a word of it in our latest. Bustle round, you fellows, and get out an extra-special edition."—Tit-Bits

Left.

Jimmy giggled when the teacher read the story of the Roman who swam across the Tiber three times before breakfast.

"You do not doubt that trained swimmer could do that, do you, Jimmie?" teacher demanded.

"No, ma'am," answered Jimmie, "but I wondered why he didn't make it four times and get back to the side his clothes were on."—Chicago Herald.

TIM AND JOE.

Tim and Joe were schoolboys
Many years ago.
Tim was called a Christian
An Infidel was Joe.

Tim was what the lads all called
"A goody-goody" boy—
A sort of milk-and-water chap,
With brains 'bout half alloy.

He never was supposed to have
A great amount of snap;
What intellect the poor boy had
Was fed on Bible pap.

Now, Tim believed most anything
If once it 'peared in print,
While Joe believed in nothing
But had some logic in't.

Tim studied many weary hours
Over Jonah and the whale;
He read about how Samson caught
Those foxes by the tail,

And slew some three-score Phillis
With the jawbone of an ass;
How Nebuchad had eagle's claws
And fed himself on grass.

He read how Balaam's donkey
Was a Hebrew linguist, who Once "read the law" to Balaam
'Till his wrath waxed very blue;

And all because an angel
Was standing in the road;
Poor Balaam couldn't see him—
He must 'a' had a load!

With problems of the future
Which all boys want to know
Our Tim was guided by his faith
And by his reason, Joe.

Yet very earnest were they both;
Joe used to ask of Tim
If he had made that God of his Or whether God made him.

Said Joe to Tim, "The Heathen boys
Make gods of stone and wood;
They pray exactly as you do,
Get answers just as good.

They pray for rain—you pray for rain—
You neither get a drop
'Till old Dame Nature gives the word,
And it rains 'till she says 'Stop.'"

A wise old sage one time remarked
"I wonder why 'tis given
To those who know so little here
To know so much of heaven."

Full many Tims there are today
Prepared to preach to you;
They say exactly what the Lord
Wants each of us to do.

There doubtless are some Joes also
Who think it mighty queer
That those who know so much of heaven
Should be such numskulls here.

Obeying to the Letter.

Little Nelly, while at the seashore with her mother, was very fond of making calls upon some ladies in a neighboring cottage, and the frequency with which she would bring home little presents of cards and pictures, etc., led her mother to fear that she might be in the habit of asking for these things.

She therefore gave the child strict orders never to do such a thing.

The next day Nelly returned from her visit laden down with pretty odds and ends of various sorts, and when her mother called her and questioned her severely if she had asked for these things, she replied, with conscious virtue:

"No mother, dear. You told me I must never ask for things, so I just took 'em."—Harper's Bazar.

Those Startling Changes.

The old man's wife was getting into a carriage and he neglected to assist her.

"You are not so gallant, John, as when you were a boy," she exclaimed in gentle rebuke.

"No," was the ready response, "and you are not so buoyant as when you were a gal."—Philadelphia Ledger.

Trial Size.

A six-weeks-old calf was nibbling at the grass in the yard, and was viewed in silence for some minutes by the city girl.

"Tell me," she said, turning impulsively to her hostess, "does it really pay you to keep a cow as small as that?"—Harpers.

The Wonders of Science.

A camera man, working for the educational department of a film company, met an old farmer coming out of a house in one of the middle States, and explained his presence on the place thus:

"I have just been taking some moving pictures of life on your farm."

"Did you catch any of my laborers in motion?" asked the old man curiously.

"Sure, I did!"

The farmer shook his head reflectively, and then said:

"Science is a wonderful thing!"

Selling Talk.

Peddler—Madam, I am introducing a new brand of soap—

Lady—Don't want it.

Peddler—It costs only half as much as any soap now on the market—

Lady—Don't want any of it.

Peddler—And it will do twice the work of any other—

Lady—Don't want it, I told you.

Peddler—It softens the skin and makes the complexion clear and beautiful—

Lady—How much is it?

Nervous passenger (during the thunder-storm): "Ain't it dangerous to be on a street car when it's lightning so?" Calm Passenger: "Not at all. You see, the motorman is a non-conductor." The nervous one felt easier.

"Why did you spell 'bank' with a capital, Bobby?"

"Cause pa says a bank ought always to have a good big capital."—Boston Transcript.

THE FREETHOUGHT BADGE PIN

Dedicated to all honest men and women—to those who can and are willing to reason—who constitute the grand army of progressive thinkers throughout the world.

An Emblem of Freedom and Progress

Represents no lodge, order or society, but is designed as a token of recognition for progressive minds of every shade of thought.

All claiming to be free from superstition, all who base their belief upon science and reason, should wear this emblem to speed the grand work of emancipating humanity from the thralldom of mental darkness.

This is conceded by artists and the trade to be the most beautiful Badge ever designed. Being a practical jeweler and designer of emblems of every description, as well as an enthusiastic worker in the cause of human progress, Mr. Wettstein has succeeded in combining in this badge the great want of this age and the future. It represents the Burning Torch of Reason, the Rising Sun of Science and Freethought, beautifully enameled in brilliant colors in contrast with the Night and Darkness of Superstition, enameled in black, and symbolizes the evolution of the world from the Night of Superstition to the Day of Freethought, Science and Reason.

"A pin whose torch and golden sheen,
Would grace the breast of Sheba's queen;
And will lend grace in coming time
To queens of beauty more sublime."
(Impromptu by Elizur Wright.)

As a token of recognition among Liberals of every shade of thought, either at home or abroad, it is especially valuable.

Made in two styles and by best workmen in the most artistic and substantial manner.

Considering amount of gold and artistic workmanship in the badge, no other badges in the world are sold so cheap. They will last for generations to come and increase in popularity and value until fear and superstition exist no more.

THE LETTER BOX.

GORDON OWENS, Chicago.—Your letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 7 has moved a reader to write you in care of this office, and we have lost your street number. Please supply same.

E. C. R., Chicago.—The documents from Los Angeles to which you allude have been forwarded to us and read without emotion. When we contemplate the small number of scraps that occur in our ranks as compared with other groups to be observed, we have to recommend Rationalism as the parent of harmony.

B. R., New York.—We see your advice to Comrades: "If you think murder is wrong, refuse to join the army or any military body." But suppose we believe in bombing sovereigns—which is murder—how are we going to convince the military tribunal that we have conscientious objections to taking human life?

E. B. Cook, Kansas.—To the best of our knowledge and belief the Jesus controversy is now closed so far as this paper is concerned. But you must remember it was all written and printed for your instruction; so be grateful. Jesus does not survive classification. He belongs to the numerous bunch of demi-gods of antiquity, and they are all myths.

S. H. HARTMAN, New Jersey.—Your account of the trial and conviction of the free speakers whose fines you so generously paid will appear next week. We took an interest in one of these cases last year and it set us back forty dollars. When the court fixes the sentence before hearing the testimony, the services of a lawyer are not much more than an extra expense. We may see what an appeal can do in the case of the Secularist.

H. B., Ohio.—It will not be feasible, as you suggest, to send the professor to the front as chaplain to the unbelievers. The government has provided against any heretical chaplains dividing the graft with the orthodox by establishing the religious test (contrary to the Constitution) that every holy-jo must be recommended by the church of which he is a minister. There is no church that would vouch for the professor's soundness in the faith.

A. B., Philadelphia.—The picture of the devil and the Sunday campaign, which we owe to you and the courtesy of the Philadelphia Record, came out when Sunday left your city in 1915. It was entitled "Is It Over?" but the same picture answers every purpose of a greeting between the two coworkers in New York. Billy is saved here by the recruiting campaign, into which he has thrown the organization got up in the name of the "Prince of Peace."

Sinai and Olympus

Parallels in Heathen Myth and Hebrew Scripture.

By a Texas Pagan.

PICTURES BY RYAN WALKER.

This is a lecture by a Texas Pagan, which has been illustrated by another. The text is what the title describes, a comparison of the heathen myths with the Hebrew tales told in scripture. The illustrations are exquisite bits of satire and wit, made by a genius with the pencil, and each is a gem. Text and pictures together, the book is certainly one of the wittiest ever produced, while the information it contains is solid and reliable. It will be a source of pleasure to every Liberal, and is at the same time a splendid Freethought lecture. We guarantee its quality from start to finish. 115 large octavo pages, 75 illustrations. Illuminated cover, fine paper. Price, 50 cents

DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

Poverty and Riches and Mr. Severance.

In reply to Mr. Severance's article entitled "Poverty and Riches and Mr. Donahue," let me say that I am willing to match my arguments entitled "Wages and Accumulation of Wealth," and "Initiative," against his item with any fair-minded person. His argument contains nothing but uncalled for abuse and false statements; in fact nothing but a hard luck story from a dyed-in-the-wool pessimist.

Socialism has come down to us from prehistoric times along with war, kings and religion, and is about as foolish as the heaven and hell theory. Lysurgus, 900 B. C., gave it a trial on a small Grecian city without success. Socrates concluded that it was not possible because of the innate weakness of man. Various men at various periods have stirred the world with such visions, but it has been found impossible to apply them, since mankind resists all wholesale schemes of reform. Human progress is due to the free play of inter-human rivalries.

Socialism would put an end to that order of competitive individualism under which the United States has made the enormous advance of the last fifty years.

Socialism, by guaranteeing to all a living, takes away the most powerful incentive for exertion. Why bother about saving when the savings of years may be swept away to pay for the maintenance of the thriftless?

The problem of the unemployed would still exist under collectivism, because it is as much a moral as an economic one. In every community idlers and black sheep will always be present, and collectivism assumes an ideal state of society in which all men are equally good.

Under a Socialist reign all would want to be bosses, and the few workers would continually want shorter hours and the most pleasant work, until no one would work. No one could choose his occupation. Every one would have to act in accordance with orders.

The Socialist would abolish the Senate, weaken the Supreme Court, and make the constitution the plaything of the majority of the moment.

They would soon split up into factions anyway, and there would be nothing but wrangling, disorder, etc. They have stood for the McNamara dynamite conspiracy, and many other unspeakable crimes and rank abuses, and such a narrow-minded, ignorant, class would soon put everything out of business.

The few good features of Socialism will be gradually adopted, but the system as a whole will be rejected because of the highly dangerous and fallacious doctrines it involves. One thing Socialism advocates is woman suffrage, and the women proved in the Los Angeles election that they stand ready to crush Socialism as soon as they have the ballot.

The things I advocated I know from personal experience are sensible and practical. They are the hoarded experience of many generations as to the best means of thriving in the world, and any one reading, understanding and faithfully putting them into practice, cannot help but be benefited mentally, physically, morally and financially.

It is all right to be a Socialist when you have no money and want to share some one else's money, but it never fails that when a Socialist gets money he soon forgets all about Socialism, as one loves to excel in cards, checkers or chess, so should one love to excel in health and wealth; in fact it should be a greater incentive, as it means more to a person and it is the one and only incentive that will work.

As to the thousands of men in California out of work, I will have to have more than Mr. Severance's word for that, as the newspapers I receive from California speak of glowing, prosperous conditions there, though the male-help-wanted columns are many.

One time I came to New York and was unable to get work, and on hearing there was work in Chicago, I bought a ticket for $20.00 and was soon in the land of prosperity and work aplenty. What is the use of staying where there is no work when a bit of money will take you where there is plenty of work? I was in Los Angeles a couple of times and had no trouble getting work, and I am sure I could go there right now and get plenty of work.

People in this country think it a hardship when they have to move to another part of the country in order to obtain work; what must we think of the sacrifices of millions and millions that have given up their homes and everything in foreign lands and come to this country to better themselves. They have to learn our language, our laws and customs, to work even as day laborers. They not only better themselves but also better this country and help make it greater than ever. Our moving about once in a great while is nothing to the great sacrifices they have to make.

I see by the papers that in the last ten months the requests were made to the government employment bureau for 20,000 men which they could not fill as the men were not to be had.

The item about the man making $30,000 on a lot—what's the matter with that? Such transactions are perfectly legal and proper. Mr. Severance better study up on logic and political economy and he will not make such asinine statements. Mr. Baruch never made the million in Wall Street; that also is far from the fact.

As to plenty of advice and no property, I will say that while I have traveled a good deal and have found it necessary to cultivate my health more than wealth, yet I can show an $8,000.00 home free and clear of all incumbrances, beautifully furnished and well kept up; $1,500.00 out on mortgage; $1,000.00 and over in the bank, and several smaller amounts at work. I can't understand how a man could be 34 years in such a land of wonderful opportunities as California and have nothing. A dog or a donkey could do as well. Brains are certainly lacking in a case like this.

I have a little book published by Dawson's Book Shop, Los Angeles, entitled, "The Conquest of Poverty," by Helen Wilmans. She was a married woman living away back in the mountains in Lake County, California. After years of toil she finally lost everything, and one morning found her alone and penniless, waiting at the roadside for a wagon to come along and take her to a little mountain village five miles away. There she made many attempts to borrow $10 to take her to San Francisco, and it was not until late at night that she succeeded in borrowing the $10 from a scared shoe maker. Then she tells in her own inimitable way her struggle for work, the obstacles she overcame and her rise to greatness and fame. She explains everything very clearly and interestingly, and insists that any man or woman could do as well if they would only persevere.

I could cite hundreds of instances of women and men rising to power by their own individual effort in California when times were not nearly as prosperous as they are now; and you will find opportunities all around you if you will look for them.

No one ever sank so deep he could not rise and again be a man. Every day has its opportunities, in fact one of the greatest blessings that we enjoy is the privilege of beginning life anew whenever we make up our mind to do it. A temporary failure does not mean irretrievable ruin, for every day opportunity bids you awake and rise to fight and win. As I said before the mind must become the dominant factor; we must think first, then act, with determination and vigor. Biography and history shows us how thousands of men with apparently very mediocre ability have succeeded abundantly well by simply making up their mind to do a thing and sticking to it.

Benjamin Franklin in the fifth chapter of his autobiography shows how he rose from a poor boy to be one of the world's greatest men. On page 108 of THE TRUTH SEEKER we have a sketch of Peter Cooper who rose from poverty to power by his own individual efforts, and Cooper Union, where thousands of poor boys and girls have been transformed from unskilled laborers to highly trained experts where faculties could be used to best advantage, is a monument to his genius.

Charles M. Schwab started in to work for the Steel Corporation at a dollar a day as day laborer, and noticing that men were paid just what they were worth, he started in at home, at night time, to educate himself, and he soon made himself worth a million dollars a year; and now he is paying fabulous salaries to men that can deliver the goods. These are not isolated cases but there are thousands that have risen from poverty to power by their own individual efforts. You can't keep a man down when he makes up his mind to do a thing and sticks to it.

Human life is still in evolution. From man-like apes to thinking human beings the process has been a long, slow, painful operation; and as we learn to think intelligently and adapt ourselves to the law of nature, we slowly but surely rise to a higher plane of life. We still have much to learn, much to accomplish, a long way to go, and the combined cooperation of all human beings highly trained and working unceasingly; and the greatest stimulus is to have and to hold.

No person will strive and work to his utmost capacity when he knows his earnings will be taken from him and given to the drone, as the Socialists advocate. It would be interesting to know why we have three classes of society—the rich, the middle, and the working class.

My articles tell why very clearly: The rich get rich by intelligent, determined effort on their part. The middle class gets so far and are satisfied and make no further effort; and the laboring class remains the laboring class simply because they don't use their brains to think properly and effectively in order to work themselves out of undesirable conditions.

There is over 20,000,000 acres of government land in California that can be had for almost nothing, and there is no excuse for any one saying it is scarce.

By being a chronic grumbler, as Mr. Severance seems to be, always harping on misfortune, you make intolerable conditions more intolerable; you sink deeper into the "Slough of Despond." Get next to yourself and shake off the chains of bad habits that shackle you, and rise to newer and higher things; and when death beckons you to withdraw, leave your friends as a guest would leave from a banquet, satisfied with your entertainment, and satisfied you had played your part in the drama of life nobly and well. Life can be made a pleasure, or a misfortune; it depends on how you choose to look at it.

SANER SEX IDEAS.

As might be expected, the supreme court has just held that the Mann Law covers what it calls "uncommercialized vice," which is the traveling together of any man and woman across a state line, when they are having sex relations without being married to each other. It is needless to say, hardly anybody even dreamed of such a construction when the law was passed, ostensibly to suppress the monstrous evil of white slavery in so far as the federal government could do so. But there is reason to believe that those who drew the bill knew perfectly well how it would work, and deceived the legislators and the public accordingly.

If one man has a different sex code from another, that is quite as much to be expected as differences in diet, time for eating, amount of food consumed, etc. But the real evil to be fought is tyranny where one man tries to force his code on another; especially if he is not open about his despotism, but sneaks a bill through Congress that, nobody fully understands at the time, whereby he may persecute those who differ with him in their sexual ideas. The supreme court has time and again proved itself to be under the control of the worst capitalistic influences of this country and all history. So their decision in this case could hardly cause surprise.

In this supposedly "land of the free and the home of the brave" we have on our necks the heel of as odious, as bigoted, as intolerant, and as ignorant a sex oligarchy as could be imagined. Conventional marriage is out of the question for most people. Those who cannot or do not see fit to conform to society's conventions, are indulging in "uncommercial vice," and the only reason they all are not railroaded to the penitentiary is that the federal government cannot reach them as long as they keep within the borders of one state. It would be quite to be expected that the next move of the tyrants would be to lobby similar bills through the various state legislatures, that nobody would understand at the time of the passage, and then proceed to pry into the private lives of everybody and hound them to jail if their sex conduct was not according to their standards.

In the matter of polygamy the situation is the same. Polygamy has been the accepted order of four fifths of the world as far back as we know anything about history. The other fifth of humanity has tried to be monogamous for just a little more than a thousand years, and no further back. Their monogamy did not come from the founder of their religion, nor the men associated with him. And when Christianity did try to be monogamous as a whole, it was not for several centuries after its inception, and even then they got the idea from the pagans around them. Sexual asceticism is of heathen origin. It is well known how the vestal virgins were buried alive if they violated their vows. The affront to the deity was so frightful that no milder punishment would suffice. In other cults the men priests had to be eunuchs. But be as that may, it is generally admitted that even if monogamy is right and polygamy wrong, that even after Christianity as a whole has side-tracked the real doctrines with which it started, to teach primarily the suppression of sex life as much as possible, and has kept this perverted attitude for a thousand years or more, that there is more polygamy in so-called Christian lands than was even known in Turkey or Arabia; only some of the wives do not know it yet. Right here in New York they strain out a gnat and swallow a camel. Mrs. Eddy's fake jumble of religion and therapeutics is represented by several large churches, and the birth of one more sect claiming to be Christian does not arouse antagonism so long as it conforms to popular sex teachings, or maybe goes them one better or possibly one worse. But the Mormons, also with a fake religion, although claiming to be Christian, on account of their polygamy, are hounded and persecuted, and all sorts of legislation passed specially to interfere with their polygamy while allowing them to teach as much religious lies as they please; the same as with Christian Scientists, so called, or anybody else.

I am not defending polygamy, nor am I attacking monogamy. But why do not the conventionalists at least attempt to prove their point? If I was contemplating sex relations with two or more women concurrently, and anybody could show me the harm to myself, to them, or the community, I would assuredly refrain. I might also mention that emigrants from polygamous countries are asked the question if they believe in polygamy, and not allowed to enter, if they reply in the affirmative, and that the customs will confiscate and destroy any literature imported which favors polygamy. If David, Moses, Solomon, etc., were to come to life, our pin-head officials would keep them out of this country. At least one state has passed a law penalizing the advocacy of polygamy by word of mouth. But what is our constitution on free press and speech, or the liberties for which our forefathers died, to a sex tyrant?

In the early seventies Anthony Comstock lobbied a bill through Congress under false pretenses that stole away our liberties and fastened on us a despotism worse than Russia ever had, and which endures to this day. But this has been so well exposed time and again that I need not say much about it here.

In the matter of birth-control the law penalizes giving the instruction, but has nothing to say about the evil of using the knowledge, once you have it. But when a cult represents all that is low in intelligence, and bestial in tyranny and persecution, it is not to be expected that it would show a scintilla of logic or judgment. Personally I have nothing to lose from any oppression of the birth-control propaganda. I know all that they have to teach. I challenge any of the conventionalists to show me the evil in using my knowledge. If they can and will do so, of course I never would make use of it. But to the best of my knowledge and belief, not one has ever made such an attempt. Dare we give them credit for so much intelligence as to be afraid to try it? Or are they simply satisfied with their control of the law? I could just as well prove that it is wrong to sleep lying down, and that standing up is the proper posture. Just let me pass laws to enforce my contention, although I may have to stoop to all sorts of lies and deceit to get this done. Then let me bar all immigrants who dissent and suppress all literature that does likewise. I would not have to take the trouble to argue the matter. I simply would fine or imprison you if you dared to live differently from my dictates.

The Comstock society never tried to cite an instance of a life or a character being damaged by the books, pictures, etc., that they try to suppress. If a temperance advocate is at work, he always has plenty of instances to show of the havoc caused by alcohol. The same is true with those fighting the traffic in habit-forming drugs. I have in my possession several books that are under the ban of the Comstock society, and of which copies have been seized and their vendors and printers punished. I am open to conviction if there is any real harm in them. If anybody can show me, I would destroy them at once, and no more read such things than I would take a dose of heroin or administer one to somebody else. But of course I do not expect anybody to accept my challenge. The moment a man believes in argument or suasion, that does not necessarily make him a radical or unconventional in his sex ideas. He may keep his relations in the bounds of marriage and also let nature send as many children as she wishes. He also might hate sex literature and discussion. But at least he would have nothing in common with the handful of besotted despots that form the subject of my communication, and which have made any petty Oriental satrapy a real democracy in comparison with ours.

SEVENTH EDITION — REDUCED PRICE

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxes of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

One evening, a few days later, papa came home from a long day's work and requested daughter to do an errand for him at the corner grocery. "Will you give me a penny for it?" asked the little girl. "Sure!" agreed the tired business man. And so the penny was earned.

And when Sunday came and the teacher asked the little one to tell the class how she had earned her penny, she said:

"I have," spoke up a man in a stentorian voice. "I'm your tailor. I delivered your clothes four weeks ago."

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

A very frank book; serious, scholarly, convincing.

THE CHRISTIAN HELL

From the First to the Twentieth Century
By

HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work. Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

JUST OUT ETERNITY

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

This Is the Book We Have Been Waiting For

The Belief In God and Immortality

A STATISTICAL STUDY

By JAMES H. LEUBA

Professor of Psychology and Pedagogy in Bryn Mawr College.

The work is the result of an inquiry among men of science — biologists, sociologists, historians, psychologists — as to whether they believe or want to believe in a prayer-answering God and in continuance of life after death. The answer is altogether different from what might be expected in view of the frequent affirmations of the supernaturalists that belief in Christianity, or at least its fundamental dogmas, is held by the majority of the men of science.

It puts into the hands of Freethinkers exactly the information they want on that subject, with the facts and figures verifying it.

As a logical conclusion, founded upon the general aspect of the case, we have held that science leads its votaries to a rejection of such undemonstrable propositions as the existence of gods and the survival of the "soul" when the body is dead. Here we have the evidence, in statistical form, which confirms our view.

To the inquiry into the attitude of the scientists there are added statistics regarding the thought of college students regarding the same religious dogmas.

The author is himself a man of science, an authority in his special branch, which is Psychology, and he knows and sets forth the origin and history of the beliefs with which he deals.

No recent book has attracted more attention from the press, or presented such a serious problem to the supernaturalists.

PAINE'S DEFENSE IDEAS.

A Pacifist from Principle, but No Advocate of Non-Resistance in All Circumstances.

BY WILLIAM M. VANDER WEYDE.

President Thomas Paine National Historical Association.

THOMAS PAINE, one of the earliest of pacifists, originator of the idea of an international court of arbitration peacefully to settle such disputes as may arise between nations, and one of the most earnest and active opponents of war and militarism that the world has produced, was, it should be more generally known, by no means an advocate of "peace at any price."

Paine was too familiar with the history of monarchies and autocracies to believe that in the era in which he wrote war of every sort might be obviated. He had in his time seen too many instances of irresponsible governments that had thrown aside all considerations of humanity and run amuck, to support any such notion as that of "peace at any cost."

Paine's political writings very clearly express his belief in the ultimate abolishment of war by all the nations of the world, and it is evident that Paine was convinced man would within a very few years—probably in his own lifetime—awaken to the barbarity of warfare and adopt in its place rational means of terminating discussions that arose between the governments of the world. It is evident from his writings that Paine could not possibly have brought himself to believe that in this twentieth century—more than one hundred years after his death—any government, or governments, would "run amuck" and set the world aflame with war.

Paine supposed, and with good reason, that long before the present era, the peoples of the various countries would have abolished all monarchy, and that a republican form of government would have supplanted kingly rule the world over. Republics, he was convinced, would be without the avaricious incentive of kings to engender war. But until nations had dispensed with monarchy and replaced the rule of kings with representative government, means of defense was imperatively necessary. Paine was indeed a pacifist, but he very clearly saw the possibilities of aggression and invasion while monarchies continued, and he believed, of course, in the repelling and punishing of the aggressor. Thomas Paine's morality was not derived from the Bible; and the Christian shibboleth, "Unto him that smiteth thee on the one cheek, offer also the other," must to him have seemed advice that only the feeble-minded could follow.

Paine's career as a soldier in the Revolutionary war is detailed in Moncure Conway's "Life of Thomas Paine" (chapter viii: "Soldier and Secretary"). Paine served under General Roberdeau and was later aide de camp to General Nathaniel Greene. That he was a brave and valiant soldier in the struggle for independence is attested by historical record.

The picture of Paine that embellishes this article is from a painting owned by the Pittsburgh Rationalist Society.

There is frequent reference in Paine's writings to the necessity of preparation and proper means for resistance. One has but to read his "Common Sense," his "Crisis," and the occasional magazine articles that preceded these two works, to note his recognition of the value and need of defense. In July, 1775, Paine published in the Pennsylvania Magazine his "Thoughts on Defensive War." In this essay, Paine, the ardent advocate of international peace, said, in part:

"Could the peaceable principle of the Quakers be universally established, arms and the art of war would be wholly extirpated. But we live not in a world of angels. The reign of Satan is not ended; neither are we to expect to be defended by miracles.

"I am thus far a Quaker, that I would gladly agree with all the world to lay aside the use of arms and settle matters by negotiation; but unless the whole will, the matter ends, and I take up my musket and thank heaven he has put it in my power.

"Arms, like laws, discourage and keep the in-vader and the plunderer in awe and preserve order in the world as well as property. The balance of power is the scale of peace. The same balance would be preserved were all the world destitute of arms, for all would be alike; but since some will not, others dare not lay them aside. And while a single nation refuses to lay them down, it is proper that all should keep them up. Horrid mischief would ensue were one-half the world deprived of the use of them; for while avarice and ambition have a place in the heart of man, the weak will become a prey to the strong. The history of every age and nation establishes these truths, and facts need but little argument when they prove themselves.

"As the union between spiritual freedom and political liberty seems nearly inseparable, it is our duty to defend both. And defense in the first instance is best. The lives of hundreds of both countries had been preserved had America been in arms a year ago. Our enemies have mistaken our peace for cowardice, and supposing us unarmed have begun the attack."

Paine, who signed this essay "A Lover of Peace," in referring to "both countries," alluded to the Great Britain of George III (one hundred and forty-two years ago) and America. The colonists in America were the victims of the British monarch's tyrannous impositions in taxation and otherwise, and the shafts of Paine, champion of liberty, were naturally directed at that autocrat and his oppressive government.

With Russia's peaceful revolution in mind, and her repudiation of autocracy, one cannot but hope that the splendid example set by the oppressed people of that country will be followed by the peoples of other European nations when the Great War is ended. There is, indeed, great likelihood that several if not all of the monarchies in Europe will be overthrown within a brief time and that republics of the people will soon succeed monarchical rule all over Europe. And in due time—it seems not very distant now—Paine's dream of a great Federation of Republics of the World will no doubt come true!

Let the "peace-at-any-price pacifists," those who follow the scriptural injunctions, "Resist not evil" and "Love thine enemies," read the story of the American War for Independence—nowhere is it more interestingly and authentically told than in Paine's writings of that period—and they will perceive the absurdity of believing peace can be maintained under any and all conditions.

One of Paine's essays of the Revolutionary war period is entitled "Epistle to the Quakers." In it he justifies the bearing of arms for purposes of defense. In "Crisis I" Paine says: "Not all the treasures of the world, so far as I believe, could have induced me to support an offensive war, for I think it murder; but if a thief breaks into my house, burns and destroys my property, and kills or threatens to kill me, or those that are in it, am I to suffer it? . . . It is the madness of folly to expect mercy from those who have refused to do justice. . . I call not upon a few, but upon all, not on this state or that state, but on every state; up and help us; lay your shoulders to the wheel; better have too much force than too little when so great an object is at stake. Let it be told to the future world, that in the depth of winter, when nothing but hope and virtue could survive, the city and the country, alarmed at one common danger, came forth to meet and to repulse it."

In "Crisis V," addressed to General Sir William Howe, Paine writes:

"It is the object only of war that makes it horrible. If there was ever a just war since the world began, it is this in which America is now engaged. She invaded no land of yours; she hired no mercenaries to burn your towns. She wanted nothing from you and was indebted for nothing to you; and thus circumstanced, her defense is honorable and her prosperity is certain."

In an address "To the Inhabitants of America" following "Crisis V," Paine says: "The only way to finish a war with the least possible bloodshed, or perhaps without any, is to collect an army against the power of which the enemy shall have no chance. By not doing this we prolong the war and double both the calamities and expenses of it. . . And why not do these things? What is there to hinder?"

"If we had not at this time a man in the field, we could, nevertheless, raise an army in a few weeks sufficient to overwhelm all the force which General Howe at present commands. Vigor and determination will do anything and everything. We began the war with this kind of spirit, why not end it with the same? Here, gentlemen, is the enemy; here is the army! Here are Tories; come and help us to expel them!"

In "Crisis VII" Paine refers to his advent in America with no thought of being either a soldier or an author. "I had formed my plan of life, and conceiving myself happy, wished everybody else so. But when the country, into which I had just set my foot, was set on fire about my ears, it was time to stir. It was time for every man to stir. Those who had been long settled had something to defend; those who had just come had something to pursue; and the call and the concern was equal and universal." Let today's aliens read and learn.

Paine foresaw America's need of a navy, and in his "Common Sense" advocated the building of a fleet. He wrote, in part:

"No country on the globe is so happily situated, or so internally capable of raising a fleet as America. Tar, timber, iron and cordage are her natural produce. We need go abroad for nothing. . . We ought to view the building a fleet as an article of commerce, it being the natural manufactory of this country. 'Tis the best money we can lay out. A navy when finished is worth more than it cost, and is that nice point in national policy in which commerce and protection are united. Let us build. If we want them not, we can sell. . .

"Men-of-war of seventy and eighty guns were built forty years ago in New England, and why not the same now? . . . In point of safety ought we to be without a fleet? We are not the little people now which we were sixty years ago. At that time we might have trusted our property in the streets—or fields, rather—and slept securely without locks or bolts to our doors and windows. The case is now altered and our methods of defense ought to improve with our increase of property. A common pirate twelve months ago might have come up the Delaware and laid the city of Philadelphia under contribution for what sum he pleased; and the same might have happened to other places. Nay, any daring fellow, in a brig of fourteen or sixteen guns, might have robbed the whole continent, and carried off half a million of money. These are circumstances which demand our attention and point out the necessity of naval protection.

"Some method might be fallen on to keep up a naval force in time of peace, if we should not judge it necessary to support a constant navy. . . To unite the interests of commerce and defense is sound policy, for when our strength and our riches play into each other's hand, we need fear no external enemy."

Paine profoundly abhorred war; peace he loved above all things. But highly as he prized peace, "peace at any cost" he loathed. He was vehemently opposed to militarism and passionately attached to the principle of mediation. But the invasive crimes of monarchy are not in all circumstances to be met with cordiality and a proffer of pretty olive-branches. Paine realized the necessity and virtue of self-defense. He was no craven, but was as proud to bear a musket as to wield a pen in the service of America.

It is impossible to calculate the moral mischief, if I may so express it, that mental lying has produced in society. When a man has so far corrupted and prostituted the chastity of his mind as to subscribe his professional belief to things he does not believe, he has prepared himself for the commission of every other crime.—Thomas Paine.

Although the devil be the father of lies, he seems, like other great inventors, to have lost much of his reputation by the continual improvements that have been made upon him.—Swift.

WHAT DETERMINES BELIEF?

Individualism as a Cause of the Rejection of Traditional Faiths.*

It is commonly supposed that individual knowledge and desire determine belief. This is substantially true only of the classes of belief not backed by some form of social sanction—supposing there be any such. When we say that we are social beings we mean, among other things, that we hold opinions which we have neither established nor critically examined, and that we are guided by aims which correspond more to the needs of society than to our natural individual inclinations. The few who markedly depart from this, the way of social life, are pilloried as iconoclasts and rebels, or lauded as innovators and reformers. But not even these escape the power of social forces. The most they may claim is to be freer than others from the pressure of social convictions, purposes, and practices; and, in so far as they are freer, to determine to a greater degree their beliefs and conduct according to their own nature and critical knowledge.

How compelling the prestige and the power of political and religious bodies, and how independent their influence may be of the personal inclinations of the individual and of rational knowledge, appears perhaps sufficiently on a survey of the geographical distribution of political and religious convictions. A mere boundary line separates Christians from Buddhists, or the admirers of a king from his bitter detractors—this, even though little or no difference in culture or in temperament or in moral likes and dislikes differentiates the population. The influence of social forces in the establishment of beliefs should be kept in mind in attempting to account for their disappearance.

No one, I think, will be disposed to contradict me when I affirm that the loss of belief accompanying collegiate progress can hardly be due to a decrease of a genuine desire for an immortal life in heaven. The students in the lower classes do not yearn for the angelic life more acutely and generally than those in the higher classes. In any case, the statistics would not bear out that explanation. Is it, then, the clearer realization of the absence of sufficient evidence for immortality and of the strength of the objections to it, which break down the traditional faith of many students as they pass on to the higher classes? To a certain extent, yes. But certainly not that alone. Direct arguments for or against immortality have affected but little even the older of these students. The proportions of juniors and of seniors who declare that they have never considered the arguments for immortality are almost the same as that of the freshmen and of the sophomores.

The chief influence on the decrease of belief among older students should be ascribed, in my opinion, to the gain in independence which is a normal result of growth and education. Young people enter college with few opinions that may be called their own; they are echoes of their social world. In college, they take fuller cognizance of their powers as independent individuals, they learn to detach themselves in thought from the various social groups to which they have belonged or to which they actually belong. They begin to react upon the traditional environment with the energy of their newly found individuality. A serious crisis is often passed through at this period, during which they are sorely tempted to make a tabula rasa of the "rubbish" with which they find themselves loaded—and little is there which in their impatience of restraint and in the conceit of their ignorance they would not wipe out with that epithet.

The presence of a powerful impulse to self-affirmation and independence is, it seems to me, revealed incontrovertibly in chart I where men and women are compared. Why are there 82 per cent. of female believers in God and only 56 per cent. of men? It is not because the latter are in possession of information unknown to the former. They belong to the same colleges, attend the same courses, and move in the same social circles. The main cause of the differences is to be found, I hold, in the greater readiness of men to break from tradition. Whether it is a secondary sex difference or merely the product of her education and social position, the greater conservatism of woman is not seriously contested. One of its consequences in the sphere of religion is that just attributed to it; during the years of adolescent self-affirmation the desires for intellectual freedom and for a rational organization of opinions and conduct are in young women more effectively balked than in young men by the tender ties of the home and the authority of the church.

The greater aversion of women to breaking with their social group—an aversion which makes them more impervious to information threatening them with isolation—is a manifestation or perhaps rather an aspect of their greater tenderness and conscious weakness. Other things being equal, the readiness to break with one's social circle and one's past is inversely proportional to love for and dependence upon that circle and that past. One may therefore say, as I did when discussing chart I, that the greater proportion of woman believers is an expression of their greater need of affection and of their clearer consciousness of dependence.

When denying to knowledge the principal share in the establishment and maintenance of the beliefs with which we are concerned, we should not forget that the aggressively self-reliant person is more likely to scrutinize the foundation of the faith urged upon him and to look for, or at least to pay attention to facts and arguments in support of other possible faiths. But any gain in knowledge having this origin is to be referred to that independence which appears to me the fundamental cause of the difference of belief we have discovered. The more important thing to bear in mind is, I repeat, not any possible inferiority in point of knowledge, but a difference in attitude and disposition towards the established order of things. As to the relation of knowledge itself to belief, it is a commonplace of psychology that conviction is not a function of knowledge alone, but is dependent in a very substantial way upon inclination. Much of what we know never finds its logical place in our consciousness; whereas other items of knowledge lend to propositions towards which we incline far greater weight than legitimately belongs to them.

If now we turn to the statistics that deal with men of different degree of eminence, we shall again be led to ascribe the more fundamental influence in the production of differences in the number of believers, to intellectual and moral independence and therefore to whatever permits or fosters that independence. Greater eminence implies, doubtless, greater knowledge in the field of eminence and frequently also outside of it. But this does not mean that the loss of belief accompanying eminence arises entirely or even chiefly from greater knowledge. The reward of eminence is not usually given for mere knowledge and sheer intellectual ability; the measure of native intellectual capacity is far from being always in direct relation to the social and scientific standing attained. The qualities we have just assigned in larger degree to men than to women are, in the careers followed by the persons included in our statistics, foremost factors among those leading to eminence. The men of higher rank are, on the whole, distinguished among their colleagues for activity, tenacity, initiative, and self-reliance. Of these qualities, at least the last two tend to resist the forces of tradition, of authority, and of prestige, as well as to increase knowledge.

The restraining influence of early moral training and of public opinion has been brought out in the discussion of the signatures and of the comments accompanying the answers to our questionnaire. At the same time we have realized that a certain callousness making for effective freedom from kith and kin, for love of the naked truth and sharply defined situations, and a courageous impatience with the bonds that would tie us to the past and retard the movement forward and upward, entered as frequent and powerful factors in the determination of the opinions of our scientific men. Possession in reasonable degree of these qualities, antagonistic to the traditional and the orthodox, is incontestably favorable to success in the careers followed by the class of men with whom we have been occupied. I conclude, therefore, that the greater loss of belief suffered by the greater men is probably not to be ascribed chiefly to their greater knowledge, but rather to certain temperamental qualities or energies which make it relatively easy for them to rid themselves of much of the social pressure to which others yield.

The action of the qualities singled out is favored by the social environment to which the person who has reached distinction is usually transported. He finds himself removed from lower circles where tradition holds undisputed sway. Around him intellectual freedom is honored far above orthodoxy. So that those who fill the places that fall to the lot of distinguished men of science are relieved of much of the pressure which bears upon their less favored colleagues. If, furthermore, the greater men issue predominantly from eminent families, they have been from their early years freer than the lesser men from the influence usually exerted upon youth by traditional opinion. In a struggle against the forces of tradition, the greater men would thus be doubly favored.

How shall we account, now, for the differences in belief among the lesser men and among the greater men themselves? Within these subdivisions as between them, there exist again differences of distinction resting upon the qualities I have singled out; I see, therefore, no reason for giving a separate answer to this second part of the problem. Unbelief both among the lesser and the greater men is probably determined not chiefly by intellectual possessions and abilities, but more essentially by temperamental traits which resist the influence of the social forces that tend to the maintenance of established beliefs.

But why should greater moral and intellectual independence result in the rejection of the beliefs with which we have been concerned, instead of lifting them up to the level of truly personal, critically established convictions? Which of these two possible effects will actually take place in any particular instance of traditional belief, will depend upon one's estimation of the validity of the grounds on which it is held to be true. When none is offered, or when the proffered grounds of belief are insufficient to meet the requirement of an independent mind, then independence will lead either to the rejection of the belief or to Agnosticism.

JAMES H. LEUBA.

The Cross and the Devil.

The emblem of Christianity, as we all know, is the cross; it is the instrument on which Christ is supposed to have died to save mankind from sin, and make us heirs to the kingdom of heaven—if the Christians can be believed, which is an impossible thing.

Now crucifixion, being the method of punishment at that period of time, during part of which Christ is alleged to have lived, it follows that, if hanging or electrocution had been the prevailing method of punishment, the people, who now call themselves Christians, and who wear the cross or the crucifix as a sign of their belief or adherence, would be sporting an electric chair, or a gallows in miniature, as a token of their orthodoxy, instead of the cross, while the spires of their cathedrals and the towers of their churches would be crowned with these instruments of execution.

It is doubtful, however, whether the Christian religion, especially the Romish brand of it, could ever have carried on as lucrative a business with any other religious emblem, as it has done with the cross. There are in various parts of the world enough pieces of the true cross to build a house, but this fact does not prevent pious priests from peddling this brand of dope, neither does it prevent the credulous from believing in what they have to say. The old saying, "The dupe, he likes the fakir bold, and the sucker, he likes the hook," applies here in all the fullness of its meaning. The many trinkets, such as medals, rosaries, scapulars, and other nonsense, which attach to Roman Catholicism are all more or less involved in obscurity, and supported by wild assertions and theological verbiage at variance with both facts and reason.

A good many owe their origin to supposed apparitions of the virgin Mary to certain fools, commonly called saints by the religious, who were so mentally deranged by their ascetic practices, that they imagined almost everything that only crazy people could imagine.

Whether the saints, thus favored, declared these things themselves, or whether cunning priests simply ascribed the apparitions to the saints in order to have an excuse to invent a new religious trinket to peddle to the credulous for profit, is a question that has points on both sides. But whatever way it be decided the conclusion follows that the so-called saint was a nut and the priests were the rogues, while the true believers were the "suckers."

The old tradition about the origin of the devil is another one of many fool beliefs that Catholics still tacitly acquiesce in.

Briefly stated, it is as follows: After creating heaven, God peopled it with angels. Now we are told that nothing undefiled can enter heaven. The above two propositions, however, impale the traditionalists and bibliolaters on one horn or other of a dilemma. If God created heaven and peopled it with angels, how did it happen that Lucifer, who was a good angel before his fall, sinned against God and fell from grace, inasmuch as nothing can enter heaven which is defiled? Surely sin is pollution, yet it penetrated into heaven, where all pollution was, according to the saying, anathema, and led astray one of the elect and select of God's invisible creation, a good angel. Moreover, prior to Lucifer's advent into hell, there was no devil. There being no devil before Lucifer, who tempted him before he fell from grace? For the religionist to say that he tempted himself would be a denial that God created him good and perfect along with the rest of the angels; to say that God tempted him would be making a devil out of God.

Besides, it is customary for priests and preachers, when they bellow forth a broadside, to indict everything and everybody opposed to their schemes, and then to admonish their auditors to beware of the devil, the world, and the flesh. This is ridiculous in the face of the fact that an angel, a good angel, who had neither a devil, a world, nor flesh to combat, fell from grace and became a devil himself, while he was living in heaven, where we are told that sin cannot enter.

FRANK MCBURNEY.

Diary of a Missionary Editor.

April 8, 1917. Bright Easter skies; bright Easter skies. Our cook is risen; I too must rise. Did so, 8 A. M. (Atwood Manville). Bathed in Jordan L. Mott porcelain lined, worrying if that approach to godliness would lose me my job with T. S. For the first time in my life failed to say my prayers on Easter; have never met Mr. Washburn, so did not know how to pray correctly. Read the papers about the Christians at war. Met a friend who greeted me: "The Lord is risen," to which I replied, "Don't you believe it," which made a sensation; for the reply expected was: "He is risen indeed."

10.47. Went to hear J. H. Holmes preach. Very eloquent. At the sentiment approving of those with new ideas, several persons clapped; must have been Freethinkers who did not know any better. Put a dollar in the plate; so did wife.

1.15. Started for Billy Sunday's tabernacle, having been given tickets in the hope that I might be reclaimed. Arrived 1.45 and obtained seats in last three rows. Fine dramatic setting: flags, choir, emotional music, etc. Billy greeted with considerable applause; compliments the mayor and starts the collection pans. Put in five cents, hoping he would use it to buy T. S. pamphlets; wife put in a dollar; admitted later she was afraid I would pick it out.

Billy is a fluent speaker; in fact, so rapid I could not get down much that he said, but recognized most of it as old. "I am an old-fashioned preacher of the old-time religion. I bring you nothing new. The Holy Spirit is a personality as much as you or I. There is eternal damnation in hell for the impenitent. If you don't settle it before the undertaker pumps you full of embalming fluid, you're all in. I do not believe in the universal fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man, unless you are born again in faith in Jesus Christ. If he isn't he will go to hell. A lot of people do not give a whoop whether other people go to hell or not so long as they are saved. Some people could not find Jesus Christ with a search warrant. Martin Luther would have said to me 'Go to it, Bill; give it to them!' My life has been threatened by the damnable weazel-eyed whisky gang, and last night a man called up and offered large sums to fight this meeting. I have put them out of nearly $200,000,000 of business. I ask no quarter from the dirty bunch and give them none. I have been offered $1,000,000 to appear before the movies and large sums from talking machine companies, but have refused."

For a while he met with a cold reception, and the only two bursts of applause came when he spoke of the Stars and Stripes, and when he jumped on the table and announced that he would give all the net proceeds to the Red Cross and the Y. M. C. A. Much to my delight, wife was not impressed; said it was like a burlesque.

Now the birth of the tabernacle was in this wise: an angel (J. D. R., Jr.) with a hoard, wishing to make Billy a public example, came to him in a dream, saying: "This tabernacle that I have conceived is at 168th street and will be a suitable place for virgins and children to hear the word of the Holy Ghost." So they builded them a tabernacle on the great white way, four hundred cubits in length builded they it, and three hundred cubits in width, and they saw that it was good. And a sounding board placed they over the prophet of the Lord, to carry the voice of the Lord to the uttermost parts of the sawdust. And the piano of the Lord was there, the same that David used for his psalms, and the cherubim and chickens continually did cry, "Praised be Billy Sunday, who hath given us back the Lord, for we know not where we had mislaid him." And it came to pass that when the people listened not unto the prophet of the Lord, he arose and sacrificed all that he had (except a few hundred thousand dollars) unto the Lord. Then the people loudly acclaimed him as a true prophet and listened with a broad smile.

The "Railroading" Process.

On several occasions I have heard about "railroading" a man to prison, but never believed that it was done. Yesterday, April 4, I saw the thing accomplished and am no longer skeptical on that point. I was present at the Fifty-seventh Street Police Court, and witnessed the proceedings in Comrade Henry Jaeger's trial. The day before I had heard of the arrest of several speakers, and I went to observe the process of the law. Comrade Jaeger's case was called for trial, and although counsel begged for half an hour's adjournment, the learned judge's answer was, "Not a minute." The charge against Jaeger was disorderly conduct—calling Paul Stratthaus, who testified against him, a "skunk" and a "perjurer." Jaeger himself admitted the language, and I share in his views. No one in court testified that he heard Jaeger call President Wilson a "murderer." Still the magistrate found him guilty of that offense. The judge then retired to his chamber. During the absence of the judge, a court attendant answered to an inquiry of some one: "Jaeger will get six months." How did the attendant know that the sentence would be six months? A little later Jaeger was brought before the judge, to whom counsel distinctly stated that Henry Jaeger had spoken before the public for the last twenty years, and was a law-abiding citizen who had never been arrested, this being his first "offense." The judge then said: "This man is of the type that has taken advantage of free speech. It is better that this type should be subdued, and I will do all in my power to suppress it. I sentence you to six months in the workhouse."

Today I am richer in knowledge and experience and know what it means to "railroad" a man to prison. Jaeger, poor man, one of the best speakers for Socialism, had dared to use the right granted him by the Constitution of the United States, and is railroaded to jail for six months.

Next the Meiwitz case was called. The defendant hesitated for a moment to answer the inquiry of the learned judge, whether he was ready to go on with the case or not. The judge said: "If you say another word I will raise the bail to twenty-five hundred dollars." (Before it was only fifteen hundred.) The case was adjourned to the next day, April 5. I was one of the bystanders appearing in court. Meiwitz was brought out for trial. He had no lawyer. The complaining officer, put on the witness stand, testified that Meiwitz refused to stop his meeting. A cheap witness testified after him, then Meiwitz took the stand. Although testimony proved that traffic was not obstructed, Meiwitz was found guilty of that offense, and remanded to be sentenced later. This was the second railroading case. I witnessed a third one when the Deutsch case was called. Deutsch was arrested for obstructing traffic. After the officer who arrested him had testified, a chauffeur subpoenaed by him admitted under cross-examination by Mr. Deutsch that there was enough room for two automobiles to pass. Deutsch had nerve enough to ask the magistrate if free speech is to be revoked, and if speakers will be arrested on technical charges. The judge said that free speech cannot be revoked, and speakers will not be arrested if they keep within the law. Mr. Deutsch was the third one to be found guilty.

I was shivering with fear that Meiwitz and Deutsch, like Jaeger, would be sentenced for six months. I called up a few lawyers and then went back to the court room to await the last act of the performance. My agony passed on hearing Meiwitz fined ten dollars. After I had paid the fine we ran down to the street, but Meiwitz reminded me to go back and hear the sentence of Deutsch. I reached the court room in time to hear Deutsch fined ten dollars also, and to pay the money.

In the afternoon I heard that our noble-hearted Brother Kerr was arrested and sentenced to six months in the workhouse, because he had dared to use the right of free speech granted him by the Constitution of the United States.

And this is law, and this is what they call justice! On the same spot where a speaker was arrested for obstructing the traffic, a band wearing the uniforms of United States soldiers was playing the "Star Spangled Banner," to the entire closing of traffic. When I called the attention of the same officer who arrested one of the speakers to the fact that a wagon dared not try to pass there, he told me, "You do not understand; this is the United States Army band, and they have a right to bar all the traffic. They represent the government." I thought the people represented the government, or the government the people. He asked me, "What is your opinion of the government?" I had no intention to fall into the trap, and so said: "I have no opinion whatsoever about this government."

SATURDAY - - - APRIL 21, 1917

The first fatal step which our government made was when a Roman Catholic priest was allowed to set up his altar of idolatry in this country, and the second was when the first parochial school was permitted to open its doors. It is not too late yet to retrace these steps. The priest can be arrested as a felon and the school abolished as an arsenal of superstition. And the sooner these things are done the better for the destiny of our nation.

For fifty years I have heard of "divine truths." I have never seen any such things. To my mind, there are more divine falsehoods in the world than divine truths. This old notion that the Bible is a book of divine truths belongs in the cemetery. The Bible is a big book of big stories, big mistakes, and big lies, but I know not where to put my finger on a big truth in the whole volume. The word "divine" belongs only to the supernatural things, and there are no supernatural things.

Start something, no matter what, and the slumbering idiot starts into life. A flag day for America has prompted said idiot to come out and ask for "a cross day." Spare us. We wish to get out from under that horrible burden. Our nation would be safer and sounder if every cross in it was sunk to the bottom of the Atlantic ocean. No more crosses, but fill the air with the beautiful stars and stripes. Our flag not only lightens the atmosphere, but enlignens it.

I am getting tired of some men. They make me sick. When a man who believes in God and immortality is honored in a community, though he never lifts his hand to help a human being, and a man who does not believe in God and immortality, but who sends coal to the freezing and food to the starving, is looked upon as a bad man and is shunned by church members, I say to myself: Is the world a fool and don't men appreciate good deeds more than a fruitless profession of faith?

It is, or should be, no crime to criticize God, because God is not a living person, only an idea. From history we learn that it was no crime for ecclesiastics and other religious persons to criticize, assail and torture, even to the death, upright and noble men and women, but was a crime to criticize the brute-God of the Bible; a barbarous, disgusting and cruel divinity, who never existed except in the imagination of barbarous, ignorant and cruel human beings. You can never save man until you get rid of God.

I challenge the church to put its God on exhibition. Let us see him naked. Let us see him in truth, not covered with lies. It is time to show this God to man. God has been preached, let him now be shown. Man wishes to see God; to see whether the church has lied about him or told the truth. Where is God? Bring him out! Don't talk nonsense and say that he is too sacred to be seen. Sacredness covers too many lies. Is one of the many lies God? What a hypocrite is this church! Has it any God to show?

The Pride of Opinion.

Our country has experienced no greater strictures laid upon the right of free speech in the course of its history than occurred recently when its citizens were considering the wisdom of recognizing the existence of a state of war between this country and Germany. One of the most signal cases illustrating this fact was that of the Rev. Dr. Holmes, pastor of a Unitarian church in New York. Because of his peace views he was bitterly assailed by many prominent persons, among them members of his own congregation; and yet he gave expression to two fundamental ideas which it was beyond the ability of his opponents to controvert.

Dr. Holmes said: "No man is wise enough, no nation is important enough, no human interest is precious enough, to justify the wholesale destruction and murder which constitute war." If it be true, as Christianity teaches, that the soul of man is the most valuable thing in the whole Universe, then it ought to be especially conserved, even to the loss of everything else. But strange to say, there is no religion existing today that has been more prodigal of human life than Christianity. It seems to care absolutely nothing about the shedding of human blood provided it can gain thereby some worldly advantage. And yet when certain men asked that a better religion of life and love might prevail through the maintenance of peace, they were immediately hailed as traitors to their country, and enemies of the common good.

The second unanswerable statement made by the Unitarian preacher was this: "Most persons are ready to agree, especially in the piping times of peace, that war is wrong. But let a cloud appear on the horizon and those persons reverse their views. So we have the curious situation that war is wrong in general, but each particular war is right." This is a true statement of the case regarding war. It is a potent illustration of the degree to which the love of war is ingrained in human nature irrespective of the fraternal teachings of Christianity and its apparent regard for all mankind as brothers in Christ.

Perhaps when Christianity is safely out of the way, men will cherish the ways of peace. So long as religion continues to embarrass and control the minds of men, just so long will wars continue to rob the nations of the flower of their manhood. It is this same religion that sought to coerce all freedom of speech when the more humane portion of our citizens advocated a disposition of peace.

It is a great question with many if free thought and free speech will ever be a universal possibility in the world while human nature continues to be what it is today.

There are some persons in every country of the earth who find their highest delight in securing the adoption of their own opinions in opposition to the opinions of others. Such persons have no desire to be right; what they chiefly want is to have their own way, rejoicing more over the victory achieved in the contest of mind, than in giving prominence to the truth. This radical evil, witnessed in every age, is the most persistent enemy that the Free-thinker has to deal with. It is the power of self arrayed against the worthiness of truth. Never will truth secure its rightful consideration from men until they learn to love it better than they love themselves.

Degenerate Religion.

As usual, the exhortations of the notorious Billy Sunday, now with us, include a very liberal modicum of what he himself calls "ginger, pepperino and tabasco sauce"—another name, by the way (speaking religiously), for gutter slang, obscenity, personal abuse and professional blasphemy. Of this style of oratory in general we will say nothing at this time. The several communities where Sunday has held forth received a surfeit of this class of preaching; and owing to the wide publicity given to his remarks by the public papers, people everywhere are reasonably well informed as to the quality of the show offered by this modern stage novelty. We wish, however, to consider briefly two remarks which were made by him at his meetings on Tuesday, the tenth of April, the first day of his public appearance.

Sunday said: "I plead not for the modern revival, but for the old Pentecostal revival that will send the drunken man home sober, that will make the thieves no longer steal, that will cure the blasphemous." And later he said that he hoped that as a result of his efforts many would enter the work of evangelism, and then those blasphemers, those rum-soaked sinners, those degenerates, will be going to hell so fast that you can't see them for the fog." It is supposed, when a public speaker uses a term in a logical connection and with a distinct purpose in view, that he understands its meaning.

The dictionaries define blasphemy as to "speak irreverently of, as of God." The irreverent way in which Sunday uses the name and person of God is familiar to every one who has heard him, or read his preachments in the daily prints. The parade of his familiar acquaintance with the heavenly deity which characterizes his "Sundaisies" has been equaled only by that other notorious religious fanatic, Billy Hohenzollern of Germany.

The courts have defined the meaning of blasphemy, or at least made a pretense of doing so; now why is it that they have not applied their definition to the manifest blasphemies of Billy Sunday? A case is still pending in a Connecticut court where a person was tried for blasphemy whose actual offense was trifling compared with the coarse and disrespectful language used by Sunday when speaking of his god. Sunday is the greatest public blasphemer of our age; and if there was ever a man that needed to take a dose of his own medicine to save him from the tortures of his own self-conceived hell, he is unquestionably the man. He is irreverent and grossly flippant about a being in whom he says he believes, consequently his sin is much greater than that of the man who uses God's name carelessly, while ignorant of the conception that any such being exists. But Sunday speaks under the auspices of religion, and this in a hypocritically religious community, makes all the difference in the world. The courts of our land ought to feel thoroughly ashamed as they contemplate their past ignoble interferences with free speech in the light of Sunday's cheap vulgarisms seething with latent irreverences.

The other remark made by Sunday upon which we wish to comment is this: he was told by a "brother" that what was needed today was "an ethical revival." "Help! help! help!" screamed the evangelist. "You can starve to death on this ethical stuff! You can go to hell on high gear on this ethical stuff!" This statement includes a contradiction and a lie, the preacher himself being the evidence. The topics used by Sunday for the subjects of his sermons have almost invariably been of an ethical nature. His chief object seems to be to hold up to contempt and ridicule the moral failures of our age, and to frighten men into an ethical course of living by a constant reiteration of the eternal torments of hell. He is not a theologian, and has made no effort thus far to preach a dogmatic sermon, being contented with presenting an uncritical outline of the primary doctrines of medieval Christianity. If he has no faith in ethics, which is the conviction of many who have heard him, why does he not leave moral questions entirely alone; why does he keep harping upon the sins of society and of the church if freedom from such defects leads only to hell? Here is certainly a contradiction of a most amazing character. He purposes to make men good by his methods of revivalism, and when this has been accomplished he tells them that such people "go to hell on high gear on this ethical stuff." Was ever a contradiction more distinctly exemplified! Was there ever a truer picture of the essential nature of Christianity!

But Sunday's teachings present not only a palpable contradiction, but also a downright lie. While ethics is not an essential quality of Christianity, that religion has never been lacking in a modified appreciation of the beauty and power of moral rectitude. While in essence it is an intellectual creed, it is fast leaving behind the unnatural and unwarranted position that a really good man could ever be condemned to an endless hell by a truly beneficent God, whether the man be Christian, Jew, Infidel or Mohammedan. And when it is remembered that the man of ordinary good behavior is superior from the standpoint of ethics to God as revealed in the Jehovah of the Old Testament, it seems like the veriest impertinence, nay, a high symptom of insanity, for any one to stand before an intelligent audience and yell out the absurdity that morals lead to hell. Does the world need any further proof of the real character of Billy Sunday!

The truth of the matter is that what the world needs preeminently today is a common sense practice of ethics; and no portion needs it more urgently than that one represented by Sunday and his coreligionists. The fact that thousands of religious believers crowd with eagerness this evangelist's tabernacle, and listen to jokes and ribaldry, sensual insinuation and open defiance of truth and decency, with an air of satisfaction expressed in noisy plaudits, is proof positive, were proof wanting, that religion has degenerated in its aspirations below the level of the ordinary playhouse. It never was strictly ethical. Religion and ethics represent two distinct ideas. The fact of a man's being religious is no evidence whatever that he is moral. The thought that the future of religion rests with the performances of such men as Sunday and his sympathizers, simply adds to the sorrows and cares of life which already burden suffering humanity, and cumber the future with additional problems that call for the highest mental attainments adequately to solve.

The harm done by these "holy" shows to our sense of decency, to our ideas of propriety, to the purity of our English speech, to the progress of culture and refinement among our young people much more than counterbalances any possible good secured by the occasional reform of some besotted being, who has enjoyed the same experience many times before. The vulgarisms of the dance hall and barroom now give spice to the "services" of the gospel tent, with an added piquancy which the true believer alone knows how to impart.

The religion of our day is the great coming degenerate of the future. The hope of the world lies in the abandonment of all systems of religion, and an honest, whole-hearted return to the fundamental principles of common sense morality. The former leads to mental and moral obfuscation, the latter to mental and moral enfranchisement, joy and peace. Which shall it be?

Those Who Are Damned.

The evangelistic seizure with which certain New Yorkers are now possessed was launched by the governor of the state, who left his chambers at Albany to appear in the pulpit of the tabernacle. On the day after his arrival, the evangelist himself was entertained at luncheon by John D. Rockefeller, Jr., where were also present Major Gen. Leonard Wood, the distinguished soldier, and Theodore Roosevelt, former President of the United States. He also met at a reception the clergymen of New York, representing hundreds of churches, who had taken part in the organization of the meetings, preparations for which have been going on for three months. Politics, ecclesiasticism and wealth having thus been suborned in his interests, and with harangues made up of nine parts of spread-eagle patriotism to one part of exhortation to come to Jesus, the expected crowd of curiosity seekers was at first attracted. The promise that the tabernacle would have a recruiting station as an annex has secured plenty of free advertising in the newspapers whose editors at this period are all seeing red.

The tabernacle was built to hold 17,000. The public was informed on Monday by one newspaper that the evangelist on the previous day addressed a crowd of 20,000, while another said that 40,000 were thrilled by his eloquence. A Monday evening paper, reporting the afternoon meeting in advance, told of the throng that filled the tabernacle at that day's session. The "throng" was shown by later reports to be 4,000, occupying less than one-fourth of the seating space. Attendance picked up in the evening, so that the reporters felt safe in saying there were 20,000 present afternoon and night. The description shows that the attention of the crowd was held by all sorts of fakery, trickery, claptrap and stage "business." Rodeo heaven, the trombonist and choir leader, opened the performance with his bag of fancy tricks, participated in by sections of the audience, which had been trained to respond. The great Billy himself, the kaiser of the occasion, wrapped an American flag about his arm and defied the powers of the world. Beyond doubt it was a fine theatrical show, and may continue to be such.

Fragments of the "sermons" are printed. It is the same old stuff: "I believe in the Bible as the word of God, and when some highbrow comes along and lisps, 'Mr. Sunday, are you aware that the consensus of the latest scholarship has decreed so and so?' I say, 'When the consensus of the latest scholarship says one thing and the word of God says another, then the latest scholarship can go to hell.'" He has to clear the way for the groundlings by sweeping into perdition the educated and cultivated class. He comes to "save" people, and begins by damning in wholesale lots. Himself unfamiliar with the results of scholarship, and speaking with only the authority of ignorance, he gives credulity a harp and sends education and culture to hell.

Knowing himself open to the charge of being "out for the money," as it is commonly phrased, the evangelist made the preliminary announcement that all receipts above expenses would be given to the Red Cross and to the Young Men's Christian Association. Not many are fooled by such a pretense. If expenses are paid and something left to be handed over to the objects named, there is still Mr. Rockefeller's checkbook to be drawn upon for the hire of the laborer, and perhaps for other uses, as the contributions to the "pan" are reported to be disappointingly small.

It is too early at this writing to judge whether or not the Sunday season is to be a "profitable" one in New York; whether for the next three months the show-going population of the city will prefer such an exhibition as Sunday provides to legitimate amusements—the circus, the "movies," the theatres and a score of other forms of amusement. It was a shrewd move for the evangelist to promise a recruiting station as an annex. That secures him a certain approval and prestige he could not get as a soul-saver. He will work it for all it may be worth to him. In the past he has attributed all opposition to his evangelism to the "whisky bunch," and now with equal dishonesty his critics will be denounced as enemies of their country.

In spite of all the advantages under which the Sunday campaign is launched, we predict that its managers are going to find it hard work to keep the attention of the New York public keyed up to the revival pitch for three months.

The Number of the Beast.

As was to be expected, the Beast whose number is given in the eighteenth verse of the thirteenth chapter of the book of Revelation has been identified as the German kaiser. The first and most plausible identification of this animal, who had horns like a lamb and spoke like a dragon, was with the Roman emperor Nero. Spelling out Nero like this: NeRon KaiSaR, and taking the Hebrew equivalents of these capitals and giving them their numerical value, the exegetes produced the numbers 50, 200, 6, 50, 100, 60, and 200, which added together give the total of 666, corresponding with the scripture: "Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast: for it is the number of a man; and his number is Six hundred three score and six"—666.

By proper manipulation of letters and numbers Napoleon in his day became the beast of Revelation, and so have some of the pope's. The beast had seven heads which were "seven mountains, on which the woman sitteth." Rome has seven hills and the Catholic church. The woman being "the mother of harlots" (Rev. xvii, 5) we need not look further for fulfillment. The description fits all right.

But the editor of the Exponent, Clarksburg, W. Va., shows us that the beast is neither Nero nor Napoleon, nor the pope and his church, but our contemporary, Kaiser Wilhelm of Germany. Proof: There are 6 letters in Kaiser, 6 in German, and 6 in Empire. Place the three 6s together and they form 666, "six hundred three score and six," and "it is the number of a man." The value of a prophecy is that it fits wherever you put it, and so in this case.

If one wishes to look farther than the Bible for passages applying to the kaiser, there are plenty of them in the classics. Our admired contributor, Dr. Jules Goldschmidt of Paris presents to view a considerable collection of them which we give with translations and the Doctor's comments for the convenience and edification of readers:

1. Tu es iste vir (2 Samuel xii, 7). Thou art the man, whom history will stigmatize forever.
2. Quem vult perdere Jupiter prius dementat (Horace). Whom Jupiter wills to perish, he first dementes; and so it has happened to the kaiser.
3. Quantum mutatus ab illo (Virgilius Eneis). See how he has changed since. The kaiser before the war and nowadays.
4. Mene, Tekel, Upharsin (Daniel v, 25). William II will meet Belshazzar's fate.
5. Qualis pater, talis filius. As was the father, so will be the son. True of the kronprinz.
6. Horresco referens (Virg. Eneis). I shudder relating the fate of Belgium and the monstrous deeds of the submarines.
7. Cæterum senso, Carthaginem esse delendam (Cato the Elder). Besides I opine that Carthage must be destroyed; and so the kaiser and his militarism.
8. Ab uno disce omnes (Virg.). In one you recognize all, the kaiser and the Germans.
9. Hoc volo, sic jubeo, sit pro ratione voluntas (Juvenal). This I will, so I order, my will is my reason. Signature of the kaiser in the golden book of Nuremberg before and verified by the war.
10. Video meliore, proboque, deteriore sequor (Ovid). I see and approve the better, but follow the worse. The pestiferous speeches of the kaiser before and after his declaration of the war.
11. Punica fides (Roman saying). Phœnician loyalty: Hohenzollern faithlessness.
12. Sunt lacrymas rerum (Virg. Eneis). His deeds are tears.
13. Odium humani generis (Tacitus). The scorn of humanity.
14. In sæcula sæculorum (Liturgical). For all eternity.

The expedient of the editor of the Exponent in grouping "Kaiser" and "German" and "Empire" in order to draw three sixes is not very fine work. The mechanism is too apparent. Wilson United States produces the same results. Dr. Goldschmidt does not hunt cryptograms and symbols to find the kaiser, but we think he has got his number nevertheless.

The articles on the Women's Night Court in New York by Frank Harris in Pierson's Magazine, of which he is the editor, have finally led to his arrest. The complainant is John S. Sumner, secretary and agent of the Society for the Prevention of Vice—the Comstock Society. The women who appear in the Night Court are those accused of prostitution or of soliciting for that purpose. Mr. Harris has quoted the evidence in some cases to show that they were unjustly convicted, but no more of it than seemed necessary to make his point. It is safe to say that Mr. Harris has not gone into details one-half so far as certain passages of the Bible do. There ought to be no more arrests for this sort of writing until literature has been purified by the expurgation or suppression of the Bible. While that book remains in circulation, to be pleaded as a defense for salacity, the agent of the Vice Society, which is an ally or annex of the Young Men's Christian Association, is straining out the less deleterious matter and swallowing the pernicious germ.

In Boston, on the evening of April 8, Mr. Joseph McCabe spoke on "The Failure of Christian Ethics" to an enthusiastic audience that filled Paine Hall to the doors. When the applause that greeted the distinguished English visitor subsided, Mr. McCabe gave a forceful and eloquent explanation of why the system of Christian Ethics is not adapted to the present age. Pointing out that it depended on the belief that the kingdom of heaven was at hand and that consequently the elements that are essential to a permanent code were ignored, Mr. McCabe showed that under it the world sank century by century into the abyss of the Middle Ages. From this Mr. McCabe drew the conclusion that a code of morals based on the supposition that the world might end at any moment was absolutely unsuited to a world which science assures us will last for many millions of years to come.

The heavyweight pugilist Jess Willard telegraphs the President: "I will fight. When do you want me?" Cardinal O'Connell advises Catholics to fight, but does not offer himself. The Salvation Army tenders a brigade. The evangelist opens a recruiting station. Said Jesus: "If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight."

Why does not God stop the war? The fact that it is permitted to go on is inconsistent with a belief that he exists.

GODLESS RELIGION FOR ALL.

It Becomes Possible by Making the Chief End of Man Happiness Here and Now.

(Dr. John E. Roberts, minister of the Church of This World, in Kansas City, Mo., has published in a pamphlet under the title of "The Struggle of a Mind to Be Free," three lectures of an autobiographical nature, describing his earthward pilgrimage from Baptist childhood and Unitarian youth to his Agnostic manhood. To these lectures is added a fourth entitled "What Is Religion?" From the last-named the following selections are taken.)

By JOHN EMERSON ROBERTS.

The farther back we go, the more religious we find mankind. Religion was robust and full-grown when the human race was in its infancy. As man advances, as he increases in knowledge, as his horizon widens, as he adds to art, invention and science, religion declines; and the more advanced a people is, the less religious it is. Science dismisses the gods and teaches man to rely upon himself. Man learns through ages of disappointment that the heavens are heedless of his cry. He learns through bitter experience that the plow is a better providence than prayer.

The average religionist, whether Christian or Mohammedan or Buddhist or Jewish, imagines that his religion was the original type and that all others have been adulterations or adaptations of his, which was the original and exclusive revelation. The fact is that the comparative study of mythology and religion convinces any unprejudiced student that all of the symbols of religion, all of its forms and creeds may be traced back to an unknown antiquity and that the people that repeat them are wholly unconscious of the fact that they are simply passing on, as it was handed to them, something that has been transmitted from age to age through the endless successions of the past.

Nothing is more positive in the mind of the Christian believer than that his Christ, with his plan of salvation and his miracles and his peculiar birth and his resurrection and his ascension into Heaven, was utterly unique and unexampled in the history of mankind. And yet the student knows that the virgin births, the deaths on the cross, the resurrections and the miraculous signs attending those things are common in the religions of Egypt and Babylon and Persia and Scandinavia.

The fact is that the field of religion is a barren field. For thousands of years it has produced no new ideas. It has added nothing to the intellectual wealth of the world. In its wide and arid waste the flowers of imagination bloom no more. Genius shrivels and dies, while inspiration is choked by the drifting sands of superstition and faith. It is a wide, bleak, arid expanse. Its soil was exhausted by the first crop that it ever bore.

Religion as a factor in the world's life has added nothing to the science of the world. Religion has been busy attempting to justify or vindicate or make probable its miraculous stories. It has depended upon the phenomenal, the unusual, the transcendental, the supernatural. Real men have been giving their attention to facts, to real things. The world in the field of science, invention and discovery owes religion nothing. It has done nothing whatever to lighten the burden or relieve the stress of living. The most that religion can do is to bind up a wound somewhere that it helped to make, or relieve a poverty that it made inescapable, or restore a wayward or wandering one who was driven astray because of conditions that religion promulgated and helped to establish. The most that religion can do is to teach us how to die, while the business of science is to teach us how to live.

We are often told that religion has rescued the race from barbarism,—but for its benign and holy influence, the race would be groveling now in savagery, brutality and the abandonment and ruthlessness of barbarism, and religion has saved us from all of that. Well, if cruelty and death, if devastation and destruction, if slavery and torture, if rapine and massacre, if heedlessness of the helplessness of age and the innocence of childhood, if being deaf to the pleadings of maidens and the prayers of mothers is civilization, what would barbarism be? And yet, while all those things are going on in one half of the world, all of the foremost religions are there, with their symbols, with their faiths, with their different gods. On the battlefield, the devout Catholic wears his amulet and his crucifix; the no less devout Greek Catholic kisses his icon. The Episcopalian is there with his prayer book; the Lutheran with his battle hymn; the Evangelist with his Bible, and the Turk with the crescent graven on his sword. Jehovah and Allah! Christ and Caesar! Might and mammon! Blood-red deities; and all of them gods of war!

What then is religion? What then is religion? Judge it by its fruits. Judge it by what it has done and what it has failed to do. Judge it by the world as it is today. Judge it by the nations at war or by the nations at peace. And this is what it is: a scandal, a hissing and a by-word, an immeasurable insolence, a jest, a mockery, the folly of the ages, the sarcasm of the world. Religion is that! It has been tried and has failed. The church is futile and ineffective and inconsequent. The gods have been weighed in the balance and found wanting.

And I say to them all, to priest and preacher, to prelates and popes, to the called and the uncalled, to the inspired and the uninspired, to ecclesiastics and evangelists, to the right reverend and the wrong reverend of every name and every order, I say to them, one and all, "You may keep if you will the keys of heaven and hell; you may wear if you will the sacred robes of saintly idleness; you may round if you will your temples with the crown of a vanished authority; you may sway if you will the scepter of departed power; but we will take the keys of this world. We will unlock the doors of opportunity, we will open the temple of justice and drive from out its precincts parasite and special privilege and give to men and women now living the freedom and joy of life and love and labor!"

But can there be any religion without a god? And can we get along without a god?

I believe I have said often enough to be understood, that as far as the question of God is concerned, I am absolutely "neutral." I am for him if he justifies himself to me; I am against him if he offends my reason or violates my moral sense. I am not dogmatizing. I have never seen a god; I have never heard one described or pictured that I could respect. I have never found a revelation from any god that was of such a nature as to give me any respect for the alleged divine being. If there is a god, I say with Browning, "O God! We thank thee thou art not what we think thou art!"

But can there be a religion without a god? Not in the old sense of religion. If, as Martineau says, and Newman says, and the common opinion says, religion is the worship of and belief in some superhuman power, then there can not be religion without a god. But think, for a moment, what that word "god" means. There is no syllable in the language of mankind that has been so burdened and freighted with crime, with evil of every kind. The word "God" in the speech of common men is the pretense of or the delusion of the egotist and the refuge of the coward. If a man has reason for his conviction, he does not need divine authority. If behind his conviction there is the weight of honest thinking and clear perception, inspiration is not necessary. And if it is a falsehood that he has, inspiration can do it no good.

So, when men say of their creeds or their bibles that they "come from God," it is because they feel the necessity of some superhuman influence to make their creed current or their bible authoritative. God can not be organized into a church nor confined in a creed. There probably can not be any religion of the old kind without the god idea; but what about the religion of a new kind?

With or without God, what is the end of religion? What does the common man believe for? Why does he do penance? Why does he obey the church? Why does he pay pew rent?—some of them do. Why does he subscribe to a creed? What is the end, the purpose of it all? The purpose of it all is to secure happiness: it is a selfish proposition; the man is afraid. He is afraid of his God; he is afraid of his God's hell; he is afraid of his own future; he is afraid to enter without a letter of recommendation and a certificate of moral health into the presence of the majesty of the universe.

All religions have sprung out of that fear in the human heart. All sacrifice, all oblations, all incantations, all pilgrimages, all penances, all genuflections, all sacrifices of every kind have come from that idea of terror. The finite in the presence of the infinite has trembled and cowered and cringed and crawled in the dust. God is a king; you must go through a number of ante-chambers before you get to him; there is a warden at every door; there is a series of electric bells; they will announce your coming; they will telephone ahead your description; you cannot carry with you anything metal or money. It is an awe inspiring, a frightful thing to come into the presence of God: he is a king, he is a ruler, he is a sovereign, he is the majesty on high; you must have somebody to guarantee you. And that is the old underlying idea of religion: you must put him under obligation to you. Kill a goat, kill a rabbit: the more the better; but shed blood, appease, pacify, render propitious this terrible being that they call "God." That is religion; that is where all of these things come from: symbols and sacrifices and the cross. God is a god of blood, a gory god, a god to be abhorred.

Here is something I have heard time and time again. I have been hearing it for thirty years, and I heard it again within a week. An orthodox believer said to me, "You may be right—" speaking about the position of the Rationalist, "You may be right; I don't say you aren't. You may be wrong; I don't say you are. But," he says, "with my faith, if my faith is right I am all right; and if my faith is wrong, I am all right anyway because your faith is right." A man with that kind of a mental being and that moral conception needs to have several gods die for him.

If religion, then, is the means whereby to secure happiness, then there can be a religion without the god idea. And I wish to keep clear, now, from the positive philosophy of Comte. I take it for granted that the end of life, the chief end, the supreme end of life is to be happy,—not good, not moral, not pious; but happy. That the smile, and not the tear, should be the universal language; that music, and not threnody, should fill the echoing vaults of the world; that happiness is the true end of life.

But happiness can be acquired, by a cultured man, only as those around him are happy. While there is suffering in the world and we know it, none of us can be completely happy. While there is a child hungry or a mother's babe famished at her breast, or the shriveled hand of the beggar extended, food can never taste just the same to the just man. So then, in order to be happy, the whole world has to be happy. And if those nearest to us are unhappy, then the blame is partly ours; and so it comes that happiness as the end involves responsibility for the happiness of others; and you get also, as the only possible way of complete happiness for the individual, the complete happiness of all mankind. Thus we have a basis for religion, not in the skies, not on superstition, not on an imaginary being or god of any kind, but in simply the human relations which work out rationally and result at last in the complete fulfillment of the end of life,—happiness here and now.

The Christian or the religionist is expecting happiness through his religion; but he is expecting it in another world. He has got his name written in the Lamb's book of life; that is to say, he is on the waiting list, and expects to take from death's cold hand the crown of everlasting joy. That is compensation and reward for faith, for religious practices, for suffering and privations here.

I want none of it! The main business in going across this world is to take all that one can honestly, justly take in the way of happiness and pleasure and joy.

Religion, then, is not piety in the old sense; it is not conformity to any creed or custom or convention or moral standard or moral code. It is not serving God; it is serving mankind. It is not worship; it is helpfulness. This new religion is not in trying to escape from the wrath of God; it is trying to escape from the condemnation of one's self and one's neighbors. It is living so that, morning by morning, a man can take off his hat to his own conscience and smile in the face of his own self-respect. It is the religion that "tenderly carries in one's heart the sorrows of the world and looks through pity's tears upon the faults and frailties of mankind." It is the religion that fears no future, cringes and crawls before no god, worships at no shrine; but endeavors to live so as to add a little light, a little joy to this shadowed and sorrowing world.

The Bible is to be used in the reading test for aliens under the new immigration law that bars illiterates. The Department of Labor does not pretend that the volume has been chosen to give the immigrant a "spiritual interpretation of life," but explains that "it is the only book in virtually every tongue." The Catholic church discourages the reading of the Bible except under the guidance of a priest. Has the Department of Labor the authority to place an uncensored translation of the Bible before one of Rome's illiterates and make him read it if he can?

SCIENCE AND SIR OLIVER.

His Endorsement of Continuity and Its Effect on Mediums and Immortality.

In the "Lives of the Saints" we are told that when St. Aldebrand was ill a roast partridge was set before him for dinner. But being a vegetarian he blessed it, whereupon it rose up on the plate, the head and feathers came flying in at the door and it flew away. Grown men at one time believed the story even as children today believe in "Sindbad the Sailor." Credulity only takes different forms in different times and ages. No age nor any intelligence is exempt from credulity, for knowledge is a progressive state of intelligence. Pope appositely says:

"We think our fathers fools so wise we grow,
Our wiser sons, no doubt, will think us so."

We are apt to assume that our own age is not only the most intelligent that the world has ever seen, but the most intelligent that the world ever shall see. It needs only be stated to show its fallacy. Another fallacy of the day is that mediums are authorities on the problem of immortality. It naturally falls into the category of beliefs that the future will repudiate.

The European war with its cataclysmic destruction of human life has brought the problem of immortality very much to the fore. To millions of men in the trenches who may not be alive on the morrow it is the most momentous of all questions. If this life is the only one, why should it be sacrificed save for imperious necessity? The doctrine has loomed larger owing to the leading part which Sir Oliver Lodge has taken in affirming it; and especially in giving his whole-hearted support to the part which mediums are playing in the problem.

It seems a paradox that in an educated age, uneducated men and women should be authorities on this deepest problem of the day. On inquiring into their qualifications there is the utmost dubiety. Besides being uneducated, nearly all have been convicted of fraud. Though this would disqualify them in a bank, it seems to be of no consequence in such a vital matter as ascertaining the truth. Nor do mediums work in the light of day, but in dark seances with every facility for fraud. Nor do they, like lovers of truth, labor solely for truth's sake, but for hire.

The Greeks, the most enlightened nation of antiquity, did not believe in immortality. Esop in a fable makes the town mouse say to the country mouse, "Remember we are not immortal." Notwithstanding the advance of knowledge during the past two thousand years, some leading thinkers have reacted to the ages of ignorance preceding Esop.

While theology must necessarily support the doctrine as part of their creed inherited from an ignorant past, there is diversity of opinion in science. It is divided into two schools of thought. The skeptical, by far the most numerous, is represented by Haeckel, who sums up his opinion as follows: "Soul is not a special immaterial entity, but the sum of a number of connected functions in the brain; when the brain dies the soul comes to an end." Haeckel means that the body and mind of a man are inseparable. A man's mind only exists or comes into being with the body; both begin in the ovary and dissipate in the grave. There is "continuity" of the atoms of the body, for they are immortal; but there is no continuity of the body's individuality—its form, likeness, color, size, geniality, ferocity or credulity.

A canvass of American scientists on the question of a "Personal God and Immortality," carried out by Prof. Leuba of Bryn Mawr College, showed that out of 5,500 participants, "an astonishingly large percentage rejected both." Professor Wineburg of Petrograd practically represented the voice of the majority when he said: "I do not believe in either a personal God or immortality. No man who is a scientist can believe in either of these things." This seems rather a slap in the face to Sir Oliver Lodge, who represents the orthodox school of scientists, and calls for powerful counter argument and evidence from him; which unfortunately the world has not yet got.

Sir Oliver, however, does not assume a bigoted standpoint. He professes to approach the problem quite unprejudiced. Thus he says: "Science must have a free hand to explain nature to the utmost of her power and to state the results, whatever they may be, without fear of consequences and without favor or any consideration for either orthodoxy or heterodoxy." While no exception can be taken to this from the truth seeker's point of view, there may be a difference of opinion on the method of ascertaining the truth.

Immortality is no different from any other intellectual problem in gauging the qualifications of the investigators. We do not, for instance, send a watch to the shoemaker's to be mended. Neither would we send a thesis on immortality to the butcher to be solved. The only man who can solve the problem accurately is a physiologist, because it is a question concerned solely with the mechanism of the body and the brain. Thus while Sir Oliver is an eminent authority in physics, in physiology he is not so eminent. Instead, moreover, of consulting men who know something of the mechanism of the thinking machine, the brain, he goes to the opposite extreme and consults men and women who are absolutely ignorant of everything in either science or philosophy—mediums who hire themselves out to dupe people.

In his Presidential Address before the British Association at Birmingham in 1913 Sir Oliver announced his belief in immortality, or the "continuity of the individual after death"; but he withheld his proofs. He however attempted to buttress his opinions by his conceptions on consciousness. Now as a matter of fact no man in existence knows what consciousness is. Physiologists are dissecting their way to it, but the mechanism of consciousness in the brain has not yet been solved. Despite this fact, Sir Oliver says: "If you once realize that consciousness is something greater and outside of the particular mechanism which it makes use of, you will understand that the survival of existence is the natural, the simplest thing." But there is not a vestige of evidence that a man's consciousness is outside of his body. Sir Oliver's own consciousness could not be obtained from anything or anywhere but his own body. It can no more be separated from him than a tick from a watch, a tinkle from a bell, the tone from a violin or the bark from a dog.

If we allow validity of argument from assumptions as if they were facts, we shall be led into endless fallacies. For instance, we might say: "If you once realize that matter is independent of gravity, you will understand that blowing down the walls of Jericho by trumpets is the natural, the simplest thing." But when put to the test the walls won't blow down.

The solution of consciousness will probably be found in the dual mechanism of the brain. It consists of two hemispheres containing dual organs for all the senses with telephony between them through millions of nerve fibres. This telephony probably constitutes our consciousness. That almost anything may be accomplished by the brain mechanism may be apprehended when we know that each pin point of gray matter is a million times more complex in mechanism than a watch. Even therefore as we need not go outside of the mechanism of a watch for an explanation of its phenomena, so we need not go outside of the mechanism of the brain and its connections for a solution of all mental phenomena. There is thus no evidence for the supposition that a man's consciousness is a separate entity which is immortal.

The question for mankind today is, Who is the more credible, Haeckel or Sir Oliver Lodge? Haeckel is endorsed by practically all scientists, for only a moiety have agreed to accept seance as science. Sir Oliver, however, has also an endorsement, and it is a remarkable one. No sooner was his Presidential Address noised abroad by the newspapers than an epidemic broke out all over the world of mediums, palmists, thought-readers, crystal-gazers, fortune-tellers and other charlatans who reaped a harvest from multitudes of the ignorant and credulous, who, putting implicit faith in the opinions of such an eminent scientist, placed themselves unreservedly at the disposal of these mountebanks to be fleeced. The gratitude of these charlatans to Sir Oliver was unbounded, for owing to the advance of intelligence their business was dwindling. At the same time it is only fair to assume that it was furthest from Sir Oliver's thoughts to lend the weight of his great name to the furtherance of chicanery.

A further misfortune, however, happened. Preachers all over Europe and America demonstrated on Sir Oliver's authority that Darwinism was dead, that evolution was a fallacy, that man was not descended from the ape, and that science contained as much fallacy as truth.

Did not science, prostrate, turn with Cæsar's reproach, "And thou, Brutus?"

Sir Oliver has recently published a book professing to give messages from his son who was killed in France. These were not spoken to him direct, but through mediums whom his son never knew, and who were paid at the rate of two hundred and fifty dollars a month. The evidence cannot be called scientific; much of it Sir Oliver himself calls "nonsense." Why this "nonsense" should not vitiate the whole story seems to warrant explanation. The only effect of the book will probably be to still further increase the number of dupes and mountebanks.

When Sir Oliver sought truth by trying to combine science and seance, ordinary precautions would probably have saved him from deception. It is well known that it takes a thief to catch a thief; so it takes a medium to catch a medium. The more honest a man is, the easier he is duped. Alfred R. Wallace, Professor Crookes, and W. T. Stead were splendid game for mediums, they could be played with as a cat with a mouse; but it was a different story when the conjurors had to deal with conjurors. Thus if Sir Oliver had taken into his confidence an expert like Joseph F. Rinn, an American who exposed in New York the trickeries of Eusapia Palladino, an ignorant Italian peasant woman who had befooled all the scientists of Europe for twenty-five years, we would have had a different confession of faith. It is not yet too late. There is not the slightest doubt that Sir Oliver has been duped, and it is a duty he owes the world to rectify his error by a public recantation to counteract the publicity of his confession. A great man's Message is the world's greatest asset.

Professor Santayana in "Winds of Doctrine" inveighs against immortality as follows: "Nothing can be meaner than the anxiety to live on, to live on anyhow and in any shape; a spirit with any honor is not willing to live at all except in its own way."

Finally, a man as he is at present is only a transition animal. He has been in a thousand forms before today, and may be in other thousands of forms before the race, through all its evolutions, becomes absolutely extinct. Hence to argue that man in his present transitional stage shall have immortality and all his other stages none does not seem logical.

The only immortality we can approve is that of Samuel Butler:

"Yet meet we shall, and part, and meet again,
Where dead men meet, on lips of other men."

REDCOTE DEWAR.

Manhood, the Wealth of a Nation

The wealth of a nation is to be estimated by the number of healthy, moral and happy human beings that compose it. The material wealth may conceivably be a hindrance to the things which make men really wealthy. In the present condition of our country there is a salutary lesson for the world. With boundless means of production and complete political liberty, with universal education, and the higher grades of education put within the reach of all, this great nation has as yet failed to produce happiness and well-being, simply because the old delusion that wealth consists in the abundance of possessions was brought over to this country from the Old World. Men live feverish lives accumulating, not to enjoy, but for the mania of accumulation. The masses of the workers are in an unstable condition, and by the fluctuations of trade are either overstrained or reduced to idleness and penury. What ought to be the best and happiest State in the world is by no means the object of universal admiration and desire. Our politics are corrupt, the sport of interested self-seekers. Even the integrity of municipal administration is impossible to secure. In new cities, flanked with fertile prairies, there are the same slums that defile the cities of Europe. Religion and art are tainted by the commercial spirit. Prudential considerations arrest the growth of a native population, so that the state grows only by alien immigration.

The axiom, therefore, that manhood constitutes the wealth of a nation must be reasserted and refurbished. The rights of property have their place, but the rights of man take precedence. Human nature, human well-being, human development, and education must be the first consideration of the statesman, the legislator, the voter, the politician, as well as of the philosopher and the publicist. The invidious bars of birth and circumstance must be, as far as possible, broken, so that whatever faculty or power there may be in every individual may have its fair chance of developing for the good of the whole. Ancient forms and the ossification of an old society oppose the most formidable barriers to this natural claim of genius and ability. A wise social legislation aims, therefore, at a constant correction and readjustment.

R. E.

No man who knew that there was a good and wise God would be so foolish as to deny that God. No man would reject the words of God if he knew that God spoke those words. But the doctrine of the divine origin of the Scriptures rests upon the authority of the church, and the difference between the Infidel and the Christian is that the Infidel rejects and the Christian accepts the authority of the church.—Robert Blatchford.

God and My Neighbors.

Sent by my sister to carry a basket of eatables to a sick neighbor who is in need, I put on the table the stuff, among which were some eggs. Sister Nancy, a good M. E. lady, who was calling on the sick woman, said, "There, Mrs. Jordan, the Lord has sent you some eggs, if I did forget to bring any."

Strange are the ways of the Lord! He makes an Infidel woman send an Infidel man with eggs laid by pagan hens. And how strange that the Infidel woman's hens lay rather better in winter than do those of her godly neighbors! She never prays. She just putters around those hens with green stuff, hot mashies, and the like. Now Aunt Jenny's hens do not lay. And she has been a Campbellite since she was thirteen and says her prayers every night. She is poor; and, if the Lord would get busy and make her hens lay a whole lot now while eggs are so dear, it would be a worthy piece of benevolence. Surely the Lord must be able to make the biddies lay in any kind of weather.

Said Aunt Jenny to the Infidel once: "I don't know what you call yourself, but I call you just plain Infidel. You may make fun and say they ain't no devil and they ain't no God, but you jest wait a while and you'll find out. I'd like to be by when you lay a-dyin'. You'll screech and squeal then when the devil gets after you."

Two or three years later, the Infidel was ill. Every day Aunt Jenny called over the telephone to inquire concerning his condition. Was she interested in his recovery or anxious for the devil to have his chance? Quien sabe? But one day the Infidel was better and answered the phone himself. Said he: "You see, Aunt Jenny, I'm much better. I guess the devil ain't a-goane tuh git meh this time, after all." Said she: "How you do talk! He ain't never a-goane tuh get yeh."

This is reassuring in spite of the good old lady's double negatives.

In the Independent a while ago appeared a good editorial on the problems of the Episcopal church. From it I quote a choice bit for my brother truth-seekers:

"Twenty years ago John Burroughs wrote: 'The religious skeptics of today are a very large class, larger than ever before, and they are among the most helpful, intelligent, patriotic, upright, and wisely conservative of our citizens. Probably four-fifths of our literary men are such; a large proportion of journalists and editors; half the lawyers; more than half the doctors; a large percentage of the teachers; almost all of the scientific men.' If this was true then it is still more true now. Nor must the term 'skeptics' in this connection have any evil connotation. These persons are what they are here called in the sense that they doubt many things which they think the church calls upon them to believe. Can the church speak to them so plainly and directly as to convince them that they have largely misunderstood her? The answer is that she cannot convince them while she retains in her formularies things which she herself only makes believe to believe. For these men stand upon a high level of truth and righteousness."

It is amusing to see the pretenses put up by hypocrites. One of these is that Atheism is unspeakably evil, that for one to be an Atheist is an overwhelming disgrace. It is not difficult to see why it is deemed good policy to assume that Atheism is shocking, that the Atheist is outside the pale. As a subject for any sort of religious imposition and graft the disbeliever in a personal god and immortality is hopeless. Hence all sorts of farmers of superstition unite in attempts to decry him.

Atheism is no new thing. If a thing becomes respectable by virtue of age, surely Atheism has its claim to that honor. "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God," was remarked a long, long time ago. So even in gray antiquity some were observing and penetrating enough to be Atheists, although, as in our own time, they may have found it politic not to utter their disbelief. And we see that even then farmers of superstition tried to belittle the Atheist by calling him a fool, a method much used by such gentry even to this day.

How horrible it seems to us when the innocent is made to suffer for the guilty! The situation is a favorite one with the writer of fiction, and when we read of the undeserved suffering of the innocent one, our eyes fill with tears of sympathy and we denounce the villain who permits such a thing to be.

There is an old novel, "The Silence of Dean

Maitland," that contains an illustration of vicarious punishment. A young clergyman commits a crime. Circumstances fix this crime upon an honorable young man, lover of the clergyman's sister. He is convicted and transported for a long term of years. The young clergyman goes on with his career, marries and becomes a great preacher. The author ends his story well, of course, but he gives us a good picture of the awfulness of vicarious punishment, and the weakness and baseness of one who allows another to suffer for his fault.

But in theology people pretend to admire vicarious punishment.

According to the newspaper, the kaiser expects "with God's help" to conquer. But to an outsider it seems that the Germans are not leaving much for "God" to do. I would respectfully suggest to the kaiser that he have his armies lay-off from their strenuous efforts and give "God" a chance to show what his help is worth.

Several of my best loved friends and relatives have died and passed into the great silence. One of these was a lady who was afflicted with the spiritualistic "bee." Yet, though to me the subject of immortality is not "unpopular," and I have longed for some sign from the dead, if they still exist, not even a rap has ever come to me.

Great is the mystery of holiness! The Bible is ostentatiously labeled "holy." Temple harlots and catamites, who of old carried on their profession in the temples, for the benefit of the priests, were holy and their business was holy. When the priest performs the wedding ceremony the result is holy matrimony. Flesh offered to the god in sacrifice was holy, and to eat it made the priests holy also. Nowadays the priest can take a cracker and by the use of a little magic transform it into something inexpressibly holy. To be idle on the first day of the week is holy, and if one lies for the glory of a god, he is a holy man.

Here is a true spirit story. Sir Oliver Lodge may use it if he wishes. It is not copyrighted.

Mrs. S., a Spiritualist, was taken violently ill. Her sister, not a Spiritualist, went to nurse her. Then the Spiritualist friends held a seance to inquire of the ghosts concerning the prospects for the recovery of Mrs. S., who at that time was seemingly on the mend. The spooks, as reported, said that under the care of the sister Mrs. S. would recover. But a few days later, Mrs. S. had another attack of her malady and died.

Here is a queer old ghost story. "The tombs were opened, and a number of the saints who slept the sleep of death rose up—they left the tombs after his resurrection and entered the holy city and appeared to a number of people."

The queerest thing about this one is that, though the saints rose up at the moment of the death of Jesus; they sat waiting in the tombs for at least (according to the R. C. church) forty hours, until Jesus had risen, before they came out and did business. But leave out the phrase, "after his resurrection," and the yarn reads quite like those old Uncle Rastus used to tell. Can it be that some one, trying to reconcile the story with Paul's claim that Jesus was the first ever to rise from the dead, put that phrase in and thus changed an ordinary ghost tale into a puzzle?

Our very noble and approved good masters want us Reubs to raise more stuff to feed them on and for them to speculate in. We are to farm the land and they will farm us. They will even see that we are taught how to dig and delve so as to turn out more product. Say they, "Dig away, boys, and keep thinking of heaven. We'll attend to the rest. Pay your taxes and ask no questions."

Not long ago I read that among the ancient Babylonians the 7th, 14th, 21st and 28th days of the month were unlucky, that it was deemed rash and foolhardy to begin an undertaking on one of these days.

Such a notion concerning Sunday exists here among the country folk. Once I lost an old horse. A neighbor said of me: "It's no wonder he lost a horse. He works on Sunday." But not long afterward the same man lost a valuable young horse himself.

The folks feign to believe that God punishes one who works on Sunday, that as they say, "If you work on Sunday, you'll lose more than you'll gain"—a superstition that the preachers are anxious to cultivate.

But really the folks are not as much afraid of God, I think, as they are of "what will people say?"

ROBINSON CRUSOE.

NOTES AT LARGE.

The liberal-minded man is often taunted by the pious religionist for his lack of respect for sacred things. The habit has fairly grown into a usage, so persistent has the objector been in his criticism of the secular type of mind. Now and then, however, the world is treated to an exhibition of ecclesiastical disregard for honored places and things quite unknown to ordinary worldly society. The ruinous condition and possible demolition of old St. John's Church on Varick street in New York city is a case in point. For more than two years the city authorities have called the attention of Trinity Church Corporation, which owns St. John's, to the decaying condition of the old church, and that a part of the building extends across the city line, and may require to be torn down in order to meet the needs of widening the street. Personal appeals from all classes of individuals, believers and unbelievers alike, to Trinity Corporation for the preservation of the Varick street building, to be used as the future may decide, have resulted in the simple statement that the building is no longer available for religious purposes, and the conclusion drawn has naturally been that the Corporation cares no more about the old church. The Architectural League of New York has now petitioned the church authorities to save the old building, and letters from individuals are again pouring in to the Corporation Office having the same request to make. The excuse for all this indifference on the part of Trinity Church obviously arises from the fact that St. John's Chapel is no longer a money-maker. It has served its usefulness, and as there is no sure evidence that it will ever again prove to be a source of revenue, it seems to be of little consequence to the church people what becomes of it. But where is the reverence for sacred things supposed to be characteristic of Christian believers? Where is the love for a truly artistic structure which is one of the few remains of the New York of our forefathers? Where is the spirit of religious co-operation with the numerous intelligent and high-minded people who sincerely desire to see the fine old pile preserved? Trinity Corporation is like most other trust companies established in the world, it has a keen eye to business; and when any one of its chapels fails to return a satisfactory income, it becomes a question for the public to decide whether or not it be continued, otherwise the building is closed indefinitely. The truth is that there is no greater spirit of reverence for things worth while among religious people than among the unreligious. It is all make-believe. There is one common bond, however, which closely links the religious and the business world, and that bond is money. Who will buy St. John's Chapel? That is the problem of Trinity's lack of veneration. With the church it is always money, money, and then money.

The prayers of United States Senate chaplains are published in the Congressional Record. Here is the one for April 6, by the Rev. J. L. Kibler:

"O God, our heavenly Father, unworthy though we be, we still lift our eyes unto the hills from whence cometh our help. In this time of appalling war, and our entrance into the awful struggle, we realize our need of thee, O God, more than ever before. Our country needs thee; our President, our Congress, our governors, our soldiers, and all our people scattered over our vast territory need thy overruling providence, thy wisdom, and grace, and power."

"Thou hast sustained us in the past and blessed us with great progress because we trusted in thee and built our foundation upon thy principles. Surely thou hast not dealt thus with any nation. We have stood before the world as a God-fearing people, and, therefore, we have been a God-honored people."

"O God, may we not forget thy mercies, which have been ever of old. May we remember that thou hast pronounced thy blessing upon that nation whose God is the Lord. Wherever our people and our soldiers may go may the world still read our shining motto upon our coin, 'In God we trust.'"

"May we not lose sight of our dependence upon thee, O God. If we must go forth to war, oh grant that we may receive our orders from the skies and look confidently to thee as our great leader. As thou didst divide the sea and save thy people Israel from their enemies, so do thou remove our difficulties and deliver us from all our foes. O thou great Jehovah, be with us still and guide us safely through every peril, and if it be thy way to bring peace and liberty to the world, we pray thee give speedy triumph to our arms. We ask it in the name of him who is strong to save and mighty to deliver, Jesus Christ the Lord. Amen."

The prayer contains a number of statements of alleged facts and an equal number of requests. Not one of the statements, not excepting the allusion to the passage through the Red Sea, has any basis of truth; and not one of the requests will ever be granted by God so that you can notice it. What is the use of lying? Is it because religion cannot subsist upon truth? We notice that one newspaper is exploiting the careless remark of Edith Wharton that "it is impossible for any Christian nation not to be at war with Germany." Yet Spain, the most Christian nation on the globe in its own opinion, is not at war with Germany; and Austria, nearly if not quite as sunk in Christianity as Spain, is not only not at war with Germany but is her most loyal ally. As we said before, what is the use of lying?

If THE TRUTH SEEKER cannot say a good word today for the German kaiser, it can at least plead consistency in its position, which is more than can be claimed by the press in general and some public men. When our Colonel Roosevelt was at the height of his popularity, one of America's most distinguished diplomats stated that the difference between Roosevelt and William Hohenzollern was "national not personal." Personally they were mates. But the New York Sun now says that Theodore Roosevelt "stands revealed the true and unquestioned representative of America," and we should not like to reproduce some of the things it has said of William. Here is what THE TRUTH SEEKER said of the latter and his government twenty years ago:

"Emperor William of Germany is suspicious of the effect of Freethought on the tyranny which he calls lawful authority. These are his sentiments: 'The most practical protection of throne and altar against the destructive tendencies of an anarchic and Infidel party is to be found in the regaining of these unbelievers to Christianity and to the church. Thus will they seek to recognize the lawful authority of the monarchy and learn to appreciate it. Greater stress must therefore be laid upon Christian social beliefs.' Despotism has never had a more powerful ally than a church which depends for its revenues upon the favor of the state, and no state has been more oppressive than those that evoked the aid of the church for the enslavement of its subjects. A government that needs to be galvanized by superstition ought to die."

The paragraph appeared in the number of THE TRUTH SEEKER for July 10, 1897. We solicit to these authentic remarks by Emperor William the attention of those persons by whom the emperor's Christian zeal is doubted or denied. We are glad we wrote so long ago that "the tyranny which he calls lawful authority" and which still exists "ought to die." The hope arises that is now committing suicide, and that all religiously inspired military autocracies may follow suit.

One result of carrying the war into Asia Minor is the discovery of the site of the Garden of Eden! It was made by a soldier, a young Englishman named Robert Fort, who was once in Pewabic, Mich., and wrote back to an acquaintance there as follows:

"Perhaps it would be interesting to the church people at Pewabic to know that I have marched over 200 miles through the country where Adam and Eve were created. I have already seen some places of interest. The first was the Garden of Eden, where we camped three days, and another place was the tomb of Ezra, the burial place of the man who wrote the book of Ezra in the Bible. The place is deserted now and the tomb is in ruins with the exception of a beautiful blue dome."

The Marquette Mining Journal, which prints Fort's letter, speaks of the Garden of Eden as "the scene of creation," and says that the faith of Stephen Jenkins of Quincy, who has always believed the Bible, has been greatly strengthened by this message from the said scene. Fort states that where he is camping "is the hottest climate in the world." He must sympathize deeply with the polar bear that was brought there to parade before Adam and be named. We may expect to hear from some marine that the anchor of his ship has brought up a wheel of Pharaoh's chariot from the bottom of the Red sea, or from an electrician who proves from the absence of telegraph poles in Mesopotamia that in Adam's day they used wireless telegraphy. The identification of the tomb of Ezra, of which only a blue dome remains, does not stir us like the account by Mark Twain, who tells with emotion how he wept at the tomb of Adam. As regards Eden, we find in the Encyclopedia Biblica that the fantastic tale is an old Babylonian myth naturalized; and of the book of Ezra that it is so called because some one named Ezra cuts a leading figure in it, while the compiler is anonymous, but probably the same literary gentleman who is responsible for the book of Chronicles.

Once we were visited by a woman residing in this city whose errand was to know what we could do to reclaim her husband who had resigned his position as illustrator on a newspaper in order to devote himself to expounding the prophecies as interpreted by the Second Adventists. Whether our advice helped or not we never learned. This week we have received a letter from a woman in another state asking us not to send her husband any more of our literature because he has lost his job by talking about it to his fellow workmen. Her husband, she says, carries his missionary work even further, and reads to visitors at his home, although he knows them to be Christians, so that they do not come any more. The inharmony thus engendered has caused the husband to live in one part of the house and the wife in another. The wife thinks the husband's mind is unbalanced by too much study of religious subjects, and the husband complains that the wife's mind is uninformed. She thinks that since he does not believe in religion, he ought to keep quiet about it. He holds that when a man is convinced a thing is a fraud he ought to expose it. These two cases, the one first mentioned and this one, are opposite in their nature, and we do not see why both should be brought to us. If it was our duty to advise the Freethinking wife how she might reclaim her husband from the Second Advent delusion, it cannot also be our function to help the Christian wife cure her husband of his enthusiasm for Freethought. She should apply to the minister. Had the husband complained of his wife's invincible fanaticism, we should have counseled him to moderate his conversation when in her presence and that of her religious friends; or as to his loss of his job by talking too much, our judgment would be that the job should have first consideration. A man's means of livelihood and his home life are more vital than the expression of his views in irrelevant circumstances.

In connection with the Suffragist movement much has been said about the relativity of the sexes which has added little glory to the speakers, whether men or women. These mouthings about sexual distinctions in brain and in mental ability, as indicating inferiority or superiority, have no foundation in biology. The question is never one of equality from a biological standpoint. The true question is one of complementary development, resting absolutely on a natural law, that of the conservation of energy. Havelock Ellis, in his interesting book, "Man and Woman," remarks upon the greater "affectability" of woman as compared with the male; a readier response to emotional stimuli as a result of her more mobile vaso-motor nervous system, and the greater rôle which the abdominal organs play in her life. This physiological fact must be recognized in considering any question relative to the expansion of woman's sphere. The same writer also observes that woman is nearer the child in her general development, but "is not undeveloped man"; that "the child represents a higher degree of evolution than the adult," and that "the progress of the race has been a progress in youthfulness—in some respects it has been a progress in feminization." In the progress of individual expansion woman is bound to free herself from worn-out patriarchal traditions. One thing, however, she will never escape—the fundamental, potential nature of her organization, for by her bodily powers the race exists, and her mind takes on the same qualities; not the kinetic, inventive faculties of the restless male, but the steadfast, race-fostering qualities of the mother. As we said in another connection: "The absurdity of declaring one thing inferior to another when the two things are not alike in their true differentiating qualities, seems never to have entered the brain of those who have labored so assiduously in recent years to depreciate womankind." Our advice to all such persons is to make a careful study of the book above named; in other words, to study biology.

To say that man is born in sin because a woman named Eve transgressed in a garden called Eden, and that God has condemned all mankind on the ground of that transgression, is to confuse every judgment, intellectual and moral. How can the conscience work if it is led into the false position that the fault of a distant ancestor lies at its door? The first condition of a healthy working of the conscience is to feel the responsibility for what we have done or left undone ourselves, and to be assured that for this alone we are to be held accountable. How can human nature understand or love or obey God if we are to suppose that the basis of his dealings with men is an injustice, an arbitrary decree which causes generations of helpless beings to spring out of one mother, all tainted, corrupted, enfeebled, by her distant, and not very heinous, sin? The God who sanctioned the doctrine of original sin was not, and could not be, benevolent, just, or moral. Men cannot attribute such a thought to a loving God without seriously injuring themselves. They cannot set up arbitrary injustice on the throne of the universe as the object of devotion and worship without warping their own judgment and hardening their own heart. Yet this is the basic doctrine of Christianity. Upon this is founded man's need of a redeemer, and the entire superstructure known as the sacramental system of the church. When seriously contemplated, it seems almost past believing that any normally constructed person would relinquish his sense of right and justice for the purpose of sustaining such a crude and improbable conception of a Supreme Being.

Want of acquaintance with the history of religious beliefs is displayed by the editor of the Minneapolis Journal when in his Easter editorial he affirms that Jesus, alluded to as that "firstborn among many brethren," brought visibly to light the proofs of the immortality of man. In the nature of things immortality cannot be proven. A future life may be demonstrated, perhaps, but that it is never-ending is not susceptible of demonstration. The contemporaries of Jesus might believe in his resurrection because they were accustomed to the thought, having become so through familiarity with the stories of other risen persons. Rising from the dead, one would think, was a habit, so many were accredited with doing it. The Infidel Celsus, referring to Jesus, asked, "How can the dead man be immortal?" and the church father Origen replied: "Since the resurrection of Jesus Christ is a subject of mockery to unbelievers, we shall quote the words of Plato that Herus, the son of Armenius, rose from the funeral pile twelve days after he had been laid upon it." Now Plato lived and wrote more than three hundred years before Christ, and the resurrection of Herus, which he mentions, must have antedated that of Jesus and "brought visibly to light the proofs of the immortality of man" at least three centuries in advance of the event which Christians celebrate on Easter Sunday. At any rate, it belongs to the class of myths with which the people were familiar and so helped to make possible a belief in the myth of the resurrection of Christ.

When there is a fire with a church in it, whatever happens to the sacred edifice is a "miracle." The fire that destroyed four blocks of Asbury Park, built of wood, was stopped when it had gutted the First Methodist church, because the walls were stone and did not burn. The Newark Evening News remarks that the ruins of that church "seem to stand for a kind of divine interposition, sent just in the nick of time, to save possibly a large section of the city." To some one else it might appear that the apparent "purpose" of the fire, if Providence controlled it, was to get that church; and having put the church out of business the purpose was accomplished and the fire checked. Divine interposition is a back-number and a has-been. The order of the day is prevention, and of this divinity knows nothing. The other day it allowed the ammunition works at Eddystone, Pa., to blow up, with a loss of one hundred and twenty lives, mostly those of women and girls. Providence could have shown no more indifference if the cause of the loss of life among females had been a bomb dropped from the sky by a zeppelin.

An Albany dispatch dated April 10 said: "The Senate Codes Committee by a five to four vote tonight decided to report favorably the Walker bill permitting Sunday moving picture exhibitions in New York and Buffalo all day, in second class cities after 1 o'clock and in all other places after 3 o'clock. The bill is expected to pass the Senate, but not enough votes have been secured yet for its passage in the Assembly." The measure is a proper one except for its discriminations. Why should that which is allowed during certain hours on Sunday be prohibited during other hours, and why distinguish between cities of the first and second class and "all other places?"

The Rev. John Haynes Holmes of the Unitarian Church of the Messiah in this city, who is an incurable pacifist, says that in the impending conflict he will not pray for the success of America. Would it alter the outcome if he did?

Sad news from the tabernacle: "The collections have hardly been what was expected."

Every national church or religion has established itself by pretending some special mission from God, communicated to certain individuals. The Jews have their Moses; the Christians their Jesus Christ, their apostles and saints; and the Turks their Mahomet, as if the way to God was not open to every man alike.—Thomas Paine.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in the Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privileges or advantages shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

MONISM VS. GRAVITATION.

From L. H. Magee, Missouri.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Having read Mr. Russell's reply to my theory of gravitation, I was strongly impressed by the many points on which we agree; but never intended laying any stress on an indivisible atom: and as it does not concern my theory, I will not undertake a defense of said point, but will describe aforesaid atom as it actually is, and let every one judge for himself whether it be divisible or not.

I have no objection to a rotating mass of the ether known as electron; but we must not get confused ideas of the true nature of this extending space occupying things in itself of which electrons and everything else are composed.

Neither must we confuse our minds with hazy ideas of mysterious forces, energies and motions. There is and forever has been one primitive substance. It does not fill all space, but is composed of atoms or parts, distributed through all known space, with vast unoccupied interspaces between the atoms.

Each and every one of those atoms are solids of perfect density extending in and occupying all the space within their boundaries from center to circumference. Motion is "nothing in itself" any more than rest. Motion is a state of non-rest of the "thing in itself." Rest is a state of non-movement of the "thing in itself." Hence when we speak of energies, forces and motion, we must not confuse our minds with a bodiless whirlpool of nothing, hurling things or non-things everywhere, but instead must think of this extending atom or collection of such, in a state of movement, which will continue in such uniform state until coming in contact with another body, whose inertia of uniform motion or rest will resist its inertia of uniform motion and as a result of said touch, each body will be repelled from line of greatest traction in accordance with established laws of action and reaction.

Hence Mr. Russell is mistaken when he asserts motion only can resist motion, for the inertia of a body in a state of rest or uniform motion can only resist or change the momentum or direction of another moving body.

Now Mr. Perry seems to overlook the conservation of energy when he asserts substance is continually creating motion. There is and forever has been a given amount of motion in the universe. This motion can never grow less or greater. A moving object can impart its momentum to another object by losing an equal amount of momentum itself, but movement is uncreatable. When we speak of latent forces, we don't mean some mysterious bodiless force lying motionless within said object, which some day will arise from its motionless state and move said object, but instead we mean a collection of units, which are real bodies in a state of movement among themselves. But the aggregation of moving bodies constitute a unit which is in a state or rest or non-movement as a whole.

Through the conception of this simple atom to which philosophy must ever return from its metaphysical wanderings, along with established laws of movement, I can show why objects tend to move toward the greatest mass, as explained by Newton.

I have not the space here to trace step by step the collection of those primitive atoms into units. With a central collision point through and around which they revolve in a solar system effect, and how this evolved unit will collect with its neighbors on and on; but will say there is no logical reason for imagining some mysterious stored-up force or movement without an extending body, travels out from the attracting object and by some means induces it to move toward attracting object.

The truth is, real moving bodies travel out from attracting object and in accordance with known laws of touch and repulsion, force attracted to move toward attracting object.

Now if this ether substance fills all space, there could be no movement within the universe, for there must be parts to move and room to which they might move, and seeing there is no unoccupied room or space within the universe, if said parts moved ever so little they must force their immediate neighbors to disoccupy, who in their turn must force their neighboring parts to disoccupy on indefinitely, which could only result in moving the whole universal mass as a solid unit.

Neither would there be any parts within the universe to move, for it would be one vast solid unit extending in and occupying all the space within its boundary in uniform continuity from center to circumference, between whose parts no line of distinction could be drawn; hence it could have no parts but must be classed as one part of perfect unity from center to circumference.

But this leads to other incomprehensible conclusions. Using space or nothing but room for something extends everywhere, which being occupied would make the boundary of this thing so large it could not exist, and we could argue with equal logic it had neither center or circumference, or center and circumference were everywhere or nowhere. Nothing or no thing is boundless.

Mr. Russell seems unaware that his idea of the universe is exactly what he argues science has proven doesn't exist, that is, an indivisible atom; for if the universe were divided, there would be unoccupied space between the halves which would be pushed back or expanded, and as there is no unoccupied space to which it might expand it is indivisible.

I feel it is unnecessary for me to offer further reasons for holding on to the idea of comprehensible atoms with a definite center, circumference or form, instead of an incomprehensible space-filling substance without form, a dense motionless solid which resolves itself into a void abstraction incomprehensible to reason and unsupported by logic.

MARRIAGE CONDEMNED.

From J. A. Wilson, California.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Some of Mr. Eshleman's letters have given me the impression that he had not been long out of religion. His letters on marriage convince me that he is not out yet. His worship of a religious institution, and also his attitude toward those who disagree with him, is characteristically Christian. For instance, one who looks lightly upon the sacrament of marriage, he regards as a venomous reptile. How much like the Christian that sounds! Many times have I heard pious believers say that same thing concerning those who deny the divinity of Jesus, or the inspiration of the Bible.

I don't think Mr. Kusel will lose much sleep on account of Mr. Eshleman's opinion. We in Los Angeles, who know Mr. Kusel, hold no such opinion. In all the qualities that make a man a good neighbor, we consider him far above the average. Did it ever occur to Mr. Eshleman that Mr. Kusel, myself, and thousands of others may regard those who uphold the rotten, tyrannical institution of marriage, as venomous reptiles? Perhaps not, because we are not as prone to use epithets as are those whose business is to impose their ideas upon others. But I can say at least, that I have a decidedly unfavorable opinion of the quality of Mr. Eshleman's Rationalism. It has too large a percentage of prejudice and intolerance. His assumed superior morality, and pretense of charity for Mr. Kusel, have all the ear marks of Christian bigotry. I admit that Mr. Eshleman is correct in calling marriage a "sacred" institution. Pope Leo XIII agrees with him in this, as quoted in your issue of March 10. Sacred is the opposite of secular. How can a Rationalist consistently uphold the enforcement of a sacrament? Some people have an idea that when they have advanced far enough to doubt that Jesus is God, they are full grown Rationalists. A person who cannot apply reason to all questions is still under the control of prejudice. Mr. Eshleman says Mr. Kusel's idea of sex is the idea of the red light district. That isn't true, because Mr. Kusel's idea is that sex association should be based on mutual desire, which would eliminate commercialism. It would be nearer the truth to say that marriage was the idea of the red light district, because it has all the bad features of the red light district, and many worse ones in addition.

The women of the red light district are not deceivers. They do a square business. If not hounded by men of Mr. Eshleman's stamp, they would probably be as clean as any women. They offer themselves to men for a short time, for a stated sum. They make no further claim on them. The quality of pleasure derived is doubtless equal to that enjoyed by the man who has a wife who married him for money, or a home, which amounts to the same. The married woman sells herself for life, and promises not to break the contract, no matter how unsatisfactory it may become. Is that rational? Is it wise?

Paine declared that every man should favor free speech because every man should have an opportunity to change his own mind. People who marry promise never to change their minds, and, although very few can keep that promise, other people, who believe in marriage, compel them to live together, simply because they were ignorant enough to promise to be satisfied even if not satisfied. How ridiculous!

Marriage does not hold people together who desire to be together. For such, no compulsion is necessary. All it does is to bind people together who wish to be apart. I presume Mr. Eshleman is married. Suppose all marriage laws were immediately repealed, would he run away from his wife? If he wouldn't, then clearly it was not the marriage sacrament which held them together. If he would, then my contention is proven that the marriage law holds together only those who want to be, and therefore ought to be, apart.

As for the welfare of children, could there be a worse environment than a home where, if parents do not actually detest each other, they are at least indifferent, simply trying to make the best of a galling condition? Professor Larkin stated some time ago, that he had made a study for years, of married people who visited the Echo Mountain Observatory, and had never seen a married pair that treated each other with the respect, tenderness and consideration, that unmarried people have for each other. Close observation on my part compels me to corroborate Professor Larkin's opinion, which is, that "happy homes," of which we hear so much, is a pure myth.

Sometimes a couple will insist that they are happy, but on close observation, I have invariably found that they were not. One man assured me that he and his wife were happy because they were "one." "Then," said I, "one of you has swallowed up the other." "No," he said, "we have not lost our individuality by becoming one." I was just about to say that such a statement was an utter absurdity, when his wife declared that she had lost her individuality. I left them fighting over it.

An old lady thought I was mistaken in believing that all married people were unhappy. "My son and his wife," said she, "get along harmoniously." "That," said I,

"is a very unusual case." "Oh, well," she remarked, "my son always does whatever his wife tells him to." Very simple. In that case it was the man who had been swallowed. People have been living under marriage laws for centuries. During all these years they have found that marriage was the end of romance and independence, and the beginning of discord and slavery. How many, many times I have heard men and women declare that marriage had brought them little but unhappiness, and yet so irrational is the average mind, they tell their children to go on and make the same kind of mistakes. Great is the power of superstition!

Of all the sacraments enacted into law, marriage has caused more misery than all others combined. I cannot think of a single thing to say in its favor. It is a grand source of blackmail for the adventurer. Think of the thousands of men who are trapped simply for alimony. Think of the thousands more who are held up for breach of promise money. What could be more disgusting? It is a grand rake-off for preachers, lawyers and others who want something for nothing. By keeping the masses in ignorance of means to limit birth-control, the law virtually compels them to breed children to fill the sweat shops, recruit the army, and provide the parasites with luxuries. In the face of all this, here is a man who has the "gall" to refer to freedom as a "sinister influence."

APPLIED CHRISTIANITY.

From Edwin Zeva, South Carolina.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I am frankly a rank outsider. I have little knowledge of church customs and cult, but have learned from long experience that, if morality and honor dwell in the organized church, it certainly finds little to thrive upon, and is, at the most, rather tolerated than fostered.

The incident which constrains me to this humble effort occurred in South Carolina, in and about the hamlet of North.

The Baptist church has an organization of mendicants, whose appeal for financial aid is made because of their laudable purpose of expending the moneys thus secured to provide good Christian homes for orphans.

No man could wish to give to a better cause, if the children, bereft of parents, were aided to grow into useful manhood and womanhood, educated to give them opportunities which their helplessness would otherwise preclude.

With this purpose no fair-minded person could quarrel, and even the modicum of superstition which would be instilled might be forgiven, if the greater good were accomplished. The sad fact is that the children who are thus adopted are merely acquired for the sake of the labor they may perform and the educational portion is sadly neglected.

This is in itself criminal, but the case I shall cite eludes my ability to classify; therefore, I shall merely chronicle it.

Little Ethel, aged 10, was one of the orphans who was given a home a few years since, she being adopted by one of the brethren named Jones. Her education was perhaps limited, but she was taken to church each Sunday, to learn that God, in his allwise providence, had mercifully given her a happy home, where she might receive her quota of pork and corn bread, and garments fitting her humble station, in return for such trifling services as sweeping, cooking, baking, bed-making and field labor in season, as she might perform from "kin to kan't." That is, from the time in the morning when one can see to the time at night when one cannot. After four years, Brother Jones was one day possessed of a devil, which led him to take Ethel to Orangeburg and, returning at night, to seduce her. The result of this was, Ethel became a prospective mother, and Brother Jones, to shield her from the disgrace of her sin, took her to Columbia and giving her six dollars and a cheap grip, left her.

Ethel first went to the people of her church for aid, and was sent by them to the Salvation Army; they, in turn, referred her to a Rescue Mission, which took her in.

News came home, and the questions of the worldly-minded (for even here some people think) made it necessary for the elders of the church to go and investigate the sad case of Ethel. She told them all, and they returned and met in solemn conclave to debate what should be done regarding the sinners.

The question was asked: Shall Ethel be retained in the church?

One of the brethren who had been to see her in Columbia said: "She begged us, with tears in her eyes, not to put her out of the church, and I propose that we magnanimously forgive her, for she promised to live a good life henceforth."

This was accordingly done, and Ethel was permitted to escape the wrath of the Christian body she had disgraced, and remain an absent member.

Then came the question: What shall be done regarding Brother Jones?

By the way, Jones was a man with a wife and family, some of his children being older than the misguided Ethel. The valiant defender of Ethel spoke up and said: "Since they were partners in crime, and we have decided to condone the sin of Ethel, we can do no less than forgive Brother Jones, for they were equally guilty." This certainly was true.

The child, just entering womanhood, with nature asserting its function, undoubtedly should be adjudged as equally guilty with the practiced libertine, of no one knows how many escapades. So Brother Jones was duly forgiven and retained in the church for the nonce.

But some of the "lily whites" who at least had not been caught in their indiscretions, protested.

How could they hold up their virtuous heads, and commune with the sinful Jones? Verily, it could not be; therefore, he was asked to resign, and at the next revival was converted, baptized and his sins were washed away. Thus was Brother Jones saved and made whole again, and he is now a leading, prosperous citizen.

What became of Ethel? Her child was born, died, was buried in the Potter's Field, and she sank into oblivion.

Perhaps she kept her tearful promise and lived a good life. More probably she became one of the fallen women, living in the house of ill-fame owned by some good Christian brother, and rented for an extortionate price to its base inmates. Perhaps the money for which she sells herself goes, in part, to the worthy brother who in turn donates a mite therefrom to Christianize the heathens of Africa.

Be that as it may, Ethel is forgotten. In the many cares which beset the worthy organization, in their many needs toward saving the world in its remotest corner, how could they be expected to find time to think of Ethel?

SOMETHING ANENT "MORALITY."

From T. R. Boehme, Washington.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

From time to time Mr. Eshleman entertains us with dissertations about the Moral Law and Morality which may be regarded as sublime or silly according to one's way of thinking. The idea that morality is a relative quality—differing according to ages and places and conceptions, differing even among the same people at different times—is absolutely abhorrent to him. Were he less a Freethinker and a believer in a free press and free speech, he would favor censoring all such ideas. As it is he begs editors and lecturers never to let such views go unanswering.

I have not one objection to Mr. Eshleman's holding his views; but I perceive that he fails to think a little beyond the question and shows a bias in his views that, to me, seems almost theological. Mr. Eshleman says that the denial of a moral law means that in the problems of life we can never know positively what is right and what is wrong. Precisely: we never could and probably never shall be able to determine right and wrong from a standpoint of absoluteness. We can only judge them by the accepted, prevailing ethical code, which must of necessity be relative. Continues Mr. Eshleman, that in the absence of a moral law we could not teach our children any fundamental principles of decency. Absolutely not so. One can instruct the young in the precept "Thou shalt not steal," because that is the prevailing ethical code. But that does not exclude a state of things or of society in which thievery might be a virtue as honesty is a virtue now. In point of fact the ancient Spartans taught their children to steal as religiously as we strive to teach ours not to steal. It was a virtue, unquestioned, unchallenged and right. Those that did not steal or could not lacked certain elements in their make-up and were looked down upon. Which standard is right and which wrong? And according to what absolutism? And where does the moral law come in? Mathematically, moral action is action in accordance with the accepted ethical code; in Sparta stealing coincided with accepted ethics, therefore, stealing was moral. It takes but a little thinking ability to conceive a society in which its members could steal indiscriminately from one another with impunity and without shame and attain the same property standards that bless our present form. For the right to steal would involve the right to steal back, the acts thus neutralizing each other in degree. The biggest thief could, in such a society, be the "biggest" and most respected man. What about the "moral law" as regards property rights then? The fact is, we are not far from such a state of affairs now. Only we call it "business" and "finance." Yet this supposed society might easily subscribe to many of our "virtues" and "moral laws," such as the single standard and monogamy, etc.

If one will but scan English literature as found in the writings of Richardson and Fielding one will soon see that all such subjects as are taboo with us were the morsels of choice conversation among the "better classes" of that day. Was that moral? According to present conceptions, certainly not. According to their lights, yes. Which was the absolute morality? Or have neither periods disclosed it yet? I know peoples among whom the pregnancy of women and unfortunate girls is one of the choice topics of table-conversation, indulged by men and women, domestics and strangers, indiscriminately. We blush with shame at the thought of such a discussion at table in the presence of opposite sexes. Who is right? Well, according to us they are morally rotten. According to them, we are squeamish milkops. Which division is the acme of morality? And so one could go on and on illustrating the fact that hunting for absolute moral laws is a vain metaphysical exercise.

Mr. Eshleman, being a well-informed man, knows all the foregoing as well as I do. He gives it due consideration and concludes that all these moral vagaries are phases of an evolution. But can evolution ever stop? Logically, no. Then how can the moral law ever be fixed?

Mr. Eshleman "spills the beans" when as one who has a leaning towards monogamy attempts to condone polygamy in the event of dire national necessities, such as the killing of an unwonted number of males in wars, etc. My friend, that is fatal. Either monogamy is the moral law or it is not. To waver is to tamper with fire and compromise one's views anent "moral laws." Such a course shows that morality is based upon human experience and human necessities regardless of metaphysical conceptions. And as these experiences and necessities must change with varying conditions, so morality and moral laws must ever change. Therefore morality and moral laws are not entities but varying qualities. That must be the conclusion of all that give the subject an open-hearted examination.

Then comes Mr. Kusel, who cannot make our present morality jibe with the idea of killing sentient creatures and taking their flesh as food. Well, I have thought of the same matter and sometimes conclude that it is a pity. But, friend Kusel, do not let it disturb your tranquility. The killing of animals for food may be justified in two ways. From the orthodox: God made man master of the beasts of the field and of the birds in the air and of the fish beneath the waters. And if he wants to he can kill them and eat them. From the biological: Life preys upon life. The fox hunts down the rabbit; the tiger the roe; the hawk the sparrow, etc. Man, being the superior creation, hunts them all.

You can not get away from that fact, Mr. Kusel: one form of life exists upon another. That is one of the greatest arguments against a benevolent creative force. And the vegetarian is not entirely guiltless. If he will but look far enough he will see that he also preys upon living substance for maintenance. The radish that he eats would bear seed and propagate its kind if left in the ground longer. The cabbage would bear seeds next season. He is interfering with their rights and their destiny. And plants are sentient to a degree also.

It is then for science to determine which diet is the more efficient. At present there is much dissension among students of food and food values, almost as much as among the orthodox. I have seen vegetarians that needed the immediate care of a doctor, and I have seen beef eaters that overflowed with health, and vice versa. I have about concluded that it does not matter so much what we eat as how we eat it. The omnivora are doing fairly well.

FREE EDUCATION AND SURVIVAL.

From H. Mell, Nebraska.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

It has been proven that our education is no more hereditary than the ability of birds to find their food, or their route of migration. And on the strength of this men tell us not to bother too much about the naturally inferior, but, as the stock-breeders pick and favor the superior variations, expend our greatest efforts in behalf of our best gifted.

Of course, it is useless trying to make a philosopher out of a lowbrow. But, upholding our ideal of equal opportunity, i. e., to give each individual a fair start, we must emphasize the necessity of free general education for the rank and file—the original soil of genius—to assert, aim, and bring out dominating attributes and valuable traits, at times not showing on the surface.

Also, equally as imperative for the assurance of the survival of the fit, is free successive training along special lines for those whose qualifications warrant it. All of which is entirely feasible in an industrial democracy; and in the future we may thus restore the law favoring the strongest—now manifesting mainly through the herd-instinct in the form of co-operation—and allow it to act universally.

CHILDREN'S CORNER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS YOUNG AND OLD

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

George Henry Lewes, April 18, 1817—
November 28, 1878.

This distinguished English philosopher and author was born in London, April 18, 1817. He received a good education at four different prominent schools. He first thought of a business career and then a medical. Abandoning both, he decided to be an actor. Being the grandson of the great English actor, Charles Lee Lewes, he thought he had histrionic ambitions. For the best interests of the world he gave this up also and devoted himself for the remainder of his life to literature, science and philosophy. He spent some time studying in Germany, and for ten years supported himself by contributing to magazines. The most valuable of his contributions concerned the drama. In 1846 Mr. Lewes published what is perhaps his best known work, "The Biographical History of Philosophy." Philosophy consists in an attempt to attain ultimate truth. But as such a thing does not exist, philosophers, like religionists, are divided into different sects. Mr. Lewes shows how fruitless have been their efforts to reach the object sought. In 1847-48 he made an attempt at writing fiction, for which his talents did not qualify him. In conjunction with Leigh Hunt he established the Leader in 1850 and became its literary editor. In 1855 he published the "Life of Goethe," a standard biography of the great German poet. From this time on, Mr. Lewes turned his attention to scientific questions, particularly biology. The most important of his works on these subjects are, "Seaside Studies" (1858); "Physiology of Common Life" (1850), and "Aristotle, a Chapter from the History of Science" (1864). They are original and instructive, although Mr. Lewes never had any technical scientific training. In 1865 he became editor of the Fortnightly Review, where he remained two years, when he was succeeded by John Morley. The last great work he produced was "Problems of Life and Mind." Mr. Lewes died November 28, 1878. He was certainly one who added to the intellectual progress of his age.

Other events of which the past week is the anniversary are:

- April 15, Lincoln died, 1865. Thompson, Birmingham, England, tried for printing the "Rights of Man," acquitted, 1793.
- April 16, Buffon, naturalist and Infidel, died 1788.
- April 17, Benjamin Franklin, Freethinker, died, 1790. Phillips, Leicester, England, tried for printing the "Rights of Man," 1793.
- April 18, Byron died, 1824. Chas. Darwin died, 1882. Battle of Lexington, 1775.
- April 20, Cessation of hostilities between Great Britain and America, 1783.
- April 21, Harper's Ferry Arsenal burnt, 1861.

Would You Succeed?

Elbert H. Gary, chairman of the United States Steel Corporation, after thinking the subject over carefully, compiled the following prescription for the young man ambitious to attain success:

"1—He should be honest, truthful, sincere and serious.

"2—He should believe in and practice and preach the Golden Rule.

"3—He should be strong and healthy, physically and morally.

"4—His habits and mode of living should be temperate and clean, and his companions selected with regard to their character and reputation.

"5—He should possess a determination constantly to improve his mind and memory.

"6—He should possess a good education, including particularly the fundamentals, such as mathematics, grammar, spelling, writing, geography and history; and also a technical education concerning the lines he proposes to follow.

"7—He should be studious and thoughtful, keeping his mind upon a subject until it is mastered.

"8—He should be conscientious, modest but courageous, energetic, persistent, even-tempered, economical, faithful and loyal to his friends and the interests he represents."

As he handed over his recipes for success, Judge Gary remarked: "The above qualifications, you will notice, are within the reach of all. If possessed and put into practice they will bring success to the individual and satisfaction to any others interested."

Concerning "Pants."

The following essay on "Pants" is credited to a twelve-year-old Kansas schoolboy: Pants are made for men, and not men for pants. Women are made for men, and not for pants. When a man pants for a woman, and a woman pants for a man, they are a pair of pants. Such pants don't last. Pants are like molasses; thinner in hot weather and thicker in cold. The man in the moon changes his pants during the eclipse. Don't you go to the pantry for pants, you might be mistaken. Men are often mistaken in pants. Such mistakes make breeches of promise. There has been much discussion as to whether pants is singular or plural. Seems to us when men wear pants they are plural, when they don't wear any pants, it is singular. Men go on a tear in their pants, and it is all right; but when the pants go on a tear it is all wrong. Teacher once told us that modest children should not race up the stairs quickly because it made their breath come in short pants.

Woman's Limitations.

With tense, eager faces, the great audience of women leaned forward in their seats, eagerly drinking in the noted speaker's every word.

"Mere man," she was saying, "is wont to belittle woman's ability to enter the fields already usurped by him. As a matter of fact, she is capable of filling any post of public or private office now held by man, and, if appointed to it, could even perform man's tasks with greater faithfulness and greater daring.

"Name, if you can, one post for which she cannot fit herself. Name one office to which she would not, could not, give the greatest measure of capability, the highest degree of courage, the—"

A mere man, who had slipped unnoticed into a back seat, rose at this point, and the light of sudden inspiration gleamed in his eye.

"Rat-catcher!" he shouted. And then he fled.

Lid Off the Weather.

There is in the employ of a Brooklyn woman, so we read in the San Francisco Argonaut, an Irish cook who has managed to break nearly every variety of article that the household contains. The mistress' patience reached its limit recently when she discovered that the cook had broken the thermometer that hung in the dining-room. "Well, well," sighed the lady of the house, in a resigned way, "you've managed to break even the thermometer, haven't you?" Whereupon, in a tone equally resigned, the cook said: "Yis, mum; and now we'll have to take the weather just as it comes, won't we?"

Child's Reply to Pastor.

During his usual weekly sermon to children at the First Presbyterian church, Bloomfield, yesterday morning, Rev. Dr. George Louis Curtis, the pastor, turned to the tots and asked what day it was. Instead of the expected answer, "Palm Sunday," a four-year-old member arose and solemnly informed the pastor that it was "April Fool Day." The congregation joined in the laugh that followed.—Newark Evening News, April 2.

Love's Old Refrain.

The bright sun rose one glorious day
And gazed on the earth in a searching way.
He spied the rose 'neath the sheltering trees,
And wafted a kiss on the passing breeze,
Then queried, "Miss Rose, do you love me true?"
She blushing said, "Mr. Sun, I do."

A robin sang in a cherry tree,
In tones that were joyous, light and free,
When on the neighboring branch he spied Little Miss Wren, and to her cried,
"Most sweet Miss Wren, do you love me true?"
And the coquet answered, "Rob, I do."

A cavalier called on his love one day;
They talked for an hour, in the usual way,
'Till roguish Cupid, with love-tipped darts,
Stepped forth and gently pricked their hearts.
"Fair maiden, say, do you love me true?"
Smilingly, she answered, "Indeed, I do."

So it will be to the end of years,
With so many smiles and so many tears,
With the same old song, "Do you love me true?"
And the same old refrain, "Indeed, I do."
SARA V. JACOBS.

Mother Knew.

A young doctor in a Maine town was called one night by an old farmer to his first case. The patient was the farmer's son, who was lying on the bed in much pain. The young medico threw out his chest and said:

"This should cause you no alarm. It is nothing but a corrusted exegesis antispasmodically emanating from the physical refrigerator, producing a prolific source of irritability in the pericranial epidermis."

The farmer looked at him and replied: "Just what I said; but his mother thought it was a stomach ache."

New Streets to the Coroner.

During an inquest held in Cincinnati, the following question was put to one of the witnesses by the deputy coroner:

"Where was the deceased struck by the motor car?"

Whereupon the witness, a surgeon, replied:

"At the juncture of the dorsal and cervical vertebrae."

The deputy coroner looked puzzled.

"Will you please point out that on the map?" he asked, indicating one that hung on the wall.

Cultured.

Esthetic.—Two fair munition-workers were discussing their personal affairs.

"Got a chap yet, Liz?" inquired one.

"Yes; and he's a regular swell. He's manager at—"

"You don't say so. Why, they tell me he's real refined."

"Rather! Why, he took me to a restaurant last week, and when we had coffee he poured it into a saucer to cool it, but he didn't blow it like common people would—he fanned it with his hat!"—Tit-Bits.

Poorly Qualified.

Peggy—"Daddy, what did the Dead Sea die of?"

Daddy—"Oh, I don't know, dear."

Peggy—"Daddy, where do the Zeppelins start from?"

Daddy—"I don't know."

Peggy—"Daddy, when will the war end?"

Daddy—"I don't know."

Peggy—"I say, Daddy, who made you an editor?"—The Sketch.

Annoying.

"Ma," said a discouraged little Maple avenue urchin, "I ain't going to school any more." "Why, dear?" tenderly inquired his mother. "'Cause 'tain't no use. I can never learn to spell. The teacher keeps changing words on me all the time."

The Consistent Neighbor.

Mrs. Flatbush—Who is that woman you just bowed to?

Mrs. Bensonhurst—Oh, she's my next door neighbor.

"But she didn't return your bow."

"No; she never returns anything."

A Contest of Virtue.

Catherine seemed such a reliable girl that Mrs. Moran had no hesitancy in leaving her in charge of the children while she went for a long drive.

"How did they behave while I was gone?" she asked on her return.

"Beautifully, madam," Catherine replied, "but in the end they fought terribly."

"Why on earth did they fight?"

"To decide which was behaving best."

Profoundly Thinking.

Miss Gillot—There goes Professor Fox, the great scientist. I'd give a good deal to know what mighty problem he is thinking of now.

Professor Fox (ruminating)—Let me see; I was to get three yards of tape, a pound of butter, order the coal, pay the butcher and get some medicine for the baby. I wish Mrs. Fox would attend to these matters herself.

Both Boys.

Teacher—"Now, Willie, suppose you were to hand a playmate your last apple to take a portion, wouldn't you tell him to take the larger piece?"

Willie—"No mom!"

"You wouldn't. Why?"

"Cos t'wouldn't be necessary."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Useful.

"I tell you, old man, Angy is a bright girl. She's brains enough for two."

"Then she's the very girl for you, my boy."

An Awkward Age.

"Tommy, you're too old to cry."

"Yes, and I'm too young to have what I'm crying for."—Punch Bowl.

THE FREETHOUGHT BADGE PIN

Dedicated to all honest men and women—to those who can and are willing to reason—who constitute the grand army of progressive thinkers throughout the world.

An Emblem of Freedom and Progress

Represents no lodge, order or society, but is designed as a token of recognition for progressive minds of every shade of thought.

All claiming to be free from superstition, all who base their belief upon science and reason, should wear this emblem to speed the grand work of emancipating humanity from the thralldom of mental darkness.

This is conceded by artists and the trade to be the most beautiful Badge ever designed. Being a practical jeweler and designer of emblems of every description, as well as an enthusiastic worker in the cause of human progress, Mr. Wettstein has succeeded in combining in this badge the great want of this age and the future. It represents the Burning Torch of Reason, the Rising Sun of Science and Freethought, beautifully enameled in brilliant colors in contrast with the Night and Darkness of Superstition, enameled in black, and symbolizes the evolution of the world from the Night of Superstition to the Day of Freethought, Science and Reason.

"A pin whose torch and golden sheen,
Would grace the breast of Sheba's queen;
And will lend grace in coming time
To queens of beauty more sublime."
(Impromptu by Elizur Wright.)

As a token of recognition among Liberals of every shade of thought, either at home or abroad, it is especially valuable.

Made in two styles and by best workmen in the most artistic and substantial manner.

Considering amount of gold and artistic workmanship in the badge, no other badges in the world are sold so cheap. They will last for generations to come and increase in popularity and value until fear and superstition exist no more.

THE LETTER BOX.

W. VAN DER W., NEW YORK.—You are not the first to observe that our French is punk, but the fault is due to the deficiencies of the French language, which, affording no equivalent for "the long green," had to be supplied in the manner you regret with la longe verte. It is a war loan.

JOE CROCKETT, Colorado.—Thomas A. Edison is an unbeliever in the Christian religion, but that he is what you would call "a thorough Liberal and Freethinker" we cannot affirm. He does not subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER, as Mark Twain did. He resides in West Orange, N. J. As to the verses, "The Question," by George E. Macdonald, and "Why Don't He Lend a Hand?" by Samuel P. Putnam, you are at liberty to use them wherever you choose. They are not copyrighted.

J. S., Pittsburgh, Pa.—You are welcoming old age too soon if on arriving at your forty-fifth birthday you chucked in the discard all those things you name—"my youth, wine, women, song, blushing maidens," etc. As revealed in Mr. Steiner's calendar for the week ending April 14, we turned sixty on the 11th, but noted no diminution of energy except loss of power to eat pie and write verse, which was retained up to about your age. We think that women are handsomer now than when we were young, but perhaps it is their clothes.

M. R., Dover, N. H.—Is the fact intended for publication that you "materialized here on earth on March 18, 1840"? How about the notion that women do not tell their age? We know a contemporary of yours who would not reveal it to her relations. Your epitaph on March, foreshadowing your book of poems, we append:

"Too long she lived, too late she died;
Her life it was a stormy tide—
A tide of wind and snow and storms,
A tide of all that spring deforms."
March deserves the worst you can say of her. She kept the ground refrigerated and frozen so long this year that our neighbors had to dig up their cellar bottoms for dirt to sow tomato seeds in.

HENRY WALKER, Illinois.—The article you send, clipped from the State Register and signed "Buckley," is a paraphrase of a letter once written by Ingersoll to the man who is now his son-in-law. The young man was ill, a stimulant was indicated, and the letter to him accompanied a gift of some whisky. "Buckley" is the Rev. J. M. Buckley, for many years editor of the Christian Advocate. Nothing was sent to him: he was not Ingersoll's friend, as the newspaper states, and all the circumstances described in the clipping are invented. Buckley's travesty occurs on page 109 of the pamphlet entitled "The Great Ingersoll Controversy." The facts regarding the whisky sent by Ingersoll to his friend Brown are stated on page 19 of "Ingersoll as He Is," by E. M. Macdonald. It is strange how truth gets distorted in careless and pious hands. It seems sometimes as though they preferred false versions to true ones, and we cannot imagine how the devil, in competition with them, ever gathered the reputation of being the father of lies.

PICTURES BY RYAN WALKER.

This is a lecture by a Texas Pagan, which has been illustrated by another. The text is what the title describes, a comparison of the heathen myths with the Hebrew tales told in scripture. The illustrations are exquisite bits of satire and wit, made by a genius with the pencil, and each is a gem. Text and pictures together, the book is certainly one of the wittiest ever produced, while the information it contains is solid and reliable. It will be a source of pleasure to every Liberal, and is at the same time a splendid Freethought lecture. We guarantee its quality from start to finish. 115 large octavo pages, 75 illustrations. DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

Those Female Genuises.

Miss Brunzell's last reply to me concludes with these words: "Are her pen-drippings just so much bluster? Search me." I am going to clear up this point first, although it is the last raised, as it is based upon an utter misconception of my pursuits and manner of life.

And although Miss Brunzell so generously invites us to search her, I may assure her that she will be spared such an indignity, for that a search in her direction would merely bring to light much information that we outgrew years ago.

And now, regarding my writings being so much bluster, as my opponent so delicately intimates, let the following paragraph of autobiography be my response and my refutation. It must be understood that it is written not with the slightest idea of its being of general interest, but merely as the best vindication of my sincerity that can be made. To begin with, I am not on the stage. This idea must have grown out of Mr. Macdonald's statement that I am a singer. I am a singer, but purely in an amateur way, and my time and energy are spent happily and profitably in my husband's house, and devoted to making it a refined and comfortable retreat for him when his daily world-fight is over. Just before we were married, my husband was dangerously ill, and after hastening the marriage, that I might care for him as only a wife can, I read all the reliable books on Diet that I could procure and after hard study evolved a system of diet that has, to quote every one that knows him, "made him fifteen years younger." If I had been devoted to a public career and club-life; if my heart and soul had been engaged in a program of shouting on street corners and haranguing the main-in-the-street to obtain the vote, it is a certainty that I should be at this day a widow. My opponent's replies are not remarkable for any great delicacy either of sentiment or style, but I hope these few facts of my private life will induce even her to accredit me with the sincerity that I always believe to be my opponent's motive.

Miss Brunzell cites Hetty Green as an evidence of what woman can achieve in the financial world. She could not have chosen a happier instance for my case. Hetty Green certainly accumulated vast wealth, which after all does not predicate much brain-power, for the ability to take advantage of the unfortunate lies at the back of nearly all big fortunes. But this is my point: what did Hetty Green do with her wealth? The only justification of big fortunes is their useful commercial distribution among the community. Hoarded wealth becomes a menace instead of an indispensably useful factor in the economic system, and Hetty Green hoarded her wealth to such an extent that she resorted to the most humiliating devices to escape the payment of her due taxes! She is a most brilliant example of the female financier!

Another woman cited by my adversary in alleged disproof of my case is Jeanne d'Arc. We will look into this, my brethren, in a spirit of love. First: who was Jeanne d'Arc? She was a poor little village wench who "heard voices." That is to say, she was a true woman in that she was a fanatic. Having "heard voices" she became obsessed with the idea that it was her mission to head the French army and lead it to victory. She appeared before the French king, who, of course, in keeping with his day, was intensely and abjectly superstitious. At that period of the world's history, an individual who "heard voices," always provided that he heard them on the right side of the religious fence, was regarded as divinely inspired. Today, we are less sublimely receptive of the claims of these communicants with the Unseen, and only a month or two ago, a person, in that wise inspired, who applied at the White House for admission to the President—just like Jeanne—was removed, with all dispatch to the nearest asylum, poor thing. But the king received Jeanne, and being in desperate plight and upon the verge of utter defeat, he permitted this little back-woods fanatic to invest herself in a suit of mail and gallop at the head of his army, brandishing a sword in the approved style. Warfare in those days was little more than a display of brute force. There was none of the strategic movements and subtle manoeuvrings that distinguish the modern conflict. Then, a man fitted himself out with a complete suit of hardware and tried to hit harder than the other fellow. With this principle of warfare in their minds, hatred of the English in their hearts, and their benightedly superstitious souls filled with awe and enthusiasm by the fanaticism of Jeanne, the French soldiers rushed into the fray, hewed down their Saxon foemen with frenzied courage, and gained the day.

And the only element of Jeanne's mental make-up that is to be accredited with that victory is the religious bias that toppled her peasant-reason from its throne.

As for Dr. Mary Walker and her pants—but pray excuse me for an instant while I finish laughing and then we will resume the argument. Dr. Mary, I frankly admit, has fulfilled the noblest mission in the world—that of providing a never-failing source of amusement for the jaded and pessimistic victims of our social system. But apart from that, what has she done? It really seems that, far from achieving anything of which Feminists can boast, she has merely, by her grotesque adoption of masculine attire, prevented herself from achieving what almost every woman, however limited, can achieve—a certain degree of attractiveness and beauty, so that if she bores the ear to death, she at least may charm the eye. Dr. Mary Walker's occupation for many, many years has consisted almost entirely of prowling about the Capitol, getting up ridiculous bills, and proving every day of her life that the government committed no irreparable mistake in granting her permission to gratify her childish taste for pants, for that even if she infringes upon masculine rights in this superficial respect, she is utterly incompetent to carry the infringement any further.

Speaking of the Capitol reminds me of that sweet, dumb presence that is rarefying the political atmosphere within those august precincts of late. Having spent the last few months, as one Chicago newspaper so succinctly puts it, "in thinking the obvious and making speeches about it," Miss Jeanette Rankin arrived in Washington at the convening of Congress prepared, so she informed a breathless interviewer, "just to listen," for that she had not made up her mind upon any question as yet.

Of course, one is not so utterly lost to a sense of gratitude as not to be profoundly thankful that the lady is prepared "just to listen," for Congress has its hands quite full enough without taking upon itself the additional burden of the Congresslady's mellifluous voicing of the obvious; still, the hypothesis will obtrude itself: Suppose every member of Congress had arrived upon March the 4th, "prepared just to listen," because they had not made up their minds. There is something exquisitely humorous in the picture of Congress "just listening" while the kaiser made up his mind.

Miss Brunzell says: "If the women of the past had a hand in creating religious beliefs, why is it Buddha, Mohammed and Christ are not females?" Are not females, dear lady? "Can it be he has not heard that God is dead?" Pray grant these makers of religions the repose they so well earned and put them in the past tense! And allow me to say that I, for one, never claimed that women had ever been makers of religion. Women are rarely makers of anything. They are disciples and copyists, but when profound originality of thought is to the fore, you will find the ladies at the other end. No, truly. Women have never made religions; they have just attached themselves to the procession as devotees of the new doctrine and disciples of the master-mind. And the Christian religion is peculiarly adapted to their mental requirements, its mawkish sentiments particularly appealing to their innate weakness and mental dependency.

Regarding doctrines for the upbringing of children, women are placed in the very best position to evolve the truest of these in their own homes. In constant companionship with their children, lovingly observant of the idiosyncrasies and particularities of childhood, nearer to the great little hearts of the babies than any man can be, it is they who must be depended upon to direct the provision of their offsprings' needs. But they will never achieve this by destroying home-life and relegating the care of their children to ignorant hirelings and governmentally-employed teachers, whose sole aim is to turn out so many proficient pupils as alike as peas in a pod, with ignorant neglect of the fine individual traits—that distinguish the genius from the clod.

No one would believe how painfully conscious I am, in writing these pages, of my inferiority to my opponent. There is she, so apt and handy, and I—I don't know any bar-room slang at all! But I cannot complain when her replies are the source of so much information to me. I had entertained the idea of taking up visiting work among the poor, especially among the submerged, but if my fair adversary will but deign to reply to me once or twice more, I shall be fully acquainted at least with their diction, without having endured the fatigue of actual visits. I most earnestly trust she will graciously continue to further my ambition to know how the poor live, by acquainting me fully with that branch of the subject—How the Poor Talk! MARY MONICO.

MARGINAL INTELLIGENCE.

Two people may have many things in common, that is to say, they may have many common sympathies, many common experiences and much common knowledge. They may be well informed on economic subjects and may be well equipped in the matter of proper governmental experiences. If you add a third person to these two, then it is obvious that the common knowledge of the three, that is to say, the knowledge which is common to the three, may be much less than the knowledge which was common to the two. Having added the third, it is equally obvious that when a fourth is added, the amount of knowledge which is common to the four, most likely will be less than the amount which was common to the three. There might be exceptions to this rule, but those exceptions would be so few as to be of no importance. When you keep on adding larger and larger numbers to the original few, it is evident that the margin of common knowledge grows smaller all the time.

This common knowledge has been designated as the margin of intelligence or "marginal intelligence." In a thickly populated community like New York city or Chicago, the marginal intelligence is lower than in a more sparsely settled community. Politicians, under so-called popular forms of government, must appeal to this low "marginal intelligence" in order to be successful. Under the direct primary system, where every individual, supposedly at least, has a voice in nominating the candidate, the margin of intelligence, which selects the candidate, is much lower than the margin of intelligence under the convention system, where the selection is confined to comparatively few. This probably explains the fact that the class and character of successful candidates under the primary system is much lower than under the old convention system. To be a candidate at all under the primary system, one must be of such character and quality of mind that he is not averse to a continuous "blowing of his own horn," as witness the fact that even candidates for the judiciary oftentimes have their pictures posted in many conspicuous places.

H. T. WILLIAMS.

WHERE WILL WE COME OUT?

It seems that the right to reason at the present moment is at a discount. With the equipment of two or three million of soldiers and the perfection of the navy, and a program being laid out that would stagger any monarchy in Europe, still we are to do it all "for humanity." According to the President's address, we have challenged the right of all the monarchies of Europe to exist, and are arming in an effort to destroy them. The greatest of them all, in the throes of a revolution, is assumed to be already a Republic, though it is only a Republic in the making.

With a line of action laid out that definitely declares that our object is the unseating of Imperialism, it looks to me that we have mapped out for us the most gigantic struggle that any nation has ever planned. And yet, when men in the House try to appeal to reason or in the Senate to democratic rights, "traitor" is hurled at their heads and we appear, to a man up a tree, as lost to sense as one of Billy Sunday's best crowds in the throes of a revival. What is the situation? let us ask. Can it rationally be assumed that this war is to be fought to make sure that the Allies win, that their bonds will not be defaulted? Can it not be assumed that we are being formed into a fighting unit for something that the people are not wise to, the President's address to the contrary notwithstanding? Are there not good grounds to assume that up to date the fight is a draw in Europe and that we are stepping in to pull the chestnuts out of the fire for some one?

And then after the war in which, we will concede, we will be the winning factor for the Allies, what will we have? We will undoubtedly have an enormous war debt and a big army and the work marked out for it is the conquest of the "open door" in the Orient. England, too much exhausted by the present war, expects to delegate that task to the United States, and with all its complications it is a necessary one to an exploiting nation that has a world position to maintain, with Oriental bonds to float, etc. Who knows but that Russia and Japan will be allies in that great struggle?

And after it when we come home to consider our own position as a competitor with European nations in the markets of the world, where will we stand in the face of possible coalitions of the nations of the world as elucidated in the Paris conference of last summer? And with a conquering people back of the army and navy, can we continue to assert that we will wage war in the future with no thought of profits or reparation?

It seems to me we are at the point where Autocracy will in a few years submerge Republicanism, and where freedom will only mean freedom to support the going policy, where it means large profits, or to prevent loss of investment by a capitalistic class that exploits its own people and then looks abroad for fields of investment where it may exploit other peoples and so on, with no thought of the toiling millions who must back them with their blood and their lives that their world work may be made good.

To me in this neck of the woods it looks exactly as Senator Stone said in the United States Senate: "It is the most colossal blunder of the century." We are now continuing the policy that was launched when the Philippine Islands were purchased that their cheap labor might be exploited. It is continuing the policy that was inaugurated when Dewey in the discharge of his duty told the Germans in Manila bay to get out of his way or suffer the consequences. We are now telling the Monarchies of the World to get out of our way in what on its face will be a fight for humanity, but which in the end will be a struggle for position in world supremacy, on the sea and on the land, in trade, and in the strength of Army and Navy.

It settles the question whether man is wise enough to govern himself and appropriate to his own use and advancement the profits of his toil. I believe in the United States of the past, barring some mistakes, and I believe I will be as sorry as any one to see her humiliation, but the path she has chosen will prove her undoing as a true Republic. That is my conviction and I can only hope that we as a people will wake up before it is too late.

Dry and Wet.

Prepare for Prohibition.—To the married man who cannot get along without his drink, the following is the solution of bondage to the habit:

1. Start a saloon in your own home.
2. You be the only customer. You will have no license to pay.
3. Give your wife two dollars to buy a gallon of whiskey, and, remember, there are ninety-six drinks in a gallon.
4. Buy your drinks from your wife only, and by the time the first gallon is gone she will have $7.60 to put in bank and $2 to start in business again.
5. Should you live ten years and continue to buy booze from her, then die with snakes in your boots, she will have money enough to give you a respectable burial, educate your children, buy a house and lot, and marry a decent man and quit thinking about you.—Exchange.

Col. Bob. Maxe's Tribute to Water.

"Mr. Toastmaster, ladies and gentlemen, you have asked me to respond to the toast, 'Water,' the purest and best of all of the things that God created. I want to say to you that I have seen it glisten in tiny tear drops on the sleeping lids of infancy; I have seen it trickle down the blushing cheeks of youth, and go in blinding torrents down the wrinkled face of age. I have seen it in dewdrops on the blades of grass and leaves of trees, flashing like polished diamonds when the morning sun burst in resplendent glory o'er the eastern hills. I have seen it dance adown the mountain sides in rivulets with the music of liquid silver striking on beds of polished diamonds. I have seen it in the river rippling over pebbly bottoms, purling about jutting stones, roaring over precipitous falls in its mad rush to join the Father of Waters, and in the Father of Waters I have seen it go in slow and majestic sweep to join the ocean. And I have seen it in the mighty ocean on whose broad bosom float the battle fleets of all nations and the commerce of the world, but, ladies and gentlemen, I want to say to you now that as a beverage it—is a flat, miserable, insipid, absolute and unmitigated failure."

Religion and Nature.

The myriads seeking to create

An idol to adore,
Have made their God a God of hate,
And worshiped him with gore.

And living multitudes have heard
That love is Nature's plan,
Yet shut their souls against the word
That teaches love of man.

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxies of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

In Best of Humor.

Mere Man.—"Did Fussleigh take his misfortune like a man?"
"Precisely. He laid all the blame on his wife."—Tit-Bits.

Sympathetic.—Alice — I could never marry a man who loved me just for my looks.

Marie—I'm sure you couldn't, dear.

Degenerating.—"I certainly would like to pick up a newspaper that wasn't full of big black headlines," said the fractious man: "Tired of reading war news?" "Yes. And to make matters worse, I've reached the point where I believe nearly everything I read."—Birmingham Age-Herald.

Reassuring.—The Departing Guest—I hope my two weeks' stay here with you hasn't proved a big additional expense to you?

Mrs. Inwrong—Oh, no! George and I have what we call a "catastrophe fund" that we've saved for just such emergencies.

Eyeball or Highball.—An old Scotsman was threatened with blindness if he did not give up drinking.

"Now, McTavish," said the doctor, "it's like this: You've either to stop the whisky or lose your eyesight, and you must choose."

"Ay, weel, doctor," said McTavish, "I'm an auld man noo, an' I was thinkin' I ha'e seen about everything worth seein'."—Tit-Bits.

A Bold One.—I often wish I had the nerve of my friend Jimson. At a Christmas party he deliberately walked up to the prettiest girl in the room and kissed her.

"How dare you!" she cried, blushing. "I am not under the mistletoe."

"That's all right," responded Jimson. "A girl with a face like yours doesn't need any mistletoe."

And then he kissed her again.

His Fidelity.—Upon the recent death in a Western town of a politician, mentioned in Puck, who, at one time served his country in a very high legislative place, a number of newspaper men were collaborating in an obituary notice.

"What shall we say of the former Senator?" asked one of the men.

"Oh, just put down that he was always faithful to his trust."

"And," queried a cynical member of the group, "shall we mention the name of the trust?"

It Paid.—"Has your husband quit work?"

"Yes. He has figured it out that he can save more by staying home and running the furnace economically than he can earn by going down-town."—Washington Star.

Appreciative.—"I understand your wife lectured you for an hour last night."

"Yes," answered Mr. Meekton. "She told me about a few of my faults."

"Didn't it annoy you?"

"In a way. You see, when a woman of Henrietta's gifts condescends to make a speech it does seem a shame to have such a small audience."

Unlucky Answer.—Her husband had just come home and had his first meeting with the new nurse, who was remarkably pretty.

"She is sensible and scientific, too," urged the fond mother, "and says she will allow no one to kiss baby while she is near."

"No one would want to," replied the husband, "while she is near."

And the nurse was discharged.—Tit-Bits.

The Usual Program.—Punch once had a scene in which a district visitor is shown entering the cottage of a poor woman. The visitor is evidently new to the business and somewhat embarrassed. The cottager says to her: "I'm quite well, thank yer, miss; but I ain't seed you afore. Y're fresh at it, ain't yer, miss?"

"I have never visited you before, Mrs. Johnson."

The woman dusts a chair. "Well," she says, "yer sits down here, an' yer reads me a short Psalm, yer give me a shillin', and then yer goes!"—Punch.

The Inner Voice.—The mother of the small boy had been trying to instill within him an idea of conscience. She described it as a little voice which whispered inside one when he was doing wrong.

"I never heard it," said the small boy, cynically, and in the tone of one who shrugs his shoulders.

A little later the small boy did something he had been told not to do, and was sent to sit on a chair, and ordered not to get off until the powers that be gave him leave.

Ten minutes later he came into the room where his mother was sitting, jubilant.

"I've heard it, mother," he exclaimed.

"Heard what?" asked his perplexed parent.

"Heard the little voice. It said, 'Sam Smith, you get off that chair. Don't you care what your mother says?'"

Feverish Patriotism.—"Is Dubson preparing for war?"

"Oh, yes. His patriotism is at fever heat."

"Indeed?"

"He has even gone so far as to memorize two stanzas of 'The Star-Spangled Banner.'"

Eligible.—"Say, old man, don't you want to join the Wayback County Association? The dues are only $10 a year and that goes to pay for a banquet at the Swell-dorf."

"But I've never been in Wayback County in my life."

"That's all right. You've got $10, haven't you?"—Lincoln (Neb.) Journal.

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

A very frank book; serious, scholarly, convincing.

THE CHRISTIAN HELL

From the First to the Twentieth Century

By

HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work. Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

ETERNITY

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

SUNDAY IS CHALLENGED.

A Defi Couched in the Language He Is Most Likely to Understand.

WILLIAM ASHLEY SUNDAY. The Tub-nickels, New York—Dear Billy: Stand up there, you hog-jowled, beetle-browed, rag-time religionist. Stand up there, I say, with John Alexander Dowie and all the other money-grabbing, fooling-man crowd.

New York does not want you, so beat it. Your buncombe can go in towns like Paterson, N. J., but not here. It was with delight I read of the rows of empty benches in your barn Monday night. I guess your thousands of cappers were worn out after your Sunday flappedoodle sermon.

Why don't you convert J. D. Rockefeller, Jr.?

If you want WAR, why don't you send your SON to WAR? "Let the other fellow go," you say, like all other fake patriots who wrap American flags around their carcasses.

I will be in your audience Sunday afternoons and I dare you to invite me to come on the platform. Yours for truth.

JOHN WILLIAM ARMSTRONG.

THE HAND OF GOD and Other

Posthumous Essays

By

GRANT ALLEN

Most intelligent Freethinkers are familiar with Mr. Grant Allen's work, "The Evolution of the Idea of God," but fewer have read his supplementary book called "The Hand of God," in which he intended to explicate further some personal views regarding the origin of religion. The book takes its name from the opening chapter, which, with the three chapters on "The Worship of Death," were designed to be the opening section of a volume supplemental to the better known work. The book under present notice, consists of fifteen essays of striking and permanent interest. Here are some of the titles: "Immortality and Resurrection," "The Mystery of Birth," "What is the Object of Life," "Practical Religion," and "Spencer and Darwin." Grant Allen needs no special introduction to the Rationalist, but in this little volume he appears at his best—highly interesting, always instructive, and fascinating to a degree. There are few books of essays of higher merit, especially for the liberal minded, than "The Hand of God."

HUMAN BROTHERHOOD.

This, Not Internationalism Nor Religious Ties, Is 'Socialism' True and Lasting.

BY RICHARD ELLSWORTH.

THE European War, which has now included the American nation in its wide area of operations, is compelling the world to consider seriously a new adjustment of many economic and social conditions which had been looked upon heretofore as more or less settled phases of human life. It has opened up a new prospect in almost every department of human thought and activity. We can no longer be assured that the principles which gave birth to our present political structure are typical of the most advanced stages of civilization. A period of reconstruction throughout the world is about to set in, which will require men to lay aside many a conceit regarding community and national life, and the best and safest means for their enduring prosperity. This is especially true of what is known as Socialism.

Aristotle made a shrewd if somewhat cruel criticism on Plato's "Republic," the first and by far the most brilliant dream of a socialistic state in Europe. "If it had been good," said the cool, analytical thinker, "it would have been tried before!" If there had been anything in Socialism, the Socialists would have become socialist by now. They would have formed socialistic communities here, or in some new country they would have shown us how it could be done. I shall be told that Owen did establish a socialistic community in this country: yes, and there was the phalanstery attempted or proposed by Fourier in Europe. Indeed there are many interesting, but not encouraging, accounts of such attempts. But they all broke down; they were destroyed, not by external force, but simply by the facts of human nature.

Now if select communities of convinced enthusiasts cannot maintain a socialistic state, however small, into a second generation, what prospect is there that any state, great or small, can become socialistic? Or if it were socialistic for a moment, how could the equilibrium, human nature being what it is, be maintained? If the Socialists could, in any favorable part of the globe, establish a socialistic state and show how it works, the world would take heart, and would not despair of becoming socialist. But in the reluctance to make the experiment, and in the failure of such experiments as have been made, ordinary men recognize this plain truth: Socialism is only a dream; it is attractive as an ideal, it may be useful as a guide to action which is practicable; but there are not, there never can be real socialists, there can only be talkers of socialism, the discontented denouncing their fellow-men in the name of brotherhood, the poor abusing the rich for the sin of possessing—damning the sin, that is, which they have no opportunity of committing. Probably the solid sense of mankind, at any rate here in America, sees through the matter quite clearly.

Plato's ideal state was communistic rather than socialistic. It could not be taken seriously. The "Republic" is full of grave irony, a satire as keen, though not as cruel, as Swift's. It is a kind of prose poem, abounding in exquisite pieces, ending in a great vision of a future world, where the wicked, like Ardieus, are eternally tormented, and where souls choose blindly the lives they will live in the next stage of the metempsychosis, and some, not saved by wisdom, drink more than they need of Lethe's waters. Indeed, we are astonished at so serious a person as Aristotle taking this great feat of the imagination as a proposal in practical politics at all. Plato set the world dreaming about an ideal state, but he can hardly be said to have contributed to its realization. One is even tempted to wonder whether such idealizing does any good at all, whether the humblest effort to do good under existing conditions is not better than the bravest dream of improved conditions, under which at last one would endeavor to do good.

What reason is there for thinking that men ought to have equal opportunities, equal advantages, equal enjoyments in life? Socialism is the heroic attempt to secure this equality, to pluck the fruit from the greedy hands of the fortunate, the fruit grown on the common earth, and to share it with all. But where is the sanction for demanding that equality? What evidence is there, in a world of inequalities like this, that such an equality is possible or intended? There is only one idea that can justify the expectation of the demand; and it is this: All men are brethren. If this be true, the ideal of socialism has some justification; if not, it is the baseless fabric of a dream. It is as curious that Socialists cannot see how their theory depends on that truth as it is that Christians, who pretend to accept it, do not see whither it leads.

The Christian religion has not hitherto been applied with conspicuous success to the social problem; nor does it seem susceptible of being so applied. A new era for the world will certainly open when the question is seriously raised. What has Christianity to say about industrial organization and the life of a state? Here are the reasons usually given for the delay in making this obvious application of religion to life. It is held that the tone of the Christian religion was in the first instance set by the necessity of conflict with a very powerful state organization, the Greco-Roman power. That figured itself to the fears and hopes of the first Christians as a monster that must be overcome and destroyed. Instinctively these early believers clutched at the fragmentary promises of a life beyond this world, and passed lightly over the promises for the regeneration of earthly life, which were very imperfectly embodied in the burden of Christ's message to men. The fatal blunder of the eremitic and ascetic life readily crept in from Judaism and heathenism. Men fled to solitary cells in the Thebaid to escape from a corrupt and incorrigible world. That error is still a part of official Christendom.

When, however, the Roman empire itself became Christian, the so-called donation of Constantine proved to be the church's material blessing and spiritual malison. From the age of Constantine to the Reformation the Christian religion left the ideas of its supposed founder, and developed an idea of a totally different kind. The church replaced the empire and the pope the emperor. In the powerful imperial organization of the Western church, social reconstruction was not wholly ignored; but it rested upon a false principle. The church as a hierarchy used its power to make itself incredibly wealthy, while it taught the masses of the people the blessings of poverty. So inherent was the error that the religious orders, which invariably started with vows of poverty, drew to themselves more and more of the wealth of the community, until they became a peril to the state. The Catholic church had the social organization of Europe in its hands, with practically undisputed power, for more than a thousand years. But the results were enough and plenty to justify the socialistic suspicion of Christianity.

The poverty and degradation of medieval cities, not so much relieved as fostered by the charities of the religious orders; the helpless dependence of the people on their lords, in church and state; the ravages of the plague, the slaughter in the endless wars, the repression of industry by artificial restrictions, made a society which seethed with discontent and festered in misery. The church clung to the position that it held the keys of the future life and opened the gates of heaven or purgatory to her children at will; but it used these visionary and terrific powers to aggrandize and enrich itself. Vast accumulations of wealth, cruelties and abuses of spiritual power, and the other corruptions of the conventional system, had rendered the religious orders a disease and peril to the state. In this connection the accredited achievement of Protestantism was scarcely more beneficial to the world than Catholicism, for it exerted only a slight influence on the social question. It is a melancholy task to follow the career of the Lutheran church in Germany. Luther himself approved of the repression of the peasants, whose aspirations had been fired by the gospel of freedom which he preached. The Socialists of Germany regard the Lutheran church just as the Socialists of Belgium regard the Catholic church, with the same sick disappointment, the same deliberate hostility. Every church, in fact, which becomes strong enough to claim and exercise a magisterium over men falls to the same conclusion, incurs the same enmity, and becomes the same kind of obstacle in the way of social reconstruction. We need not wonder, therefore, that Socialists have been, and are still, making their efforts apart from the churches and in hostility to them.

In a fundamental Socialism mankind is conceived as one, an organism in which each individual is a member. It is therefore at once established that while there are varieties of function, there are not varieties of importance. Each unit has its place in the body; the more prominent cannot depreciate the more obscure, the comely cannot slight the uncomely, the great cannot dispense with the small. Each human being has his rights. It is all for each and each for all. They are members one of another. If one member suffers, the whole suffers; if one is glad, all share the gladness. A system of motor and sensitive nerves connects all in one. The injury of one thrills through the whole system. The misconduct of one is the sin of the whole. No one can get out of this established solidarity; no one can renounce his responsibility for the rest. The solidarity is not that of an inorganic mass; it is not even that of gravitation; it is that of an organism.

In order to press the significance and value of the individual, fundamental Socialism cannot lose sight of the family. There can be no perfectly right industrial or social relations between men unless they realize this essential part of our common humanity. The ancient Greeks had a glimmer of the truth that all Hellenes were related; but the rest of mankind were barbarians, and slaves were not included in humanity. The Jews recognized a kingship in Israel, and did not suffer an Israelite to be a slave. Certain modern nations have a kind of exclusive family feeling. Blacks and other foreigners are inferior. But the individual nationalist, as the German for instance, does not carry his admiration for his own race into any friendliness towards Germans as German; rather he brings his contempt for other races into his feeling for different classes among his own people. He repudiates the brotherhood of man; but he equally repudiates brotherhood with lower orders, or with dissenters of every kind, or with persons of different political opinions.

But in contrast with this racial or national or social exclusiveness, Rationalism, echoing the voice of Nature, asserts the brotherhood of men. If there be any distinctive character to Christianity, it is evident at a glance how thoroughly un-"Christian," and even anti-"Christian," much of the organized Christianity of our day is. But we are not now concerned with the petrifications of obsolete systems which arrogate to themselves the name of religion. The fundamental principle of humanity, as it stood over against Judaism and Hellenism at the beginning, and as it stands over against churches and systems today, is a vast, searching, transcendental yet practical truth: All men are brethren. Here is the only secure principle of industrial organization. We trade as brothers; our object is to benefit one another; if we have our personal ends to serve, they are strictly subordinated to the general good. A gain of mine which wrongs others is illegitimate. The only legitimate gain benefits the whole body. The system of greedy competition, the unprincipled exploitation of labor to pile up wealth, the steady use of an economic "law" of wages to press the wage down to a starvation limit, the brutal use of accumulated wealth to curtail or destroy the rights of the workers—this whole system stands revealed in the light of the principle just enunciated as not only immoral but criminal.

The speculator or financier may come within the grasp of the law on technical grounds as dishonest, the millionaire may be mulcted by a progressive income tax, an outraged community may take vengeance on notorious delinquents; but behind all these outward signs lies the deeper reality of right and wrong. Every action between man and man which is unsuitable between brothers stands condemned in the light of our common humanity. If men are fallen into poverty, they are still brothers. The trade union does not erect a barrier between the brothers, or snap the family tie. Then poverty is a clear claim on the community for help and relief. A relief which feeds instead of removing the poverty is no relief. The interest of the rich is to remove the poverty of their poorer brothers. To enjoy vast wealth in face of hopeless poverty is inhuman. From this point of view it is evidently the object of all political or municipal organization to equalize opportunities for all, to train all to take their part efficiently in the body-politic, and to succor those who, through infirmity or misfortune, are disqualified. It is a recognized duty to minister to the sick. The hospital, the nurse, the doctor are at hand for all diseases. It is no less a duty to minister to the unfortunate, to those who by a turn of the industrial machine, or by the fluctuations of commerce, or by the very nature of their employment, are put at a disadvantage and unable to earn their living.

A useless individual in a community is a disease: the healthy organism brings its curative forces to bear on the diseased spot. The idle rich who waste their manhood in dissipation are a disease. The idle poor who cannot get work to do, or are untrained to do it, are a disease. The two diseases appear to be mutually related. A healthy community strives to cure them both. And yet prevention is more important than cure. Legislation and administration should study to prevent the diseases in the body-politic. The nations make too much of military defenses against foreign aggression. They waste their substance in preparing for war, and in nourishing a hostile spirit to other nations, forgetting that they too are our brothers. But we do not give anything like sufficient attention to internal defense, to securing ourselves against the diseases which sap our strength. The ideal which is dictated by our brotherhood is, as a minimum, this: That every human being born in our country should be trained for a definite work, and prepared for a suitable and honorable place in the social organism; that each should count as one, and each one should be esteemed important and essential. Education, opportunity, discipline, correction, should be given to all, as in a family, with encouragement for dutifulness and efficiency, and chastisement for idleness and uselessness, chastisement tempered with mercy and with the strong desire to redeem. This may be called fundamental Socialism.

But whether this fundamental principle can be best worked out by what is called State Socialism is a question which remains sub judice. Communism is abandoned. Fourier's phalansteries and Owen's communistic settlements are clearly impracticable. A Socialist, in spite of the lingering ignorance of the subject which still survives, is not one who asks for a crude redistribution of property. In the story of an earlier date the Rothschild of the time, confronted by the Socialist demanding the redistribution of his wealth, replied: "I have worked it out, and find that my property if divided would give fourpence a head to our population. There"—giving him a fourpenny-piece—"take your share and be gone." No, the fundamental socialist is not a communist. But he thinks he sees a way of reclaiming for the community the land which has passed into private ownership; or he thinks that the capital of the country can be claimed by the country. Or possibly he confines his attention to municipal socialism; the municipality can possess the commodities and conveniences—lighting, locomotion, the telegraph, etc.—on which the comfort and life of the community depend. Or it can assert its right to the land on which the town stands, and purchase it at its prairie value. It would be a great convenience if Socialism had a mouthpiece which could speak for all. In the vast and wandering program of Socialism there are things which are desirable but impossible; it is to be feared that there are some which are possible and not desirable.

It is difficult to grasp the truth that, if the sense of property and respect for the right of ownership were destroyed, the dissolution of all social ties would rapidly follow. "What's mine is mine" has an unpleasant and selfish sound to sensitive altruistic ears. But the negative proposition, if one can imagine it taken seriously, "What is mine is not mine," with the correlative truth, "What is thine is not thine nor is anything anybody's," would mean a kind of delirium, a welter of chaos, in which human life, at least as it is organized and civilized, might be submerged. We are all bound to live on this earth, and we depend upon it for our meat and raiment. Private ownership therefore is limited by the obligation of the land of a country to provide food and clothing, standing-room and housing for all its inhabitants. If a few thousands own the land of America and its products, they must accept the responsibility of securing the necessities of life for the other inhabitants of the country. Ownership of the land can never mean the right to forbid the people of a country to live on the land, or to live by the land. And as to the socialization of industries, one cannot resist the feeling that if such a condition were to be fulfilled, it would result in a rapid emigration from our part of the world. All who love freedom and enterprise, all who rejoice in the keen conflict of wits and faculties, all who realize that life is expansion, effort, and failure, and hope of success, will seek to escape from such a Socialist régime, and find their felicity in far Cathay, or any part of the earth's surface where Socialism is not yet established.

It will be seen, then, that the proposals which are held to be distinctly socialistic must be considered in a dispassionate way, and with an open mind. They must not be confused with the fact of human brotherhood—which must be and obviously is a fundamental truth of human existence—and yet these proposals may be misguided or chimerical attempts to realize it. Difficult or impossible of proof on empirical grounds, incredible to many great thinkers of the pagan world, and ill appreciated by many of the learned and the religious of our own day, it is nevertheless proved by the facts of nature and the expositions of its interpreter, Science, that men all the world over are related in a true and essential kinship, no matter what may be their individual or national traits. Sacred and wonderful is this universal brotherhood of men. What joy or prosperity is possible for us while our brothers suffer or are disqualified, unless it be the joy of seeking to help them, and the prosperity which consists in succeeding? Of what intrinsic value is wealth unless it be in widest commonalty spread? What comfort in our stately home, what pleasure in our diversions, which simply shuts out our brothers. What satisfaction is there in making money unless it makes men? If our money-making does not gladden others, but even saddens them, how can we sleep on downy pillows, haunted by visions of the waste and ruin and degradation of our brothers and sisters?

This is the painful picture that rises before us as men everywhere contemplate the inhuman carnage which is now depopulating Europe under the guise of civilized warfare. Where was the influence of the socialistic leaders when that terrible struggle broke forth? Though ostensibly committed to an anti-militarist position, the Socialist party of Germany made but a feint at upholding this humanitarian idea when pressed by the powerful influence of a government bent upon securing a place in the sun at the expense of smaller and weaker nations. It is true that the government in question was an autocracy of the most vehement kind, as recent days have demonstrated; but if the thought of human brotherhood had been a fixed truth of German Socialism, a truth not to be sacrificed even at the call of death, the nobility of the stand thus taken would have brought signal honor to the secular life of the world, and would have put moribund Christianity to an endless shame. There are times that try men's hearts to the utmost: the day when the sword is lifted in an unjust and unnecessary war by a nation that has run amuck, is by no means the least significant of them. The party that stands true to its constitution at such a time will not only evince thereby its truthfulness, but will deeply impress the world with the proof of its usefulness.

It is patent to every thinking man today that we are as far away now, after twenty centuries of a progressive civilization, from the realization of an international comity and a feeling of brotherly love, as the ancient Romans were in the worst days of the gladiatorial shows. No human organization thus far formed for the establishing of the truth of the essential brotherhood of all nations that are on the earth, has been able to maintain itself against the imperialism of regal autocracy, the magisterial demands of an engrossing spirit of commercialism, or the invidious denunciations of a soulless ecclesiastical hierarchy. State Socialism was the last attempt made to accomplish this, and the result is now known to all men. But the ideal has been dimmed in no respect by these failures. The truth itself can never die: it is ingrained in the very nature of man. If man in general is to reach the summit height of his aspirations, he will never accomplish it alone. This can only be done in the spirit of fundamental socialism, the corner stone of which is UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD.

Judge Matthews on the Bible in the Public Schools.

In 1869 the Cincinnati, Ohio, School Board repealed a regulation that required that "the opening exercises in every department shall commence by reading a portion of the Bible by or under the direction of the teacher, and appropriate singing by the pupils."

Suit was entered for an injunction restraining the School Board from enforcing this repeal.

Stanley Matthews was one of the attorneys for the Board and repeal. The argument and the truth which he presented can never be improved: and in the presence of the wide-spread demand and effort now being made for "the reading of the Bible in the schools," this is as good today as ever. The Supreme Court of Ohio sustained his argument and position.

Stanley Matthews afterward became United States senator from Ohio, and was a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States when he died.

The following extract from his speech in that case of "The Bible in the Schools" is reproduced from the American Sentinel and Religious Liberty:

May it please your Honors: It would cost me a very painful physical effort to appear today in any case. It has cost me a very difficult and painful mental effort to appear in this. It is easy to swim with the tide, to go with the current, to follow in the wake of the multitude. To do things that are popular is not hard. But to stand by a man's individual moral convictions, in opposition not to enemies, but to friends, tries a man.

If your Honors please, it tries me. Except the loss of dear children, this is the most painful experience of my life—to be told that I am an enemy to religion, that I am an opponent of the Bible, that I have lost in this community my Christian character, and that my children and my grandchildren will reproach my memory for this day's work. For, all that and more, has not been whispered merely through the crowds, but has been told me to my face. If your Honors please, I would be silent today, if I dared; but I have no choice.

Believing as I do that an appeal is being made to this Court to wrest the law to an illegal end, as a lover of my profession I am under a professional obligation to withstand it.

Believing as I do that doctrines the most dangerous and mischievous to the value and safety of our glorious system of public schools are being preached and promulgated, doctrines that are equally as dangerous and mischievous to civil order and the safety and peace of the State, as a citizen, I feel under still higher obligation to oppose them.

I do say that the reading of the Holy Bible in the manner repealed by this resolution, is the teaching of a dogma in religion, held by only a portion of the religious community, objected to by a large part of the others, and that it is in a just, true and sober sense, a merely sectarian book.

Now, if your Honors please, the community is divided, you may say, in a general way... into at least three main divisions of positive religious beliefs. But I propose to confine myself now only to that division of the community—as to their positive religious belief I will include under one name all Protestant Christians, including every variety of faith, every sect and denomination.

Here are all these varieties of belief. The gentlemen say, What is conscience? It may be a very small matter, in their estimation, applied to other people—a very small matter not to be taken notice of.

But this will not do. We may call the eccentricities of conscience, vagaries if we please: but in matters of religious concern we have no right to disregard or despise them, no matter how trivial and absurd we may conceive them to be.

In the days of the Christian martyrs, the Roman lictors and soldiers despised and ridiculed the fanaticism that refused the trifling conformity of a pinch of incense upon the altar erected to the Cæsar that arrogated to himself the title and honor of "divine," or of a heathen statue.

Now here is the Christian community. Then there are a large number of the citizens of this community who are not Christians at all, and yet are devout religionists. They are the descendants of the men who crucified Christ; and yet, as old Sir Thomas Browne says, we ought not to bear malice against them for that, for how often since have we who profess his name, crucified him too!

Then there is another sect of religionists, and they are Christians. They are the Roman Catholics.

Now, if your Honors please, I try to stand impartial and neutral in this argument between these three sets of men. I am bound to look upon them all as citizens: all as entitled to every right, to every privilege, that I claim for myself.

But it is asked by some, who by asking it betray their want of comprehension of the real question: Have Protestants no rights? Can not the majority of the community insist upon their consciences? Must the rights of minorities alone be consulted? Are we to be ruled by Catholics, or Jews, or Infidels.

The answer is obvious and easy: Protestants have no rights, as such, which do not at the same time and to the same extent belong to Catholics as such, to Jews, and Infidels too.

Protestants have a civil right to enjoy their own belief, to worship in their own way, to read the Bible and teach it as a part of their religion.

But they have no right in this respect to any preference from the state, or any of its institutions. They have no right to insist upon Protestant practices at public expense, or in public buildings, or to turn public schools into seminaries for the dissemination of Protestant ideas.

They can claim nothing on the score of conscience, which they can not concede equally to all others. It is not a question of majorities or minorities, for if the conscience of the majority is to be the standard then there is no such thing as right of conscience at all. It is against the predominance and power of majorities, that the rights of conscience are protected: and have need to be.

If it be said that the Protestant conscience requires that the Bible be read by and to Protestant children, and it is a denial of a right of conscience to forbid it,—waiving at present the obvious and conclusive answer that no such right of conscience can require that the state shall provide out of the common taxes for its gratification—it is enough to say that;

Catholics then, too, have the same right to have their children taught according to their views—not out of the Douay Bible, if they do not consider that sufficient, but by catechism and in the celebration of the mass, if they choose to insist;

Jews have the same right to have their religion taught in the common schools—not from the English version of the Old Testament, but according to the practice of their synagogues;

And Infidels have the same right to have their children taught Deism, or Pantheism, or Positivism.

But, if your Honors please, do let me say, for I conceive it to be a privilege to say it, that I believe that this Book which I hold in my hand is a sacred Book in the highest sense of the term.

Now what can the law do—the civil law—in the presence of eternity and of these eternal truths, and of the distinctions and differences and human weaknesses and disabilities? Can the law rudely step in and say, because the majority of people profess faith in that, that therefore you shall daily be confronted with what you do not and can not receive?

For—and that is the gist of the thing—the reading of the Holy Scriptures in the appropriate commencement of the morning daily exercises of the public school is the teaching of the religious dogma that they are the inspired Word of God: and if it were not so held by the Protestant members of this community, there would be no such lawsuit here today as there is.

If it were the writings of Epictetus, of Seneca, or of Pliny, or moral philosophy, or anything of human composition and origin only, that taught the purest and the highest morality, nobody would be found to pay the expense of filing this bill to compel its daily reading.

It is because that exercise is intended, and valued only as it is intended, to teach the Christian doctrine as to the scheme of salvation offered by Christ, and the Protestant doctrine that the Book without note or comment is the infallible rule of faith and practice.

And therefore I say that the practice to be perpetuated by the power of the civil arm in this suit, is a practice which teaches a religious dogma, and in a sectarian sense. And I say that it is so indisputable, it is so self-evident—it is written upon every countenance in this room—that nothing else than that could account for the extraordinary interest taken in this trial and the efforts which are made to secure the interposition of this court.

Origin of Religions Generally.

Mind, to all appearances, operates upon and moves matter; and whenever a thing is set in motion by a force other than his own, man naturally looked for a cause. His success in finding it will be measured by the degree of intelligence which he brings to the investigation.

In primitive man the cause was certain to be untraceable by his untrained powers; and knowing only personal force, it was but natural that he should attribute personality to every force which he was unable to comprehend, and that force was always greater in proportion to the density of his ignorance. If he could have comprehended and explained all happenings, he would have had no excuse or reason for inventing the conception of a god to help him out. But so long as there are phenomena which he is compelled to array as unknowable, he is certain to imagine and project some kind of a god to fit the situation.

Hence the very first literature, and customs of the world, as we might expect, were of a religious character because man then was ignorant of anything higher or better.

All this is amply borne out by the researches of anthropologists, and are not open to dispute, and, besides, it all accords with what experience suggests would be the natural unfolding of the evolutionary process. As long as man was unable to know the laws by which things are produced, the behavior of things was to him as though they had no law, and he was wholly at sea in guessing what would happen next.

As there was a time in primeval days when no natural laws had been discovered by man, to him all things must have appeared as though brought about without a tangible cause, or haphazard. This confusion, of course, would be greatly enhanced and mystified by his experience of what occurs in sleep, for he dreams of visiting and observing distant scenes, and of taking lofty aerial flights, while he must have known by his own senses and the assurances of his comrades, that he had not traveled beyond his own crude couch, hence he concludes that he, or his soul, must be capable of separation from the body, and of taking excursions while his body remained unmoved. No doubt he often dreamed of meeting and conversing with old friends who he was well aware had died long before, and whose bodies he knew were not existent in the form he sees them; hence his conclusion is natural, that they are not entirely obliterated, or they could not thus appear before him.

These two primitive concepts in prehistoric man are the foundations upon which all religions then known became possible and we may add that from them have been evolved every religion, without exception, that has encumbered, polluted, and cursed the earth, and all of them have managed to do those very things.

The conception of a superior Being transcending all earthly forces would naturally awaken in the excitable primitive breast, as it does in modern man, sentiments of awe, reverence and worship; and conceiving this Being to be personal, would create the desire of propitiating his supposed evil moods by suitable sacrifices, gifts, and prayers. It is the belief of life after death, suggested by the supposed similitude of dreams and visions, that, to their minds, solves the great riddle of existence, and prompts the belief that some sort of adjudication of differences and wrongs suffered on earth, is to be made after the earthly life has ceased.

There was then a belief in some supernatural power or force, or at least a recognition of it, arising out of the two great primal ideas already existent, as above described.

The belief in a power superior to his own, that brought about things the operations of which he could not comprehend, was nothing more than a recognition that a power existed which he could not arbitrarily control.

This naturally gave birth to mystery and fear, for, from the facts of his own experience, he could but believe that this supernatural power was personal, being incapable of conceiving anything abstractly. He therefore concluded that all forms of force or power must be the result of motion, or accompanied by it, and originated by some person or persons; hence it was natural for early man to slide into Polytheism.

Familiar with the whims and moods of the people of his own tribe, he supposed that this superior power possessed both beneficent and malefic attributes, and that at times it would assist, while at other times it would hinder him in his undertakings, that is, it would sometimes be good and then bad. This gave rise to the classification of beneficent gods, and to wicked demons, and led to Dualism, as in the early stages of the Hebrew belief when their god was thought of and worshiped as the originator of both good and evil—two gods in one.

From this it was but a short step to the belief that the good spirit could be induced to manifest itself in special favors, if rightly importuned and influenced by the petitioner in his own behalf.

This was worship, and the belief that the evil spirit side of their deity could be bribed or propitiated by gifts, etc., is the key to the religious fervor characteristic of the early Hebrew people.

As corroborative of this we find in the early, or primitive religions of the world, men subjecting themselves voluntarily to the most horrible self-denials and flagellations to win the favor of their half-demon and half-beneficent god which gave rise to animal and even to human sacrifices, as set forth in the Old Testament, and carried into the New in the personal sacrifice of Jesus on the cross for the redemption of mankind.

Because of the great multiplicity of gods and demons that sprang up out of man's imagination in the infancy of the race, each having his preferred method of reverence or propitiation, there arose a parasitical body of men professing to have superior knowledge of the only proper and acceptable means of approaching gods; hence the origin of the various forms of priesthood that have come down to our day as an insult to our intelligence.

One of the branches of this prolific religious tree turns aside to worship ancestors. Having come to the belief that something other than body—call it soul or spirit, or what not continues after death, and that the virtues exhibited in life were among the immortal attributes of the deceased parent, we get the simon-pure form of ancestral worship so common in certain oriental countries.

The fact that the gods did not die like mortals, but continued after the death of all men, favored the notion that in the other world they would mete out justice, and avenge the wronged, hence the invention of man's immortality and a future state of rewards and punishments was a natural step along the lines of an impenetrable mystery. Thus originated the doctrine especially prominent in the Roman Catholic church that the protection of the god, or the leniency of the demon, was fully assured by joining the priest in partaking of the sacrifice or supper offered, and by him mysteriously imbibed and then transferred to the partakers with him, known as the "sacrificial meal," or eucharist.

One cannot help chiding the simpleness of man, in thus prostituting his otherwise noble faculties, and his manhood; or refrain from pitying the crudeness, ignorance, and stupefying fear that prompts him, in the midst of the uplifting influences of modern science, to continue the unreasonable slave and dupe of a religion, whose chief glory is that for twenty centuries it has succeeded only in blighting mankind, and in deluging the world in innocent blood.

Borough President Marcus M. Marks yesterday called the attention of those interested in the preservation of old St. John's chapel, in Varick street, that immediate action is necessary if the historic landmark is to be preserved. Final action will be taken at a meeting of the Board of Estimate on Friday.—Daily Paper (New York).

Cannot God stop the desecration of his sanctuary? Has he no easement after undisputed possession for so many decades? If the church was dedicated to God, how can it be demolished without his consent? Perhaps God has been dispossessed for failure to pay what the congregation expected. He may have failed to live up to his contract, or men may have misconstrued his agreement. Or perhaps the secular spirit of progress has conquered the orthodox holy spirit and is gradually bombing it out of its dugouts.

Too many men are receiving too big salaries, and too many men are receiving too small wages. The salary man is doing more to increase poverty than is the wage man. How to get the former to come down and how to get the latter to mount up are two of the most important problems of this age. In dealing with the facts of these two problems we are dealing with selfish men.

I have never followed anyone anywhere for anything. The universe is large enough for every man to go his own way. When I see hundreds of human beings going to the same church, year after year, I say to myself: You are all going wrong. Men and women should read and think more and worship less. Worship is not needed and does no good to mankind. Work is good, and all work helps the world.

We hear a great deal about the "blatant Atheist" and the "sneer of the skeptic." For one, I object to such phrases. I think the blatant Christian is more on earth; this person who affirms a God and damns those who do not believe in him, when there is no God that anyone can point to and prove. The sneer of the skeptic is simply an honest objection to the faith of the Christian, who believes without evidence and damns without justice.

Is God deaf or dead? If the crying of children for bread will not move the divine heart, then that heart does not beat for human suffering. If God would answer the Kaiser's prayers for victory, then he could not answer the child's prayer for food. The church goes on praying and goes on lying about the efficacy of prayer, and the people go on believing the lies and go on praying. I cannot see that there is anything in religion to brag about.

The God who does something for man is not in the world, only the God who does nothing. Some persons seem to think that worship of God brings protection from God. Does it? Where? The ground is covered with dead prayers, with unanswered petitions. Where one is saved, hundreds are lost. There is no safety but knowledge; no light but knowledge; no protection but knowledge. Give to all the knowledge of the few, and man will be saved.

Where's Jesus? If ever a person was completely lost, it's Jesus. Think of it! Think of the carelessness of the early Christians to lose their Savior! No one knows where the tomb of Jesus can be found. He is wiped out as if he had never lived. Every word about Jesus is a guess, or a lie. We have absolutely nothing true about his birth, life or death. The humbug of Christianity is becoming known to the world. Jesus is a myth and the church is a fraud. L. K. W.

On the Evangelist's Trail.

We did not invite that most eminent representative of American Christianity to come to New York, and hence we take no credit for the jump his presence here has given to the circulation of our literature. In the second week of his evangelistic labors, the demand for our pamphlet, "The Case of Billy Sunday," of which many editions have been printed in the past two years, sprang at a bound from say fifty per day to 8,500—at once exhausting the supply, which must be immediately renewed by putting the pamphlet again upon the press. More startling still, the newsvenders called for an edition in evening-paper style with a large heading to catch the eye, and this was also supplied by the issue of a Sunday Special and Revival Extra, 25,000, with additional matter and various illustrations.

We take some credit for quick action. Laying aside other work, we gathered our resources for this 25,000 edition, and in an hour or two passed it in "dummy" form to the printer. There was never a broadside to compare with it in the history of Freethought literature.

The distribution of "The Case of Billy Sunday" to the number of 8,500, bearing on the last page the information that more copies could be had at the office of THE TRUTH SEEKER, kept our door on the swing to admit persons in search of more enlightenment. The demand reacted also upon the paper itself, which was wanted by newsdealers in quantities not before required.

Literature.

What is the standard by which approximately we may distinguish literature from spurious literature? In the absence of any decisive verdict of an American Academy, we venture to suggest that literature is only that writing which combines truth and beauty. Writing which is at once true and beautiful, and such writing alone, deserves the name. A book may be true and useful, the facts it contains may be worth knowing, and they may be stated with accuracy and sincerity, such as a book of trade statistics or a medical or law book, and yet it may have no literary value, because it lacks beauty of form or diction.

On the other hand, a book may be beautiful and yet putrescent. It may set itself to describe the alluring forms of vice, and to shatter the moral sense of the reader, by draping evil in the shimmering gold and the voluptuous folds which make it irresistible. But its want of truth excludes it from the rank of literature. It is true, perhaps, in the sense that it accurately describes the ways and the attractions of evil, but it is false in that it represents those attractions as real, whereas they are delusive.

But will any writing which combines truth and beauty deserve to rank as literature? Is there not something more? Must not the truth be of sufficient weight and value, and must not the beauty be original, something freshly formed in a mind which sees as others have not seen? Emerson said that the way to write what should not be forgotten was to think and write sincerely. But is that enough? May we not write platitudes sincerely, not knowing that they are not discoveries? And can a sincere reproduction of platitudes be welcomed as literature? Emerson's idea of literature will stand if only we take account of the deep meaning of truth and of beauty. Every writer is a personality distinct from all others. Let him be completely sincere, frank, gifted with power to utter himself and his thought, without subterfuge or pretense, and that self-utterance, if only it has the quality of beauty, will be literature. The writer may clothe his thought in poetry or prose, in history or in fiction, in science or speculation, but his sincerity will be the truth of whichever form he adopts.

Literature, after all, is the reflection of writers. The writers must be good, sane, wise, clean, truth-loving, or their products cannot be literature. No one illustrates the qualities which make literature better than Charles R. Darwin. He was under the impression that he could not write. When he attempted to record the results of his patient observation, and to reason out the truths which were demonstrated by the vast accumulation of facts, he felt that he was grasping an unaccustomed weapon. He expected no success; but he achieved a success which surpasses the achievement of the literary artists of his time. He struggled to put into the plainest language the truth which was in him. He aimed only at conveying to the reader what was proved to him. Of himself as the medium he did not think at all. The result is that his books are valuable, not only as works of science, but as literature. The "Origin of Species" is a masterpiece of English.

Said David Hume: "If we take in hand a volume of divinity, or school metaphysics, for instance, let us ask, Does it contain any abstract reasoning concerning quantity or matter? No. Does it contain any experimental reasoning concerning matter of fact or existence? No. Commit it, then, to the flames; for it can contain nothing but sophistry and illusion."

The main objection to the vast deluge of printed matter under which the modern world is submerged is that it has not truth as its motive or its substance. Journalism aims at effect rather than at truth. It is corrupted by party feeling. It records things which are not true and corrects them on the following day. The writers have no interest in truth as such; their interest is in a swift and enormous sale. It is this which prevents journalism from being literature. Here and there a journalist honestly aims at truth, and writes articles which are literature. When the articles are collected a book emerges. But, like Coleridge's "Friend," such writings will never sell a paper. Such writers are soon at a discount.

To create the love of literature is a salutary object of education. Nor is anything else needed than to discriminate clearly between what is literature and what is not. Taste comes from discrimination. The mind trained to a love of literature will turn with fastidious distaste from writing which does not approach the standard. Vita sine litteris est mors was a saying of Robertson, the Scottish historian—"Life without literature is death." But a man should be careful in his estimation of literature.

Unbelief and "Brain-Power."

Among men of intellect there is so much indifference to religion that probably not one in a hundred of them ever feels impelled to express an opinion about it. When recently Prof. James H. Leuba started a statistical study of the belief in God and immortality among this class of men, one of them, deeming the question of no importance whatever, replied, "A man must be lacking a job or a mind to go into this business"; and another expressed his contempt for the subject by saying, "This is a lot of damned rot." This state of mind accounts for the lack of numbers of intellectually eminent men taking up the discussion of religion.

There are, nevertheless, on the list of Rationalists, Agnostics and Atheists many distinguished names, while from the writings of this class may be culled a considerable anthology on the merits of Infidels and heretics.

We do not know whether it is ignorance or conscious dishonesty that permits orthodox ministers of the gospel to declare that all the men who count for anything are Christians. A case raising this question comes to us from the town of Williston, in North Dakota, where in a recent sermon the leading Congregational minister of the place expressed himself as follows:

"Rationalism and Atheism are without leaders of any brain-power today. They are exploded theories. Whenever I hear anyone posing as a Rationalist in this age I immediately look for the scum on the stagnant surface of mental vacuum."

With the charity that thinketh no evil, we may conclude that the Williston minister speaks from ignorance. His statement would amuse Mr. Mangasarian of Chicago, for many years speaker for the Independent Religious Association (Rationalist), and our other Rationalist advocates in America. It would be received with hilarity by the larger number of men of science in this country who responded to Professor Leuba's inquiry whether they were believers in those fundamental dogmas of Christianity which Rationalists reject. Less than fifty per cent. of these men embrace a belief in God and immortality. It would attract, perhaps, the languid interest of Joseph McCabe and his associates in the Rationalist Press Association of England—such men as Edward Clodd, John M. Robertson, M. P., Prof. J. B. Bury, Sir E. Ray Lankester, Dr. Andrew D. White, Leonard Huxley, Eden Phillpotts, William Archer, Arnold Bennett, George Brandes, former President E. A. Schaefer of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, and so on. Perchance the minister would say that Thomas A. Edison nor the late Mark Twain was a man of brain-power.

From the Liberal Review of Chicago some expressions by eminent men relative to Infidels and heretics are quoted. They were contributed to that magazine (April, 1917) by Mr. Frank R. Walton:

"'Infidel' is a term of reproach which Christians and Mohammedans, in their modesty, agree to apply to those who differ from them."—Thomas Huxley.

"The name of Infidel is applied to the best of men; the wisest, the most spiritual and heavenly of our brothers."—Theodore Parker.

"A skeptic is nothing but a man finding his way, oftentimes, to a higher level. He is a man who is forsaking rubbish, with the object of getting hold of the substance. He is a man who will not eat hay, but wants fresh grass."—H. W. Beecher: Evolution and Religion, Vol. II, p. 402.

"Many of the best and noblest men now living are Agnostics—what Dr. Wace would call Infidels."—Prof. Momerie: Church and Creed, p. 77.

"The epithets 'Infidel' and 'Atheist' have been used against almost every man who has ever done anything new for his fellow men. The list of those who have been denounced as 'Infidel' and 'Atheist' includes almost all great men of science, general scholars, inventors and philanthropists."—Andrew D. White: Warfare Between Science and Theology, I, 135.

"Those who help the world out of its ignorance and superstition, and up into the light, go to hell."—Rev. Minot J. Savage.

"I am disposed to think that a great and steadily increasing proportion of the moral worth of society lies outside of the churches."—Dr. Alexander Bruce, D. D.

"It is historically true that a large proportion of Infidels in all ages have been persons of distinguished integrity and honor."—John Stuart Mill.

"Many earnest and high-minded men prefer to belong to no ecclesiastical denomination."—Lord Adam Gifford, in his deed of foundation of the Gifford Lectureships.

"The same vigor which has shown itself in the increase of material energies, the extension of science, and the exploration of history is manifest in the passionate eagerness with which modern men have sought for truth. The movement of doubt has gathered to itself much of the best life of the century."—Ida D. Scudder (Catholic): The Witness of Denial, pp. 17-18 (1895).

"The intellect of England for the last fifty years has, with few exceptions, renounced even what Dr. Arnold would have called Christianity."—Alfred W. Benn: English Rationalism in the Nineteenth Century, Vol. II, p. 503.

"'Contempt and abhorrence' had in fact at all times constituted the common Christian temper towards every form of critical dissent from the body of received opinion; and only since the contempt and abhorrence have been in a large degree retorted on the bigots by instructed men has a better spirit prevailed."—Rt. Hon. John M. Robertson, M.P.: History of Freethought, Vol. II, p. 366.

"Calumny is the homage which dogmatism has ever paid to conscience. Even in the period when the guilt of heresy was universally believed, the spirit of intolerance was only sustained by the diffusion of countless libels against the misbeliever, and by the systematic concealment of his virtues."—William E. H. Lecky: History of Rationalism in Europe, II, 263.

The minister we have quoted takes advantage of his obscurity to continue, so far as his words can reach, the libels and systematic concealment of the virtues of the Rationalist. The refutation of his ill-conceived statement has been easy and complete, but let us add a testimonial to the Atheist from another president of the British Association for the Advancement of Science. Said John Tyndall:

"It may comfort some to know that there are among us many whom the gladiators of the pulpit would call Atheists and Materialists, whose lives, nevertheless, as tested by any accessible standard of morality, would contrast more than favorably with the lives of those who seek to stamp them with this offensive brand. When I say 'offensive,' I refer simply to the intention of those who use such terms, and not because Atheism or Materialism, when compared with many of the notions ventilated in the columns of the religious newspapers, has any particular offensiveness to me. If I wished to find men scrupulous in their adherence to engagements, whose words are their bond, and to whom moral shiftiness of any kind is subjectively unknown; if I wanted a loving father, a faithful husband, an honorable neighbor, and a just citizen, I would seek him among the band of Atheists to which I refer. I have known some of the most pronounced among them—not only in life but in death—seen them approaching with open eyes the inexorable goal, with no dread of a 'hangman's whip,' with no hope of a heavenly crown, but still as mindful of their duties, and as faithful to the discharge of them, as if their eternal future depended upon their latest deeds."

There may be something lacking, from a religious point of view, in the intellectuals of Rationalists. They may lack that spiritual insight which enables Christians to ingest as fact the myths of the Bible, including Adam and his rib, Noah and his ark, Jonah and his whale, God and his son, and Mary and her ghost; but certainly the men of science and thought whom Rationalists and Atheists celebrate have not wanted brain-power. That is the last lie a minister should allow himself to vend.

"Billy," Bible, and "Booze."

Evangelist Sunday has frequently declared it to be his purpose to wipe out the liquor traffic in the various cities in which he has set up his tabernacle. Much of his denunciatory language is aimed against those who sell liquor as well as those who use it as a beverage. Viler speech could not be used with reference to any portion of our communities than that reeled off by Sunday against those who occasionally indulge in a stimulating glass, or who have alcoholic drinks in their homes for medicinal or other purposes. During all these invidious tirades against liquor drinking and personal rights, this inconsistent preacher has never told his audiences what the Bible has to say about wine drinking, or what relation the custom bears to the mind and purposes of God.

Sunday says that he believes the Bible from cover to cover; if that be so, he must believe what it says concerning the world-old practice of the drinking in moderation, of the choice extract of the fruit of the vine. We not only read in the Bible of God's people refreshing themselves with the old wines of Lebanon with his approval, but we also read of Christ, the savior of the world, as Sunday calls him, causing a bountiful supply of "good wine" to be created during the progress of a marriage feast, that there might be no lack of that exhilarating beverage on such a joyful occasion. And lest mankind should forget the high medicinal qualities of wine, St. Paul reminds one of his disciples to take a little wine occasionally for his stomach's sake.

Why is it that this "consecrated" evangelist does not tell the truth about his own text-book? If he really knows his Bible, he cannot consistently dodge the fact that wine was the usual drink among all the nations of which the Bible treats. The effort made by certain pious persons, who are more concerned for the supremacy of the scriptures than for that of truth, to make a case in favor of the Bible by declaring that the wine of the Bible was not our modern fermented drink, but a simple grape juice which the ancients called must, has long since been discredited by the body of believers themselves. People do not become intoxicated by drinking grape juice; therefore the must notion would not account for the numerous cases of drunkenness which appear on the pages of "holy writ." The fact is, that Christianity, as revealed in the New Testament, has done more to build up the liquor traffic in the world than any other influence.

The Gospel of Christ has nothing to say against liquor drinking, but on the contrary, presents an approving attitude; and the church, in order to show its agreement with the teaching of its founder, administers its second great sacrament by means of an intoxicating drink.

Who is responsible, then, for the drinking habit among men if it be not the Christian church itself?

The church cannot consistently condemn the use of spirituous drinks while it continues to use an intoxicating beverage in the administration of its "Holy Communion"?

Why does not the Rev. Mr. Sunday attack the Bible and the church as the agents responsible for the general practice of liquor drinking, instead of abusing the people of a particular community who are simply doing what the church does. But no evangelist ever tells the truth regarding Christianity and the Bible; and so the people must continue to suffer the contempt and abuse which belong to the Bible and the church, from fanatical evangelists and church preachers, who know neither the Bible nor human nature.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has twice published a letter from Judge Jesse W. Weik of Greencastle, Ind., asking the co-operation of readers in providing a marker for the grave of the Hon. W. H. Herndon, the best biographer of Lincoln, whose remains are buried in Springfield, Ill., the city where for twenty-five years he was Lincoln's law partner. Judge Weik is co-author of Herndon and Weik's Life of Lincoln. In our number for March 31, J. E. Remsburg, author of "Abraham Lincoln: Was He a Christian?" and President of the Secular Union, pledged the organization to a contribution of $10 to the fund, and suggested that readers send their contributions to this office to be forwarded. In both letters of Judge Weik we gave his full address and hope that sums have been sent direct to him, as none has been received here. In these times there are many demands on the attention and the pockets of all, but something may be spared, perhaps, for this cause. Herndon is the man who revealed Lincoln to us as a Freethinker, which gives his memory a claim to be kept alive by those who feel they have profited by his labors, his honesty and his courage.

It is not from inclination, or because it thinks him worth it, that THE TRUTH SEEKER devotes so much space to the Rev. William Ashley Sunday, D.D. But this is a paper devoted to Freethought, which must therefore deal with religious phenomena, even what the men of science would call "sports." The Rev. Sunday stands before all other men as the representative Christian clergyman of the American form of the Christian religion. No other minister has the backing of such numbers of the cloth; no other preaches to so large a congregation or earns so large a financial reward, and none commands so much space in the public prints. He is more the embodiment and exponent of Christianity today than was St. Paul in the century after Christ. To deal with the Rev. William Ashley Sunday and his utterances, then, is to deal with the current expression of the Christian faith as at other times we deal with it historically and critically and in general.

Says a correspondent: "In the 1913 World Almanac, under 'Religious Association,' are: 'Freethinkers, 5,250,000.' So you are a religious paper after all." This year's Almanac omits Freethinkers, but gives "Unclassified, 15,280,000," and apparently adds that number to the "population according to creed." THE TRUTH SEEKER discovered it was a "religious" paper when one of the rules regarding the publishing of circulation was waived in its behalf, the same as for our pious exchanges.

Friends who would like to see a specimen of the 25,000 illustrated edition of our Sunday Special and Revival Extra may receive one by sending a two-cent stamp. It contains no new matter that has not appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hence is not issued as a supplement to any regular edition. Should events justify the venture, we shall put out another Extra more particularly addressed to the inquiry whether the religion dispensed at this revival has any basis in truth and fact.

The Board of Education of New York should take notice that Catholic teachers in the public schools are ordering children of Catholic families to attend church, and that Protestant and Jewish teachers are following their example. Evidently the teachers are under orders from some one. What is that source and whence its authority to control the religious habits of public school pupils?

Someone has defined justice as "fair play." Unjust conduct is not justice. Punishing the human race for the sin of Adam is not fair play. We must not rest content with the fact that the irrational theories are not taught as much as they formerly were. A true conception of Nature does not leave room for any of them. Christendom needs to be entirely rid of the mephitic air of the ideas concerning God and his methods, handed down from the dark ages.—R. E.

Some men assert that Christianity has taught mankind the value of freedom. It certainly has not been the advocate of free thought; and what is freedom worth if the mind is to be enslaved?—Robert G. Ingersoll.

"MEDIUMSHIP" OF JESUS.

The Abnormal Powers He Displayed That Make Him Acceptable to Spiritualists.

While some Spiritualists are frankly skeptical as to the existence of Jesus, the majority believe that he once lived upon this earth as an actual man, but doubt his divinity as a god. I have myself, as a Spiritualist lecturer, preached under the "inspirational influence of spirits" (in reality, enthusiasm) and said that this Man of Nazareth was "a medium of mediums, the Master-Adept of Mediumship." I have also been upon platforms where the mediums gave it out that they were under the guardianship of this Jesus Christ—he was their spirit-guide, the chief of their band of guides, and so on.

Evolving from Swedenborgianism into Spiritualism, I ceased to believe in the divinity of Christ, but after studying astrology I quit believing in him at all; and whatever reality we find in the New Testament concerning him comes through the dramatic presentation of him as a composite character, the hero of a fictitious novel known to the world as the New Testament, the name of this god-hero being "Jesus Christ, the Savior of the World."

I do not now know of any prominent Spiritualist (unless it be Dr. Peebles) who believes in the divinity of Jesus or his miraculous conception, but the majority of Spiritualists do believe in him as a healer of disease, a medium possessing clairvoyance, clairaudience, clairsentience, and the power of raising the dead (as in the case of Lazarus), as well as the ability to materialize in a physical body after death (the resurrection).

One of the peculiar superstitions afflicting 20th-century Spiritualists was prevalent in ancient days concerning sickness. It is that devils (or "evil spirits" as they are now called) are responsible for the ills of the body, and that as a "healing medium" Christ showed his mastery over them by throwing them out of the body of the victims they infested.

No spirit medium ever goes insane. At one time in the history of thought a lunatic was considered to be under the influence of Luna, the moon-goddess of the night; at another era sexual aberrations were attributed to the influence exercised upon mortals by Sin, the Assyrian moon-god. So those who were originally under the influence of Sin were simply controlled by the moon-god. This the orthodox Christians do not know. In Christ's day people were "possessed of devils," and he cast out these bad spirits. So the mediums who are sent to our madhouses today are not really insane, but, according to Spiritualist philosophy, "obsessed by evil spirits."

Spiritualists prove Christ to be a healing medium by the following words of St. Matthew:

"And Jesus went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of sicknesses and all manner of disease among the people.

"And his fame went throughout all Syria: and they brought unto him all sick people that were taken with divers disease and torments, and those which were possessed with devils, and those which were lunatick, and those that had the palsy; and he healed them." (Matt. iv, 23, 24).

Not only that, but he seemed to have the ability of conferring upon his disciples this same power. (See Matt. x, 8; Luke ix, 2 and x, 9.)

That this "casting out of devils," or, as some of our healing mediums now put it, relieving people of "obsessing influences," was a strong part of his mission, may also be seen from passages of holy writ. "Heal the sick, cleanse the lepers, raise the dead, cast out devils," were a part of his instructions to the twelve disciples whom he sent out into the world, and in the first verse of the tenth chapter of Matthew we are told that "when he had called unto him his twelve disciples, he gave them power against unclean spirits, to cast them out, and to heal all manner of sickness and all manner of disease." The ninth and tenth chapters of Luke reveal the same thing.

A number of religious organizations have arisen in the Western world, such as the New Thoughtists, Mental Scientists, Christian Scientists and the Emmanuel movement, which profess to be "following Christ" because their ministers claim to heal various nervous disorders, some by one method, some by another, but all except the Spiritualists balk at the literal meaning of the words "casting out devils," interpreting such terms to mean what they certainly do not, viz., the devils of fear, of worry, of doubt or of appetite; for such devils could not talk back to Christ as they did in the story of the Gadarene swine.

The Spiritualists contend that these were evil or obsessing spirit influences and that many of their mediums are literally doing today what Christ predicted when he said: "Greater things shall ye do than I do," and others are still trying to become greater than the Christ, even some Theosophists entering here into competition by posing as the reincarnated embodiment of the Nazarene messiah and Christian savior. Let me here remark that either the Spiritualists are right or the whole thing is an allegory, a piece of religious fiction; and the Rationalist, of course, in his ungodly but scientific criticism and historical research, concludes the latter explanation is the correct and reasonable one.

Again, the Spiritualists will tell us that when Christ was tempted by the devil, taken up into an exceeding high mountain according to Luke iv, 5 (though Matthew says it was the pinnacle of a temple), and asked to bow down before His Satanic Majesty in exchange for power and dominion over all the kingdoms of the world, it was simply an evil spirit trying to wean the medium Jesus from his high and holy mission. Yet Jesus seemed to know the fellow, for he bade him, "Get thee behind me, Satan!" (Matt. iv, 10.)

Rationalists who believe that a man named Jesus lived will say this experience came to Christ because, after fasting forty days and forty nights in the wilderness, he got to "seeing things"—one of the common experiences of long fasting. Some people have claimed that after a protracted fast "their spiritual eyes were opened" and they saw the spirits. I have myself seen all sorts of things under fasting conditions. Some mediums say that their clairvoyant and clairaudient powers came to them by way of the fast.

In the eighth chapter of Matthew we have a manifestation of "magnetic" healing in the laying of hands upon the leper (viii, 2) and in the treatment of Peter's mother-in-law, as fever was taken away by a touch. (See fourteenth and fifteenth verses.) We have also absent mental treatment in the case of the centurion's servant (viii, 13). In the ninth chapter Jesus cures a man of palsy, heals through the hem of his garment a woman with a twelve years' blood disease, awakens the daughter of a ruler from a trance, and casts devils out of a dumb man, whose conversational powers had been discontinued by a devil from the spirit world.

As a hypnotist he has his disciples bewildered because he makes them think first that they see a spirit, and then afterwards he convinces them it is himself walking upon the water.

His clairvoyant power he shows by telling a woman at one time "all things that ever she did," just as some of our mediums do today. On one occasion he aroused the latent clairvoyance of his disciples by making them see Moses and Elias. Some Spiritualists inform us that these two ancients were the spirit guides of this medium Jesus. But the Theosophist wonders how that could be, as "Before Abraham was I am" (John viii, 58). Hence he must be a reincarnated Mahatma, or master-adept—all this, of course, whether our interpretation of scripture be theosophical or spiritualistic.

Again, at his baptism by John he made people see a dove descend upon his head and hear a voice say, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." He made the people believe also, through the power of suggestion, that this bird was the Holy Ghost descending upon him with testimonials from above. Certain Spiritualists say that this dove was purely symbolical, and had to do with his divine mission figuratively, while Theosophists tell us it was only the thought-form of a dove that was seen—the same as a man with the delirium tremens will clairvoyantly see the thought-form of a dangerous snake coming to get him; and may I say that both snake and dove are phenomena of real animal appearance to the eyes that saw, and one as actual as the other.

In his "Sixteen Crucified Saviors" Kersey Graves informs us concerning the spiritual mediumship of Jesus Christ, that the one whom he mistakenly called "God" and "Father" was naught but a spirit guide. "Billy" Sunday says (and I find myself partially agreeing with this bad-tempered, dyed-in-the-wool Christian revivalist):

"I consider the work of Spiritualist mediums the work of the devil. Spiritualism is against Christianity. They have pretended to call back Tom Paine and get him to say that he's in heaven living with John Bunyan, and they have pretended to get George Whitfield to testify against Christianity. It's tommyrot, the work of the devil."

In rebuttal Spiritualists may say "Billy" is "obsessed" by Jonathan Edwards or some such fellow; aye, even by Jesus Christ himself in his more vituperative moments, as in the twenty-third chapter of Matthew and other places. If theosophy be true, "Billy" may be the reincarnation of this mad medium Jesus of Nazareth, who lived before Abraham as an "I AM."

While as a Spiritualist lecturer I could recommend Jesus as a "medium of mediums," as a Rationalist, I cannot certify even to his being a medium at all, nor swear to his earthly existence. According to the New Testament record he was at times a bad seer, for he certainly failed miserably when he prophesied the second coming of the Christ "in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." (See Matt. xxiv, 29-36; Mark xiii, 23-33; Luke xxi, 7-33.)

To the incident of the Gadarene swine and the resurrection of this Messiah I will devote the remainder of my article. Spiritualists assert that the resurrection story shows Jesus Christ to be a materializing medium—a superstition that affords the greatest basis and latitude for fraud.

For devils entering into swine, study the eighth chapter of Matthew. Professor Huxley thinks that to be a consistent Christian one must believe in this demonological story, and if that be true the Spiritualists who accept it are more Christian than many claiming to be orthodox who disbelieve the tale. Huxley writes:

"When such a story as that about the Gadarene swine is placed before us, the importance of the decision, whether it be accepted or rejected, cannot be overestimated. If the demonological part of it is to be accepted, the authority of Jesus is unmistakably pledged to the demonological system current in Judea in the first century. The belief in devils who possess men and can be transferred from men to pigs becomes as much a part of Christian dogma as any article of the creeds."

There is a difference in the story as told by Matthew (viii, 28-34) and that told in the fifth chapter of Mark or the eighth chapter of Luke. Mark and Luke tell us that there was only one man afflicted with an unclean spirit, while in Matthew we have two. Luke and Matthew are both indefinite as to the number of swine, but call it "a great herd," while in Mark v, 13, we read that there were two thousand swine. If Jesus was the great medium some Spiritualists believe, why should he obey the devils within the man or men and send them into the swine, destroying them as property, especially since the swine had done nothing to Jesus to anger him? Again, if there were two thousand swine and one devil was sent into each, there must have been one thousand devils in each maniac, if Matthew is correct, and two thousand if it was one man as Mark and Luke have it. Some story! No wonder the people in that farming community were alarmed and wanted Jesus to depart out of their midst.

As to the materialization of Jesus, it is what the materializing Spiritualists emphasize strongly, but in the three interpretations of this fictitious phenomenon—viz., the Christian, the Spiritualist and the Christian Scientist—one is as irrational as the other.

That the Christian's idea of the resurrection of the Christ as a god of divine power who conquered hell and the grave is irrational, all my readers will agree, but that the materialization of so-called spirit substance back into flesh-and-blood by any sort of chemical process is also irrational will be disputed by my Spiritualist friends. They have "seen it done" in the dark seance room; and no amount of argument can prove to them that they were hypnotized into believing that they saw the materialized form—their mother or father, sweetheart or wife—come back from the shadow of the grave. The average Spiritualist phenomena-chaser is just as adamant against any process of reasoning, unless it agree with his philosophy, as the most rabid Christian. Both believe what they want to believe.

According to the Christian Scientists, Jesus never died, though the gospel story leads to the conclusion that he did. On page 42 of the 1915 edition of Mrs. Eddy's "Science and Health" we read the following sentences:

"The resurrection of the great demonstrator of God's power was the proof of his final triumph over body and matter, and gave full evidence of divine Science,—evidence so important to mortals. The belief that man has existence or mind separate from God is a dying error. This error Jesus met with divine Science and proved its nothingness. Because of the wondrous glory which God bestowed on his anointed, temptation, sin, sickness, and death had no terror for Jesus. Let men think they had killed the body! Afterwards he would show it to them unchanged. This demonstrates that in Christian Science the true man is governed by God—by good, not evil—and is therefore not a mortal but an immortal. Jesus had taught his disciples the Science of this proof. He was here to enable them to test his still uncomprehended saying, 'He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also.' They must understand more fully his Life-principle by casting out error, healing the sick, and raising the dead, even as they did understand it after his bodily departure."

Were we now to dissect this paragraph, analyzing its various statements, we could show how childish and irrational its assertions are in the light of reason. But, of course, the irrationalists and the metaphysical types of mind would not recognize the form of genuine Truth if they should meet it wandering in the street. Truth to be recognized by them would need to come garbed in some mystic verbiage of the occult. As Friend Sprading would say, "It would have to be covered with oriental mildew!"

At this time the writer will make only one criticism of the Eddy paragraph: None of the assertions contained therein are true.

Returning to the materialized body of Jesus in the resurrection: In analyzing this story I will take the twentieth chapter of John, which is as good as any for the purpose, although, according to some of the Biblical students among the Spiritualists, the Old Testament teaches the actual resurrection of the body—which is simply scriptural phraseology for describing materialization.

"Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise," says Isaiah, xxvi, 19. What is this but the materialization of a physical body after death? And I have been told by an ex-Methodist preacher, now a Spiritualist lecturer, that the early Christians taught and believed in the actual materialization of the physical body, calling it "the resurrection." In contradiction to all this, however, read Ecclesiastes iii, 19, 20.

The most important part of the "materialization" manifestations given in this twentieth chapter of John relate to the appearance of Jesus before his disciples when "the doors were shut." (See verses 19 and 26.)

From the context one cannot but believe that by the doors being shut, they were in all probability locked. Jesus had now become a spirit and appeared in the midst of his disciples. In the Spiritualistic philosophy, a spirit can pass through solid wood, but matter such as the human body cannot. Yet we are told that Jesus had the doubting Thomas thrust his hand into his side and feel of his wounds. If Jesus had not died because of the crucifixion and his natural body came in through the door in the natural way, we would not question this occurrence. But if Jesus Christ was a spirit on the outside of the door and entered the room through solid wood as a spirit, did he immediately materialize into the physical body he had before he died? If so, how did he do it? Neither Christian nor Spiritualist can tell us.

To my mind there is close analogy between the idea of rebirth as viewed by Nicodemus, another questioner, and the doctrine of the Spiritualists with regard to materialization as well as the Theosophical contention that there is such a thing as reincarnation.

"Jesus answered and said unto him, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.

"Nicodemus saith unto him, How can a man be born when he is old? can he enter the second time into his mother's womb, and be born?" (John iii, 3, 4).

Jesus in his answer specifically said:

"That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." (6th verse, same chapter).

If this be true, there is no reincarnation, and admitting for the sake of argument the spiritualistic hypothesis, that people, become spirits after the body's death, we can say that the chicken never returns to the egg from which it was hatched, the oak never goes back to the acorn from which it grew, nor does flower, fruit, animal or man ever return by means of either reincarnation or materialization to the particular embodiment or form of matter it had once before.

It would be just as improbable for spirit to again return to matter as for a grown man to again try to wear the little under-things he did when six or seven years of age. The laws of the universe do not work that way.

So the arguments for the existence of Jesus as a medium are equally worthless and unhistorical with those that attempt to prove him the very God himself come down to earth in the shape of his son Jesus Christ, the savior of the world. Whatever apparently genuine phenomena have occurred in the way of materialization in the dark seance room have been produced either through mass hypnotism or through mechanical contrivances.

The First Paine Excursion.

It is gratifying to read in THE TRUTH SEEKER that at last a liberal individual, Mr. Ludwig, has left to the National Paine Association a substantial legacy of $25,000 for a home for indigent liberals. It recalls to my mind an item of ancient history regarding Gilbert Vale, who as president of a society of Liberals formed an organization known as the Paine Farm Association to purchase the Thomas Paine Farm then (Jan. 27, 1850) advertised for sale. Subscription books were opened and the following June the Paine Farm was purchased for $5,500. Of this amount $1,500 cash was paid, leaving a balance of $4,000; while $75 was subscribed to build an industrial school.

In the appeal sent out Jan. 27, 1850, it was proposed that "an asylum is wanted for infirm 'Liberals' some of whom have previously been exposed for want of such an institution."

It may be of interest to note the officers of this Association: Citizen Priest, President; Citizen Curtis, First Vice-President; Citizen Daly, Second Vice-President; Citizen Love, Treasurer; Citizen Smith, Secretary; Citizen P. Eckler, Corresponding Secretary. The Society of Liberals met in Eagle Hall, No. 26 Delancey street.

The Paine Farm having been acquired by purchase, the Paine Farm Association decided to celebrate the event on the 4th of July, 1850, by an excursion.

The steamer "Ivanhoe," with two barges with a band of music, was secured, which left Hammond street at 7 o'clock and was to return to the city at 8 p. m. There were 400 passengers on board, patriotic airs and music for the dancing were played. Carriages were in waiting to convey visitors to the Paine House. After viewing the monument "the company proceeded to the Farm House, and partook with a keen appetite of the abundant refreshments which were provided. . . . Nothing occurred to mar the festivities of the day, and we think that all will retain pleasant reminiscences of this first public excursion to the Paine Farm." (Age of Reason, P. Eckler, Publisher, 21 Ann Street, New York.)

More than three score years have passed since that event. Would it not be a good idea to repeat that excursion to New Rochelle the coming Fourth of July?

Newton and the "Plan."

In a splendid article, "On the Plan of Salvation" by Channing Severance one mistake appears in classing the religious belief of Sir Isaac Newton with that of Gladstone and Samuel Johnson.

Newton is so generally put in that class by all Christian writers that the mistake is a very natural one. To give the facts, and also the reason for the facts, I quote at length from Buckle's "Civilization in England":

"With scarcely an exception, all those writers who were most favored by Charles exhausted the devices of their ribald spirit in mocking a religion of the nature of which they were profoundly ignorant. These impious buffooneries would, by themselves, have left no permanent impression on the age; but they deserve attention, because they were the corrupt and exaggerated representatives of a more general tendency. They were the unwholesome offspring of that spirit of disbelief, and of that daring revolt against authority, which characterized the most eminent Englishmen during the seventeenth century.

"It was this which caused Locke to be an innovator in his philosophy, and a Unitarian in his creed. It was this which made Newton a Socinian; which forced Milton to be the great enemy of the church, and which not only turned the poet into a rebel, but tainted with Arianism the 'Paradise Lost.'

"In a word, it was the same contempt for tradition, and the same resolution to spurn the yoke, which, being first carried into philosophy by Bacon, was afterwards carried into politics by Cromwell; and which, during that very generation, was enforced in theology by Chillingworth, Owen, and Hales; in metaphysics by Hobbes and Glanvil; and in the theory of government by Harrington, Sydney and Locke.

"The progress which the English intellect was now making towards shaking off ancient superstitions was still further aided by the extraordinary zeal displayed in the cultivation of the physical sciences."

This is a comprehensive statement, and Buckle is not apt to be mistaken as to the religious views of these men. Milton, we know, became an outspoken Unitarian before his death. Of the names mentioned by Mr. Severance, only Dickens and Newton had minds of the first order. Gladstone has left not a line that will live. Johnson was a mighty engine for labor; nothing more. Webster gave great expression to small ideas. As with Johnson, his "minnows talked like whales." He never believed that the country west of the Mississippi would be settled. His morals were so easy and his honesty so complaisant that we are not sure even of his religion. As a literary merchant, Professor Wallace must profess faith in his stock in trade.

It is not great minds that preserve the faith, but the "limitations of the common people."

Intellect is not the only force that carries men to heights of achievement. John Howard was feeble-minded, but, had his mind been directed that way, he might have been another Wesley, and have founded a great religion.

Great minds must sometimes make concessions to popular error, even to the extent of giving it their sanction. Kepler did not dare to oppose the superstitions of his day, but when a charge of witchcraft was brought against his mother he came promptly to her defense. Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER are familiar with the writings of the "Rev." Thomas B. Gregory. Few men are doing more for the cause of Rationalism than he, and he is working inside the church. On April 23, 1916, he published in the Sunday papers his article on "The Six Greatest Books." The books named as the six greatest are: "The Revolution of the Heavenly Bodies," by Copernicus; "The Spirit of Laws," by Montesquieu; "The Free Inquiry," by Middleton; "The Wealth of Nations," by Smith; "The Principles of Geology," by Lyell; and "The Origin of Species," by Darwin. He leaves his readers to discover that, among these six authors, not one accepted any religious dogma. Copernicus and Middleton were nominally within the church. They "ate the bread of the church while denying her doctrines." Copernicus is claimed by Christianity just as is Newton, but he was never a priest, and never wore the vestments shown in some of his portraits. His monument, with its famous inscription, was erected by the church nearly half a century after his death. Do not be in a hurry to accept the statement that any really great man sincerely and persistently accepted "the plan of salvation."

Our Benighted Press.

Every one who has been engaged in Freethought propaganda knows that it is almost impossible to get facts or arguments against superstition into the newspapers of our country. Billy Sunday can get pages of his twaddle printed, but there is not a single sheet from the Atlantic to the Pacific that would print a column of Ingersoll, or Remsburg, or Gauvin. They are afraid their Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, and Catholic readers will stop the paper. They are afraid the church members who own department stores, and probably pay starvation wages to their salesgirls, may stop their advertisements. And the most vulnerable spot of the modern publisher is his pocketbook. So it would be impossible, even with a cold-chisel, to get any criticism of the church into the columns of an American newspaper; any article, historical or scientific, that would raise doubts about the creeds; any contribution or communication that would stir up the wrath of the faithful and cause them to withhold their coin.

The Freethinkers are not strong numerically; they are not organized as the believers are; they are far more tolerant and accustomed to abuse. Therefore the newspapers do not hesitate to print things that might offend the Rationalist. He rarely hits back, treating such matters with an indulgent smile, but the other week some Rationalists in Pittsburgh decided to see how far the spirit of fair play could be aroused in one of their local dailies. The Pittsburgh Dispatch had been running, for a week or more, at the head of its editorial column, a daily prayer called "God's Minute." It was evidently syndicate material furnished by various preachers, for not even the average editor in a state of intoxication could have been capable of producing such silly flub-dub. The following letter was written and sent to the editor of the Dispatch:

"HONORED SIR: The undersigned, a few out of many, would respectfully suggest that the space in your editorial columns, devoted to that ridiculous piffle, 'God's Minute,' could be used to much better advantage by putting in a daily quotation from a thinker like Emerson. We are living in the twentieth century, and a great newspaper, with an educational mission, should not play up exploded superstitions. Don't you have to laugh yourself when you write or put in stuff like that? It is disgusting to sane people, though it may gratify a few benighted survivors of the sixteenth century."

Six or eight people who were readers of the paper signed this communication, and it was sent in to the editor. Of course it did not appear in print, although several letters commending "God's Minute" had been printed before that time. The only beneficial effect the communication has had, perhaps, was that during the following week "God's Minute" was placed at the bottom of another column—presumably God can find it there just as easily.

The whole incident is an illustration of the hypocrisy and cowardice which dominates our secular press. The editors are afraid of the religious reader; they tremble in their boots at the thought of a boycott by the faithful of any faith. That is no reason, however, why Freethinkers should not express their opinions in letters to such editors. If the editors get enough letters, they will begin to realize that not all of their readers are fools, and some day the editor will muster up sufficient courage to print such a communication, even though good Parson Fudge might be laid up by the shock of reading it. JULIAN.

The Worst Enemy.

Americans have had the privilege of reading a remarkably able and rational war message from the man chosen by themselves as a free people to be the head of their government.

There is, however, at the present moment permeating this otherwise free government a lurking enemy far more dangerous than war—to which indeed the war itself owes its fatherhood, and whose origin lurks back in the days so aptly described by the President as "the old unhappy days when peoples were nowhere consulted by their rulers, and wars were provoked and waged in the interests of dynasties or little groups of ambitious men who were accustomed to use their fellowmen as pawns and tools, . . . whose cunningly contrived plans of deception . . . can be worked out only in the privacy of courts or behind the carefully guarded confidences of a narrow and privileged class."

To further apply to our subject the words of the President, "We are now about to accept gage of battle with this natural foe to liberty, . . . to nullify its pretensions and its power. We are glad, now that we see the facts with no veil of pretense about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and the liberation of its peoples. . . . We have no selfish ends to serve. . . . We seek no compensation. . . . We are but one of the champions of the rights of mankind. We shall be satisfied only when these rights have become as secure as the faith and freedom of the nations can make them."

And this insidious foe, more dangerous and havoc-making than war itself, is that wily and "cunningly contrived plan of deception" and superstition, concocted and initiated in the dark ages of ignorance by "groups of ambitious men of a narrow and privileged class" who were "accustomed to use their fellowmen as pawns and tools," called THE CHRISTIAN PHILOSOPHY.

The book which derived its origin from this plan of deception and superstition—the intent of whose compilers was to give a human syndicate, under pretense of authority from a Divine Being, the right to exercise a universal power and domination over the minds, thoughts and actions of men, as by divine authority appointed—the book, the contents of which at its best are chiefly anonymous, collected from unknown and unauthenticated sources, clearly proven to have been based on still more ancient myths and legends falsely applied as original to the tenets of this new superstition afterwards destined to be called Christianity, the trend of whose teachings and morals is therefore misleading and pernicious—is commonly known as "God's word," "The Sacred Scriptures," "The Bible."

This is the foe that Reason has to vanquish, whose teachings and "cunningly contrived plans of deception" must be discredited and exposed by the light of science, scholarship, and reason.

When people awaken to the truth of these facts, and free their minds from these absurd and vicious teachings of another life, governments will find means to obviate the wars prevailing under our present system of "Christian civilization," and by removing the causes of all that now stands in the way of the enjoyment of life. And when the millions of money and brains now devoted to religion and evangelism are diverted from this fetich to the study of useful knowledge and the economics of life and health, there will be something doing in this old world of ours, I promise you. NOTES AT LARGE.

One of the strangest and saddest features of the present world war is the disposition on the part of the warring nations to claim each for itself the favor and approval of "Almighty God." It is pitiful to see these great powers lending themselves to a degenerate bitterness from the inspiration of the belief that each is engaged in the Lord's work. King, kaiser, czar—each has sent forth his men to battle, with devout invocation to the "Most High" to guide them.

The lamentable thing about this logic of partiality, this theory of a partial God and a "chosen people," is that it lowers the moral standard of the nation that holds it, debauches its citizens, disintegrates the saving ideals proposed by a scientific civilization, and dissipates its dreams of brotherhood and an ennobling humanism. But the springs of their inspiration are unreal, artificial, mutable; and because they have failed to realize their common humanity they are now devastating Europe. They have mistaken friend for foe, brother for enemy.

What is to be done with these inspired "patriots," these mistaken men, in whom love of country has thwarted, if not strangled, their love of humanity? It was Doctor Johnson who said that "patriotism is the last resort of knaves," and if there are those who find fault with this definition, it may be that they will find themselves in accord with George Eliot, who said that "patriotism is the virtue of narrow minds."

It has been said that he who knows only one language knows none. By parity of reasoning, he who loves but one country loves none. The cruel slaughter of brethren now going on in Europe, and the appeal of individual nations for the protection of God, prove beyond controversy that it is the belief of the nations that God is still a tribal divinity, that he does not love the whole world, as Christian theology affirms, but that he loves only the Germans, or the French, or perhaps the English; who shall say which?

It may be, however, that the God appealed to in each separate instance is a different divinity, after the style of ancient polytheism. This would seem to be by far the most rational view of the situation; and if the gods differ in their "supernatural" ability, it is to be hoped that the nation maintaining the just cause has as its "Heavenly Protector" the most powerful god in the spiritual hierarchy.

These warring nations have made it plain that the first stage in the abolition of God has arrived—they have made him to appear ridiculous; the next step will be to get rid of him forever.

The world has had a long and sorrowful trial of how thoroughly inhuman men can be in their dealings with their fellow-men, under the inspiration and guidance of a divine and loving father called God; is it not time, then, by virtue of the present war, to give the world a trial without the notion of God, and learn if men thereby will grow to love one another better than under our worthless religious system? The chances are that without religion and God men will be more kindly disposed towards one another than they are today, for religion has been the greatest source of discord and hate known to mankind. Of one thing every thoughtful person feels assured, that if all ideas of God and religion were swept away from our earth without a single trace remaining, human conditions could not be worse than they are today.

Give the world a trial without God!

This inquiry is from a letter by Mr. Edgar Fuller of Peoria, Illinois:

"Here in Peoria the Adventists are holding lectures every Sunday evening, and recently they had one on 'Armageddon,' which I had thought was a battle between T. R. and His Satanic Majesty. Now this lecturer says it is between the Allies and their opponents, and that the great deciding battle will be at Armageddon somewhere near the Sea of Galilee. By the way, what is Armageddon?"

Armageddon is a place, real or imagined, referred to in the book of Revelation, xvi, 16. It is identical with Megiddo, a city mentioned in various parts of the Bible, the scene of a battle described in 2 Kings xxiii. It was here that King Josiah slew Pharaoh-nechoh, king of Egypt. The passage in Revelation reads:

"And he gathered them together into a place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon."

To whom the "he" refers has to be guessed. The mention of the Megiddo fight has originated the theory that Revelation is an old Jewish apocalypse. Anyhow, the battle of Armageddon was ancient history when the New Testament was compiled. To imagine it a coming event is like locating the battle of Bunker Hill sometime in the future. Upon the deluded persons who are always talking of an Armageddon to come we have pressed this point many times without result. They cannot be made to see it, nor will they argue and defend their own view. In vain we refer them to the scriptures and to the commentators of the Encyclopedia Biblica. With them Armageddon is an obsession. It is like the second coming of Christ, in which they believe because Jesus himself proposed it. Their belief in Jesus on this particular matter stops at the prediction. When he mentions the time of his coming as that of the generation then on earth, they do not listen or believe. It is worth noticing that about all the things most earnestly professed by Christians have this element of humbug in them, and will not stand the test of examination. Colonel Roosevelt, whom our correspondent calls "T. R.," got the Armageddon bug when he organized his Bull Moose party to fight His Satanic Majesty in the guise of the Republican party. He said then that he and his Progressives were marching down to Armageddon to fight the battle of the Lord, and singing "Onward, Christian Soldiers," they did so, figuratively speaking, and were licked in a political sense. One may confidently point to the Old Testament to show that the battle of Armageddon mentioned in the book of Revelation is an old story, and that Adventist and other prophets of the same are crowing over yesterday's sunrise.

There are some societies and individuals in our country who are determined that the popularity of a certain literature known as the Bible shall not suffer any diminution while the war is in progress. For instance, the American Bible Society has issued an emergency call for $50,000 with which to provide large editions of New Testaments bound in khaki to be given to all soldiers and sailors through the Sunday School Association and the Young Men's Christian Association. It can hardly be supposed that the majority of the young men forming these departments of our national defense are wholly ignorant of the nature of the Christian scriptures; but to circulate a large number of these books gives a certain éclat to Christian energy and enthusiasm, and to the diligence of the Bible Society in disseminating its peculiar publication, and these are things worth bargaining for. But what are our soldiers and sailors supposed to do with these volumes, the product of a Greek civilization of 1,500 years ago? The New Testament is not an up-to-date book, and both its ethical and spiritual ideas are impossible. It cannot be understood without an interpreter—some key that will reveal its true meaning. We have never heard of any such key except the one put out by Mrs. Eddy of Christian Science fame. What is the value, then, of an antiquated scheme of life which no one understands, and which no one has been able to put successfully into practice? The book most generally found in the knapsacks of the German soldiers was "Thus Spake Zarathustra," by Nietzsche. While this latter would not be our first choice as a book for constant reading, we are disposed to believe that it would prove of greater interest as a source of mental diversion to a battle-tired soldier than the empty platitudes of a mystical volume whose truth no one thus far has been able to authenticate. But Bibles have been found useful in war as an occasional check to the progress of bullets. If the book was intended for this purpose, it would seem to be a mistake for the society to give the New Testament only; why not give the whole of God's revelation as a thicker and therefore stronger breast-work against the attacks of the enemy? This doing things by halves is quite un-American; besides, as a source of mental recreation the Old Testament is far superior to the New; it takes precedence of all books that find their classification along with Balzac's "Contes Droles," Boccaccio's "Decameron," Carroll's "Alice in Wonderland," and similar works well-known to the reading public. The best thing to have done, however, would be to have given the $50,000 for some purpose that would have brought material benefit to the soldiers and sailors, whether well, temporarily sick, or dying. The Bible is the last thing that is needed in the case of the faithful militant. It serves no great purpose while a man lives, and in time of death it is an intrusion. There is no place for it in the philosophy of life today.

One of the clerical debaters at the last meeting of the Sunrise Club, where the usefulness of modern evangelism was under fire, with Henry Rowley representing the Freethinkers, inadvertently let out the fact that the revival committee, of which he is a member, had made arrangements for carrying the campaign into the public schools. This at once engaged the interest of Secretary Walker, an ardent opponent of church-and-school union, who at the close of the meeting invited the clergyman to defend, at a future dinner, the action of his committee in bringing Sundayism into the public schools. He also engaged Mr. Rowley to take the Secular side in the debate. The clergyman declined, alleging unfamiliarity with the subject, but other defenders of his cause will be found, and Mr. Rowley will meet them at the dinner for May 21. Canon William Sheafe Chase of Brooklyn will probably be there to champion the teaching of religion—any old religion—to the children in school or out, regardless of union of church and state. The discussion should be a notable one. Mr. Rowley, in discussing revivalism and the revivalist, at the dinner on April 15, proved himself, as is his habit, a most acceptable, entertaining and effective speaker.

Colonel Ingersoll in life was extremely appreciative of the kindness of those who took up his defense against his clerical detractors. Among these was Mr. John Rowe of Amsterdam, N. Y., who, having performed that service, received the following letter:

"NEW YORK, Aug. 21, 1885.

"MY DEAR MR. ROWE: It is hardly worth while for me to answer the calumnies of the pulpit when I have you for a defender.

"Of course the charges of the excited Christian are either entirely false or so exaggerated as to become lies. Long ago I stopped explaining. Let them talk all they wish. One thing I know, and that is, they cannot, even with the help of their God, answer my arguments.

"I am a thousand times obliged to you for your splendid defense. Yours always, R. G. INGERSOLL."

The letter is now a prized possession of Mr. Charles Rowe of Tribes Hill, N. Y., son of the man to whom it was addressed nearly thirty-two years ago.

At the seventh Congress of the National Federation of Religious Liberals, held during March in Pittsburgh, Pa., the following resolutions were adopted:

"1. We believe that society exists for man and not for the thing he makes.

"We believe, therefore, that in all industries the interests of the worker should precede the interests of the work.

"The things which can be produced only at the expense of human deterioration should not be produced at all.

"2. We believe that the natural resources of the world belong essentially to mankind and their title cannot be alienated.

"We believe, therefore, that society as organized in governments should see that the actual wealth of the world is held and used for the benefit of mankind and not for any restricted group.

"We deplore the growth of a caste system based on wealth, often growing out of undue appropriation of natural resources.

"3. Since our interest is in mankind it cannot be restricted to race or nation. We do not desire the advantage of any one people at the expense of any other. Reasonable conference, not conflict, must govern the mutual relation of nations. War can only confuse their mutual understandings and delay the accomplishment of their purposes. We strongly endorse the patient efforts of the President of the United States to preserve this nation at peace with the rest of the world and his prophetic utterances for an international understanding to prevent future wars.

"4. We desire to express once more our central conviction that true and enduring religious fellowship cannot be brought about by uniformity either of belief or worship. Oneness of moral sympathy, united testimony for justice and righteousness, and co-operation for human and social service are possible beyond the lines of sect or creed. Not by the amalgamation of existing forms and doctrines, or the general acceptance of an 'irreducible minimum' of belief and practice; only by the voluntary federation of the religious forces of the community with mutual respect and sympathy, for united testimony and service amidst large varieties of thought and church connection, can real and effective religious fellowship be established; for while 'intellectual sympathies are limited, moral sympathies are universal.'"

If the Christian church had framed and adopted and promulgated a set of resolutions like these when it had the power to put them in effect, say five hundred years ago, they would not be needed today. But the leaders of the Christian church then did not know enough; it had not the vision, and the orthodox churches have not the courage nor the will to put them forth today. Orthodoxy holds to things as they are and have been, even to the biological and spiritual beatitude of war. The church in order to exist must practice upon the emotions, prejudices and superstitions of mankind, and these are used to foster and protect social, governmental, and industrial evils.

There is no word that has been so differently interpreted by the dialecticians as the word "faith." It is said that there is one system that gives seventeen different definitions of the word, and even these do not include what they call "saving faith." —T. F. Seward.

Notes on an Evangelist.

The New York American, which "features" the revival show, includes the following in its report of one of the sermons:

"By the eternal God!" he screamed, standing on the top of his sturdy pulpit, collarless, rigid, sweat-soaked and half-hysterical. "I'm dogmatic. That is a chair. This is the pulpit. God is God. The Bible is the Bible—from cover to cover the word of God. I believe in Hell—not Gehenna nor Hades, but HELL. H-E-L-L—HELL! Yea, Hell fire and brimstone. Hell! Hell! HELL!"

"Still standing on his pulpit, his gaunt figure transformed, he called for the hymn 'Stand Up, Stand Up for Jesus.' The throng began to sing.

"How many of you," he roared, "will now pledge with me and say 'God, I'll stand up for Jesus Christ, for you, God, for our flag and our country?' Come on, how many?"

"The daughter of a society woman is a penciled-eye-brow, painted-frizzy-haired nothing, who chews gum, plays ragtime, flirts, and if you kiss her you are in danger of dying with painter's colic. Her ragtime is, 'Oh, Does the Spearmint Lose Its Flavor on the Bedpost Over Night?'"

"It is as hard to pass off a girl that has been pawed over by a different fellow six nights a week with the light turned low as it is to fatten sheep on pineapple ice."

"I don't believe you can remember when you heard a sermon on hell. Well, you'll hear about hell while I am here.

"God Almighty put hell in the Bible and any preacher that sidesteps it because there are people sitting in the pews that don't like it ought to get out of the pulpit."

When the average New York clergyman even though a member of the committee that invited him here, is asked if he approves of the vulgarities and profanities of this hell-roaring evangelist, he replies that he can indorse neither Mr. Sunday's methods nor his theology. That being the case, the question arises, why in the name of common sense they got him to this city to illustrate the one and to expound the other! There is nothing unique about him but his barroom style and his effete and barbaric religion. Since they have no interest in what he says nor how he says, how do the clergy expect to profit by the orgy of coarseness, vituperation and emotionalism? Does it bring money to them and grist to their mills? Is their interest solely financial and material?

The opening of a revival in New York was justified by the governor of the state on the ground of his own knowledge of what such a campaign does for the community where it is held in the way of abolishing evil. The governor gave no facts and figures. He could not have referred to Boston, where, in the election which followed the revival, the forces of rum carried the city by a larger majority than ever before, and the dry vote fell off. Neither could he have referred to Baltimore, where this leading Christian minister of the United States held protracted evangelistic services in 1916. In a Baltimore paper of recent date we find Chief Judge Morris L. Soper of the Law Courts reported as saying:

"It is a matter of regret to be obliged to report the fact that the condition of the court dockets in the Common Law Courts and the Criminal Court at the beginning of 1917 contrasts unfavorably with the same period of the preceding year. The sum total of all cases in the Common Law Courts and the Criminal Court waiting to be tried at the beginning of the January term, 1916, was 2,861, and the total number of such cases at the beginning of the January term, 1917, was 3,765, or an excess of untried cases numbering 994."

Had the number of cases diminished in 1916 and been fewer at the end than at the beginning of the year, something to the credit of the revival might have been said, although its causal relation to the fact would be difficult to trace. A patient may get better under the care of a doctor without proving that medicine did him any good, because patients recover in most cases any how. If, however, the patient is worse at the end of the treatment than at the beginning, it is reasonable to doubt the efficacy of the medicine. The gospel drug administered to Baltimore by the quack preacher left the sufferer worse than it found him.

We were visited last week by the representative of a commercial agency who wished the information, to be guarded with the greatest secrecy, about what "liquor interests" are behind THE TRUTH SEEKER'S opposition to the evangelistic campaign in New York. It was the business of the agency, the gentleman said, to find the source of such activities, and it was commonly reported that all antagonism to the revival was inspired by the demon Rum and his cohorts. Only a business view is taken of the evangelist by the business agencies, which class Sunday as a showman for the money he can make out of the calling; and so when they see something doing on the other side, they ask who is financing the move and looking for the profits. We were of course able to assure the visitor that nobody connected with the liquor interests, so far as we knew, had ever contributed anything to the anti-Sunday campaign. When the evangelist showed in Kansas City a similar inquiry was received from one of his committee, who assured us that if we were not getting money from the liquor interests we were neglecting a prolific source of revenue. Our only reply is that at our own risk we serve Freethought, and oppose the knock-about evangelist as its enemy. Sunday does not hurt the saloons, which fight only for their own hand and are reconciled even to the Sabbath blue laws so long as they can purchase the liberty to violate them.

The evangelist, paying his disrespects to the Freethought street speakers, said that if they did not like the country as they found it they ought to go somewhere else. How do they, calling the people to the acceptance of truth and to the defense of the religious liberty guaranteed by our secular Constitution, differ, except in the merit of their appeal, from himself calling people to leave their sins and accept Jesus? If he is dissatisfied with conditions as he finds them in New York, why does he stay to howl out his curses and condemnation, instead of going whence he came? It is as fair for one as another; and we can assure anyone interested to know, that between Billy Sunday and the Freethought soapboxers on Madison square, when it comes to loyalty to the fundamental principles of our government, they and not he are the good Americans.

In the late '70s, when Ingersoll lectured in San Francisco a minister named Kallock accused him of being an immoral man. In reply Ingersoll said: "The Rev. Dr. Kallock has attacked my moral character. To show how charitable I can be I will say nothing about his." Kallock had recently been prosecuted for adultery in Massachusetts. We observe that in his sermons the Rev. William Ashley Sunday impeaches the reputation of Infidels. With a charity like that for which a distinguished example has been set, we shall say nothing about his.

Bill.

(With apologies to W. J. Lampton).

Bill is the gospel preacher! Bill is the man with a spell! Bill is another-worlder who knows the smell of hell! Bill is a pious actor of hypocritical mould! Bill is a fancy sample of those who form the fold! Bill is hard on the churches and says they are half-dead! Bill is mean to the pastors because they're over-fed. Bill in his graphic language, because they move in ruts, calls the gentle shepherds a bunch of lazy mutts. Bill makes lots of money as everyone knows well! Bill has captured sheekels enough to purchase hell! Bill is a finished teacher of downright low-born talk! Bill is the champion Christian whom devils cannot balk! Bill converts the sinners in numbers quite galore, though most of them have been converted many times before! Bill can tell the names of those who once on earth did dwell, but now through having loved the truth have found a place in hell! Bill is rich in methods when preaching gospel slang! Bill was once a "fielder" and hobnobbed with the gang! Bill has made religion a laughing-stock and sham! Bill has brought intelligence to level of the clam! Bill, it seems, knows very well the in's and out's of sin, but few of us would wish to be where gospel Bill has been. Bill is sweating very hard to cure some men of sin; but many think he would do well to with himself begin.

The Ubiquitous Cop.

I attended a meeting in Carnegie Hall addressed by Emma Goldman and Rose Pastor Stokes. There were policemen in every aisle and in the corridors and out on the pavement and even round the corner. How would two such crude women know when to stop and when to start talking on such a subject if that bunch of refined and well-balanced cops hadn't been there to watch over their unruly tongues? Do you remember how in Schenectady some fool agitator in a public square started to read the Declaration of Independence? And do you remember how a cop tapped him on the shoulder and said impressively: "Enough of that!" and put him under arrest? And do you remember how another daring ass on that same occasion attempted to read the Sermon on the Mount? And how another cop showed his star and exclaimed: "Enough of that!" and put him under arrest also? Do you remember that? Well: that cop's everywhere. And when Margaret Sanger begins to talk that cop breaks in again with his club and tongue. "Enough of that! enough of that!" To read the Declaration of Independence in public is treason. To read the Sermon on the Mount in public is blasphemy. To talk of sex in public is immorality.—Horace Traubel in the Conservator.

5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privileges or advantages shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

SPIRITUALIST PHENOMENA.

From J. R. Perry, Pennsylvania.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

In the issue of January 27 I find myself criticized for using an account published by Professor Crookes of the Psychical Society, in reference to the experiments in levitation, had, before the members of that society, composed mostly of men proficient in science, and of unblemished characters as to honesty. I stated that this medium Home and others had been seen to be lifted from the floor or chair, and carried to the ceilings of the rooms of the society under test conditions, and that at one time was carried out of the window of one room over a pavement, so high from the same, that a fall would have killed him; and was passed into an adjoining room where a sub-committee was in waiting to witness the manifestation.

This statement is recorded in a book published by Prof. Crookes, and verified by numerous persons of distinction and scientific culture, who witnessed that and many other wonderful things, such as table lifting, accordion playing while floating about the room, the movement of chairs, materializations, etc., Prof. Crookes having prepared wires charged with electrical force enough to knock a person down had any one accidentally come into contact with them.

This critic has the assurance to state, that as an explanation of such manifestation, the parties had no doubt a "block and tackle suspended from the roof to support the person while suspended over the pavement." That Aurora Thunder from Ohio critic, must be well informed indeed, to assume that men like Sir Oliver Lodge, Prof. Crookes, Prof. Myers, Prof. Wallace and the like, would be guilty of such a piece of imposture, and comparing those manifestations with such as are recorded in Bible history, such as Joshua stopping the sun and moon, and turning the sun back a number of degrees on the dial, and the like, shows a great lack of judgment and the credulity of unbelief.

If it required a block and tackle to work unseen wires, it must have been done by the members of the Psychical Society, or if not, who could have worked the block and tackle in the rooms around which he was floated, and in one case, while being held by the ankles by a person who tried to pull him to the floor? And what sort of a block and tackle arrangement would it require to float accordions, guitars, and other musical instruments around the room, in good light, and play tunes of all kinds upon them? Such an explanation is simply absurd, but it is about as good as might be expected from one who has probably never seen what has, and is being done, by unseen forces.

This critic wants to know if I am aware that I was "born nude"? I have every reason to so believe, and I was cared for and clothed with physical garments, and it is altogether probable that a spiritual body, not visible to our eyes, might be clothed with garments made of materials as fine as its body, if it required them.

During my experiences, I once obtained a piece of gauze cloth, made by a materialized spirit, who seemed to draw it from the ends of her fingers out of the atmosphere of the room, so fine in fabrication, that it required a microscope to see the threads of its composition. It lasted for about a month or more, before it seemed to evaporate and disappear from the paper in which it was folded when put into a private drawer.

I have never known or heard of any fabric, made by any weaving establishment on earth, that would act in this way, and there have been hundreds of others who can testify to similar facts, within the last fifty years, here in America.

I have seen similar performances, held the instruments in my own hands in broad daylight. I have not lost confidence in my senses, and believe I am much more competent to judge of their significance than a person whose mind is filled with prejudice, and most likely has never seen anything of the kind. Denials and explanations from such persons amount to nothing. If they cannot see that their arguments are futile, there is no help for them.

Is it likely that Prof. Crookes and men of his scientific attainments would lend their names to such statements and run the risk of sacrificing their reputations, and face the jeers of an ignorant public just to fool themselves into a belief in a future state of existence? Or was it to attest to the greatest truth of the nineteenth century, or to attract still further investigation?

Another short notice under the head of "Notes at Large" seems to require some other explanation. The piece referred to reads:

"One might suppose that genuine belief in a future life better than this would reconcile people to death. Yet devoutest believers in immortality, whose life in this world is the best guarantee of happiness in the next, and who lustily sing, Filled with delight, my raptured soul would here no longer stay, and other hymns expressive of their desire to leave at once this carnal world, still cling with a marvelous tenacity to life," etc.

If man were absolutely free to do as he pleased, and had full control of himself, and had no ties to hold him to this life, such an inference might apply, but constituted as we are, with small voluntary powers, and nerves that control us with involuntary forces, so strong, that we are held to physical life and its organization with an instinct of self preservation, which is the first law of nature, gives the best possible excuse for staying here, no matter how sure we may feel of a better world to come. Again, no man approaching death through sickness dies all at once, unless by some accident. The vicarious functions of his organization cause him to live and suffer bodily pain, while one organ is helping him that performs the function of another. And what person approaching death has no unsettled accounts to balance up, or no domestic ties to consider? His loves have all been acquired here; his wife and children, friends and associations, all hold him to this life; while he may have a desire to go to those who have gone before, it would be a selfish person that could leave all the joys of this life to rush into another, while the family ties of the rest held him from death, and a cold abode in mother earth. Then the dread of passing through an experience so unusual, and the fact of a loss of consciousness during the passage from one state of existence to that of another is sufficient explanation to deter death, apart from any evidence, no matter how strong it may be, of the reality of a future life. The person, however, who was unfortunate enough to make a complete failure of this life, and had no reason to believe in another, who had lost friends, position and all family ties of the loved ones of former years, would have nothing to hold him to this abode, disgusted with his poverty, and a social tramp, or life sick debauchee. Such a person is the one that is most likely to seek death by the only means a distorted and partially insane mind can use; namely, suicide.

The person fully knowing the fact of a future life would be the last person to force himself into the presence of those who would no doubt consider him an unwelcome guest, and a natural coward, except perhaps under the most excusable circumstances, where a lingering and painful life with no hope of recovery existed. How often have persons wished to die and could not? Spiritualism has deterred many from committing the desperate plunge of the suicide. I listened at one time to a lady who had been in affluent circumstances, and by the loss of husband and friends, came down to the occupation of a scrub-woman. She was so depressed by the change of her circumstances that at last she was about decided to take the awful leap into oblivion, and commit the act of all others, the most wicked, by taking her own life. About this time another woman of the same occupation dropped into her miserable abode and invited her to go to a spiritualist meeting, telling her that a celebrated test medium was to give readings from the platform. They went to the lecture, and when the time came, the medium stepped upon the stage, an utter and complete stranger to the one above alluded to. To this lady's utter astonishment, the test medium called out, "Will Mrs. ——— come to the platform?" I have just been requested by your (her) husband, Mr. ———, to tell you that he wishes to talk to you alone on important business. He says "you must not do the thing you have been thinking of doing." She, the lady said, staggered to the platform, from sheer weakness and astonishment at the mention of her husband's name and of her own, from a perfect stranger. This medium, in an undertone, told her all she had designed doing, and how anxiously her husband had awaited this opportunity to convince her of the fact of immortality; and to look in a certain place for an important document which would place her in better circumstances.

She said that the paper was an insurance on her life, that was payable at his death, and that she was then for the first time informed of its existence, he having died so suddenly, and away from home, he could not inform her of it at the time. While relating this to the meeting she had to stop at intervals to sob and wipe away the tears that involuntarily rolled down her furrowed cheeks, and it also brought tears to the faces of many others in that audience.

It is, therefore, not the believer in immortality who desires to shirk the responsibilities of this life, and rush into another state, but the one who expects to escape into utter forgetfulness and oblivion that assumes the responsibility.

Lastly, the difference between a real physical world of external objective realities to hold people to its contact and experiences, and a mental phenomenal thought world, is so great, that we do not usually desire change into the latter state.

For instance, I may put my hands into a natural fire, it will burn my hand and produce pain to my organization and mind that feels it; but if I merely think mentally of putting my hand into a fire, the thought of it will not burn the hand or give me physical pain, and this is the difference between the phenomenal idea of existence and the real contact with the physical world. If, therefore, a spirit had no physical body, no matter how fine its materials may be composed of, it could have nothing upon which to sense life and feeling. Thoughts do not fly about in space; chunks of intelligence or matter forms composed of houses, lands, habitations and domestic comforts cannot exist in a purely mental thought world. Intelligence is based on organization of sense, or a sensitive substance, whose vibrations and life cause a mental process of thinking and reasoning which must exist only on the experiences and contact with a material substantial existence both here and hereafter; for this I have always contended.

SPIRITUALISM EXPOSED.

From Karl E. Pauli, Ohio.

To the Editor of the Truth Seeker:

Mr. James Carl, vice president of the Toledo Rationalist Society, has given both Toledo and Detroit a splendid entertainment, which he terms "Spiritualism Exposed."

It's something unique and new in the Rationalist field, being both a lecture and entertainment in one.

He opens with an educational lecture on spiritualism, explaining its relation to other religions, and its workings. He compares the preacher and priest of the orthodox with the "medium" of spiritualism, showing a comparison of the dishonesties practised by both.

With fifteen years of experience among spiritualists of both Europe and America, he surely has a wealth of knowledge to draw from.

After the lecture he gives a practical demonstration of telepathy, clairvoyance, "spirit" and automatic writing, "spirit" painting, table raising and some very clever cabinet work. All of which are reproductions of spiritualist seances. After each demonstration he explains its workings with some of the variations, so that others may become proficient in detecting the dishonesties and fraud of even some of the most clever spiritualist mediums.

In Toledo he had an audience of about five hundred people, all of whom seemed well entertained and in high spirits. In Detroit the hall in which he exhibited was on the third floor of the same building in which the spiritualists met on the second floor, so the Detroit society really advertised the spiritualists' meeting, which was mistaken by many to be where the exposé was to be.

But the Detroit audience was well pleased, having had an exciting and realistic exposé and lecture combined.

DID CONSTANTINE DO IT? From Dwight Spencer, Oklahoma.

To the Editor of the Truth Seeker:

R. A. Dague of Colorado is very much mistaken when he thinks that his "unknown Oklahoma critic" meant to cast aspersions upon his "published writings" when it was said: "R. A. Dague is like many others who feel they need Jesus to popularize some theory or movement." I was not aware of the fact that the aforesaid "published writings" were "some theory or movement." But if such is the case I recant and apologize and beg our venerable friend to desist in his "bit of hilarity." (See TRUTH SEEKER of March 17 and April 7).

Mr. Dague, with all his quotations from "authorities," does not prove his claim that at the council of Nicea, 325 A. D., Constantine compelled the 318 delegates to come together and unite on one book as the word of God. And further, that Constantine destroyed the communistic practices of the early Christians. Even Charles E. Sheldon, one of the authorities Mr. Dague quotes, said in the article quoted from that "the council of Laodicea was the beginning of the end of the Christian communes." Twenty-five years after the first Christian emperor had died, the communes flourished.

Now for authorities. Mr. Dague cites Henry M. Tichenor, Socialist propagandist and writer. To clear Constantine of the crime of foisting upon an innocent people the fables, follies and fakes of a new creed, we put up Dean Dudley, author of the History of the First Council of Nice, to offset Tichenor. Mr. Dague brings forward a divine, the Rev. Geo. Coleman, and I Westcott, author of The New Testament Canon. Ernst Haeckel, professor of zoology in the University of Jena (a dangerous authority for a spiritualist to tamper with), is the star witness of Mr. Dague. John E. Remsburg, author of "The Bible," "Christ," and "Six Historic Americans," all TRUTH SEEKER publications, and considered first-class authority, was the witness I put against Haeckel to prove that Constantine did not make the Bible at Nice.

Mosheim, the great German historian, says Constantine was a man of no religion before he embraced Christianity. History shows him to be a very able and astute politician. It would have taken a theologian of much "divine" learning and experience to control this council and formulate the creed we have today, and cause it to be universally accepted by the then Christian churches, if it had been entirely new. Really Constantine's position was not very much unlike that of our own Abraham Lincoln when the Southern States seceded. Constantine's empire threatened to be divided by the quarrels of certain Christian factions over the divine nature of Christ. Constantine called a convention to settle the differences in a logical manner by force of argument. Lincoln saw the north and south again made one in a convention of blood and iron where shot and shell wrought the decision. Neither Constantine nor Lincoln had much to do with the outcome of the decisions. Constantine didn't care for doctrine. What he wanted was what every other politician wants, unity.

In my "Paganized Christianity" (TRUTH SEEKER, March 17), I asked Mr. Dague to "cite one fundamental of Bible Christianity which is of Pagan origin." Why didn't Mr. Dague do this instead of wasting so much good space quoting from a propagandist, a preacher, and a materialistic professor? Why consult "authorities" when historic Christianity exists before our eyes? If "the Christian movement has remained pagan in all its teachings until this day," it ought to be easy to show us one specific fundamental that is pagan. Is the doctrine of the "fall of man" and the "vicarious atonement" of pagan origin? Did the philosophers and thinkers of Greece and Rome tell the people to "resist not evil," "love your enemies," "hate your parents, brothers, sisters and your own life," "live in poverty," "practice meekness and humbleness" and in general to "live like a dog and when you die, you'll have mansions beyond the sky?" Although these teachings are not generally practiced we cannot deny they are fundamental with the creed. Are they, any of them, pagan ideas?

"A tree is known by its fruits." Almost every science that smooths out the rough places along the pathway of life was nursed in a pagan cradle by the thinkers of ancient Greece and Rome. Myers says in his General History, which is used in the public schools of Oklahoma, that "using the word in a somewhat broader sense, we may define Renaissance as the reentrance into the world of that secular, inquiring, self-reliant spirit, (something Christianity had crushed out), which characterized the life and culture of classical antiquity. This is simply to say that under the influence of intellectual revival the men of western Europe came to think and feel, to look upon life and the outer world as did the men of ancient Greece and Rome." (A revival of paganism). In the main we must say the fruits of paganism have been sweet and good. Can we say as much for Christianity? Even Mr. Dague must admit we cannot. Christianity has had its night; now let Rationalism have its day. Humanity has been tortured, burned and slaughtered for the sake of Christianity and its God. Now, let's have an epoch of Man that knows not the fear of a Christian hell nor the vengeance of a Jewish God.

The religion of Christianity may need Jefferson, Washington and Lincoln to make it respectable to a modern age; but no movement for the betterment of humanity, advancement of justice and discovery of truth can afford to adopt Jesus and his anti-natural, anti-social, pessimistic creed.

CHICAGO LECTURE NOTES. From D. F. Sweetland, Chicago.

To the Editor of the Truth Seeker:

Last Sunday, Jehovah and Jesus were sidetracked at Rationalist meetings, and war subjects discussed, Ward lecturing on the Russian revolution and Darrow on internationalism. Ward gave as reasons for the overthrow of the autocracy in Russia, the incompetency of the czar's government, the intrigue of his German wife, and the destruction of the original standing. The army that existed before hostilities began had largely been replaced by new men, who had not been inoculated with czarism like the old ones; and the new army listened to the voice of the people, and Nick had to go. Ward praised the new men in power for their great ability and education, one of whom had been a professor in the University of Chicago for four years. Nature seemed to be helping the revolutionists, as the break came just about when the roads got bad. This hindered the Germans and gave the new government time to prepare for smooth running.

Darrow on Internationalism was a criticism of the two Bills, Taft and Bryan. He seemed to overlook Bill Haywood, who declares for one big industrial union to run the world; but the other Bills envision a kingdom or republic of God, a universal world state to keep peace between the countries. This idea Darrow thought vicious. To begin with, he discussed war in general and claimed what gave it its horror was its novelty and spectacularness. It wasn't as bad as peace; hundreds of times as many people were destroyed by diseases, tuberculosis, cancer, venereal complaints, poor machinery, etc., as by munitions. He had as leave be hit by a bullet as by a cancer. Wars were paid for by the rich. It made more work for the laboring man. If war was not the direct cause of great reforms, at least they came together. In peace the blood flowed sluggishly; people got lazy. War stirred things up and accomplished great results. The saying that "without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sins," has some truth in it. There has been but little progress without blood shedding.

Somebody had been sending him some Christian Science literature which claimed that love was everything. He affirmed that hate and fear were also good. If we didn't hate our enemy we wouldn't put up the necessary fight to protect our rights. If we had no fear we wouldn't beat it when an overwhelming foe approached us. The two Bills wanted an international court to decide national disputes. They would as soon take their chances with soldiers as with judges. One big nation meant a static state of affairs, whereas nature is continually changing. Bohemia would always be subject to Austria, Ireland to England and the Philippines to the United States of America. If our people wanted to revolutionize our government the international army would be in the way to crush it out.

The internationalists claim they don't propose to interfere with internal arrangements, but Darrow didn't want to trust them. Once they got a little power they would grasp more, just as our general government has constantly encroached upon the rights of the states. He feared for the liberty of the people by increasing governments; there were too many now.

Darrow is a very pleasing and understandable lecturer. He would come nearer filling Mr. Mangasarian's shoes than any one that has appeared. By the way, it is claimed by those on the inside that Mr. Mangasarian will be back with us next October, which is certainly good news.

MR. THOMAS AND SPIRIT EXISTENCE.

From Aurora Thunder, Ohio.

To the Editor of the Truth Seeker:

Glancing at the wrapper, enclosing a parcel of books from THE TRUTH SEEKER office, which happened to consist of a few spoiled leaves of THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 17, my eye alighted on the letter from Mr. J. W. Thomas on his "journey out of Spiritualism and into it." When I read this in my own copy I did not think it deserved consideration, and I presume Mr. Jamieson does not deem it "worthy of his steel," but as I marked the overconfident style of its composition, I thought it should not pass unscathed.

Mr. Thomas first bases his main motif on a false premise—a statement that presumes to a knowledge of that which "proceedeth out of the mouth of God," and then goes on to base his whole arguments on this fallacy.

His first statement is contrary to the facts of science that "man as distinguished from the animals has a spiritual life which continues after his physical life is ended," and that the brute "develops only the physical."

For myself, I consider there is nothing more certainly proved by science than that there is no possible future existence of our individual spiritual life without the physical bodily senses, and that the higher animals have precisely the same combination of physical and mental (or "spiritual" if you must use the misleading word) as man. Here is one quotation out of a possible hundred of the greatest scientists: "Man has no single mental faculty which is his exclusive prerogative. His whole psychic life differs only in degree from that of the nearest related mammals."—Haeckel.

Mr. Thomas speaks of "the function of the soul with reference to the higher spiritual life . . . in the world to come," which is a proposition of religion only, not science.

There never was an idea of an immortal individual soul or future spiritual existence that did not emanate from some form of religion, invented by the "medicine man" or the priest; someone who pretended knowledge beyond his fellows by which to gain advantage or control.

He further says: "Religion or spirituality does not consist in worshipping God or anything else. . . Spirituality does not know anything about God." No statement could be more absurd or erroneous. The invention of religion (the sole origin of any spiritualism) implies nothing but a duty to a god, not man, and neither religion or spirituality would ever have been propounded, nor have any meaning apart from the idea of a personal intellectual god and a future life, which ideas are not, as has been proved over and over again, innate in the natural man.

The Atheist by conviction, and the commonsense natural man of evolution, knows full well that no superhuman knowledge or god-given revelation of a future life or future existence has ever been vouchsafed him from heaven or anywhere else, except from self-interested ignorant men, and that it exists only in the imagination, and sprang only from the egotism fostered by religion that man is a separate creation and design of a god who "breathed into him" a spirit or soul different from the animals, which by its persistent teaching for two thousand years has become second nature, so that Mr. Thomas and his like, even though denying the religion of a god cannot yet extricate from his mind the inborn fallacy.

The very words religion and spiritualism are become sickening—the tools of professional priests, mountebanks, spiritualists, trumpet mediums and money grabbers. They must go to the dust heap with the syndicate-made Bible, and all the other paraphernalia of the mossbacks.

The only sensible remark Mr. Thomas makes is one which contradicts all his others, namely: "We see the physical and mental must be developed together." This is true, because without the physical there can be no mental to develop. But why the necessity of the "calisthenics and gymnasium" if the mental can develop apart from matter?

This is what stumps the mossback when he really begins to think. You can't have a candle flame without the candle, nor can you, Mr. Thomas, think without brains, in spite of your trying to prove that thought can exist separately.

MORE APPLIED CHRISTIANITY.

From F. J. C., Nebraska.

To the Editor of the Truth Seeker:

According to the Milwaukee Daily News of Feb. 28, little Roman Zambrowicz, aged 14, bears several welts as a mark of his nun teacher's gentle kindness. Roman was a pupil in St. Adelbert's Parochial School at Fourteenth and Forest Home avenues; and Sister Salastika was his teacher. As a sequel to her beating the boy with a piece of rubber hose, the "sister" was fined fifteen dollars in district court on charge of assault and battery.

CHILDREN'S CORNER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS YOUNG AND OLD

"Between the dark and the daylight,

That is known as the Children's Hour."

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

William F. Jamieson, April 24, 1837.

The subject of this sketch, who is yet living and active with his pen, is probably the oldest American Freethought lecturer. William F. Jamieson was born in Montreal, Canada, of Scotch ancestry, April 24, 1837. His parents were religious, and he was thoroughly trained in the doctrines of the Christian religion. At the age of seventeen young Jamieson began to reason. He then rejected the religion in which he had been nurtured. He has often been heard to say that a happier youth never trod the earth than himself, when he knew and felt that he was free from the dogmas of theology. In 1854 he entered Albion college, Albion, Michigan, where he studied for a while. In 1859 he married and began to lecture. While a Freethinker, Professor Jamieson was also a Spiritualist, a people who in that day were usually Freethinkers. Now most of them are religious. The churches then fought the Spiritualists with the same venom that they did the other Infidels. Now, the church is in such a condition that it dare not expel any one who wishes to remain within its fold. Therefore, today, one may become a Spiritualist and remain in the church. In 1862, in Paw Paw, Michigan, Professor Jamieson held his famous debate with Elder Moses Hull, at that day the champion of Adventism in that section of the country. The Adventists are sometimes called "soul sleepers," that is, they do not believe the dead assume a spirit until Christ's second coming. Hence between Mr. Hull and Professor Jamieson, there was a wide field for argument. The result was that Mr. Hull became a convert to Spiritualism, of which he was afterwards a prominent advocate. Since this time Mr. Jamieson has held over a hundred debates with clergymen, among them some of the most renowned advocates of Christianity. There were Professor Burgess, president of the Northwestern Christian University; Prof. D. R. Dungan, probably the ablest man of his denomination, and the Rev. Jacob Ditzler of the Methodist church south. The debate with the last-named minister has been published, and reveals Professor Jamieson's great powers as an orator and convert. In 1868, a "God-in-the-Constitution" convention was held at Oskaloosa, Iowa. Professor Jamieson, being on a lecture tour in that vicinity, attended. As he was a shorthand reporter he reported the proceedings. The convention, having no reporter of their own, paid him to make for them a transcript. As a result of what he saw and heard here, Professor Jamieson published his book, "The Clergy a Source of Danger to the American Republic." He sounded the trumpet nearly fifty years ago, warning Americans against the dangers of ecclesiasticism in government, and telling them to be on their guard. Would that the people had heard him. If they had, we would not be confronted with the evils which we must fight today. About this time Professor Jamieson made a study of the science. He is well versed in astronomy and geology, on which he has lectured. This, however, in 1878 caused him to abandon Spiritualism, which upon investigation he found to be as scientifically untenable as Christianity. A series of articles by him entitled "My Journey Into Spiritualism and Out," appearing recently in THE TRUTH SEEKER, gives his reasons for changing his opinion. In past years he held several debates on the subject with his old friend, Moses Hull, who, up to the time of his death, clung to that belief. Professor Jamieson has resided in Minnesota, Colorado and California, and now lives at Pentwater, Michigan. He has been twice married, his first wife dying in Colorado. Personally, Professor Jamieson is sociable and genial, and his company is always desirable. He is a strong advocate of temperance, having no use for tobacco or liquors. In his philosophical views he is a materialist. Of the "Old Guard" he is one of the few who are left, and we all hope he may yet live many years.

The Wise Woman.

The following amusing little fable is taken from "Cloud and Silver," by E. V. Lucas (George Doran Co.):

"Once upon a time there was an innkeeper who, strange to say, was unable to make both ends meet. Nothing that he tried was any use; he even placed in the windows a notice to the effect that his house was 'under entirely new management,' but that was in vain. So in despair he consulted a wise woman.

"It is quite simple," she said, as she pocketed her fee. 'You must change the name of your inn.'

"But it has been 'The Golden Lion' for centuries," he replied.

"You must change the name," she said. 'You must call it "The Eight Bells"; and you must have a row of seven bells as the sign.'

"Seven?" he said; 'but that's absurd. What will that do?'

"Go home and see," said the wise woman.

"So he went home and did as she told him. And straightway every wayfarer who was passing paused to count the bells, and then hurried into the inn to point out the mistake, each apparently believing himself to be the only one who had noticed it, and all wishing to refresh themselves for that trouble; motorists, observing the discrepancy as they flew by, stopped their chauffeurs, and, with the usual enormous difficulty, got them to go back; and the joke found its way into the guide-book.

"The result was that the innkeeper waxed fat, lost his health and made his fortune."

No Sacrifice.

The governess sought by every known means to stimulate her small pupil's somewhat undeveloped sense of gratitude.

"Now, Charley," she said, "ought you not to be very much obliged to the cow for the milk she gives you every morning?"

"Oh, I don't know, said Charley. "She has no use for it herself."—Times.

The Collectors.

I wasn't but a little boy
When I collected butterflies;
And next I took to postage-stamps,
And then cigar bands were the prize.

I had a lot of birds' eggs, too,
And horseshoes—some were red with rust,
My hornets' nests were thrown away—
The maid said they collected dust.

But mother whispered not to mind,
For she had a collection, too,
And showed me just the queerest lot—
A baby's cap, a small pink shoe,

A rubber cow, a yellow curl,
A ragged book of A B C,
A letter, thick with blots, I wrote
When she was once away from me.

I wouldn't give a quarter for
The stuff, but mother thinks it's fine,
And only laughed when I remarked
It wasn't valuable, like mine.

But when it comes to keeping things,
She gives me pointers, you can bet..
I sold or swapped mine long ago,
But mother has her rubbish yet..
—Eunice Ward.

His Timekeeper.

A pawnbroker was rudely awakened in the middle of the night by a furious knocking at his front door. Much frightened, he opened the window and looked out.

"Wh-wh-what's the matter?" he asked breathlessly.

"Come down," demanded the stranger.

"Who are—"

"Come down," interrupted the other.

The pawnbroker hastened downstairs and peeped around the door. Now, sir," he demanded.

"I wan'sh to know the time?" said the bibulous one.

"You infernal rascal! Do you mean to say you woke me up for that? How dare you?"

The midnight visitor looked injured.

"Well, you've got my watch," he explained.—Everybody's.

Choosing Her Terms.

Little Helen had developed the habit of holding her thumb in her mouth, even while eating. The mother had resorted to all sorts of methods to correct the child and finally in desperation said:

"Helen, the first thing you know you will swallow your thumb, and then what will you do?"

"Well, mother, I should hate to swallow it, because I'd have a heaven of a time without it."

"Why, Helen!" said the astonished mother. "Where did you hear an expression like that?"

"Well—well," hesitated the little girl, "I didn't hear it exactly like that, mother, but I thought it would sound better."—Lippincott's.

"No Time to Read."

A traveling man one night found himself obliged to remain in a small town on account of a washout on the railroad caused by the heavy rain, which was still coming down in torrents. The traveling man turned to the waitress with:

"This certainly looks like the flood."

"The what?"

"The flood. You've read about the Flood, and the Ark landing on Mount Ararat, surely."

"Gee, mister," she replied. "I ain't seen a paper for three days."

A Striking Precaution.

Mrs. Comler (on a tour of inspection in her friend's house)—Gracious! Why do you have such a high bed for your little boy?

Mrs. Housler—So we can hear him if he falls out. You have no idea what heavy sleepers my husband and I are.

Modern.

"Shall I teach you how to make dough-nuts?" mother-in-law asked her new daughter-in-law.

"Yes, I am terribly interested. I can't understand how you arrange the inner tubes."

Alexander in a Fix.

"When Alexander had conquered India," said the teacher, "what do you think he did? Do you think he gave a great feast to celebrate the triumph? No, he sat down and wept."

The children seemed to be a little disappointed at this childish exhibition on the part of the hero, so the teacher continued: "Now, why do you think Alexander wept?" he asked.

Up went a little hand; but when its owner saw it was the only one in view he hurriedly withdrew it.

"Come on now, Tommy," said the teacher, in his most persuasive voice, "why do you think Alexander wept?"

"Perhaps, sir," said Tommy, hesitatingly, "he didn't know the way back."

In Desperate Straits.

"Dear," said the fond mother, "I must punish you for disobeying my orders."

"Please, ma," said the little boy, "may I go to my room first?"

"Yes," consented the parent, and she cautiously followed her first-born upstairs. There Robert was kneeling by his bed, and his mother heard him say:

"Dear Lord, if you ever wanted to help a little fellow in trouble, now's your chance."

Making Grandma Happy.

Sunday School Teacher—"I told you last Sunday that I wished each of you would try to make at least one person happy during the week. Did you?"

Boy—"Yes'm; I made grandma happy."

"That is noble. How did you do it?"

"I went to visit her, and she's always happy when she sees I've got a good appetite."

THE FREETHOUGHT BADGE PIN

Dedicated to all honest men and women—to those who can and are willing to reason—who constitute the grand army of progressive thinkers throughout the world.

An Emblem of Freedom and Progress

Represents no lodge, order or society, but is designed as a token of recognition for progressive minds of every shade of thought.

All claiming to be free from superstition, all who base their belief upon science and reason, should wear this emblem to speed the grand work of emancipating humanity from the thralldom of mental darkness.

This is conceded by artists and the trade to be the most beautiful Badge ever designed. Being a practical jeweler and designer of emblems of every description, as well as an enthusiastic worker in the cause of human progress, Mr. Wettstein has succeeded in combining in this badge the great want of this age and the future. It represents the Burning Torch of Reason, the Rising Sun of Science and Freethought, beautifully enameled in brilliant colors in contrast with the Night and Darkness of Superstition, enameled in black, and symbolizes the evolution of the world from the Night of Superstition to the Day of Freethought, Science and Reason.

"A pin whose torch and golden sheen,
Would grace the breast of Sheba's queen;
And will lend grace in coming time
To queens of beauty more sublime."
(Impromptu by Eliza Wright.)

As a token of recognition among Liberals of every shade of thought, either at home or abroad, it is especially valuable.

Made in two styles and by best workmen in the most artistic and substantial manner.

Considering amount of gold and artistic workmanship in the badge, no other badges in the world are sold so cheap. They will last for generations to come and increase in popularity and value until fear and superstition exist no more.

THE LETTER BOX.

L. BERGER, Brooklyn.—You are right, of course. They are all about equally guilty. Your criticism will appear.

A. E. C., Washington, D. C.—The demonstration over the Boy Prophet faker in the capital city surpasses credence. Perhaps it is exaggerated by the newspapers. Yes, we take a somber interest in knowing that "the damn fools are not all dead," and yet we never suspected that they were.

J. D., Chicago.—We believe, as you suggest, that the issuing of a fraud order against the late Dr. Fellows of Vineland, N. J., whose advertisement appeared for nearly forty years in THE TRUTH SEEKER, was a case of persecution; and we have reason to believe, also, that the order hastened his death.

J. B. ELLIOTT, Philadelphia.—A considerable number of newspapers have availed themselves of the patriotic writings of Thomas Paine lately. That one of the Philadelphia papers should have taken two extracts from Paine as texts for a front page article indorsing President Wilson's call for volunteers is in line with the good custom. Paine is the voice of America today as he was in 1776.

F. H. W. H., Pennsylvania.—You recently sent us a clipping as from the Philadelphia North American. It charged the Rev. W. A. Sunday with an attempt to besmirch the character of American womanhood and was reprinted in THE TRUTH SEEKER of March 31, page 201. Now a Chicago reader, who has a letter from the North American highly praising the evangelist, wishes to know whether the clipping is authentic. Can you reassure him?

I. LEVY, New York.—When the evangelist was in Philadelphia, being patronized by the representatives of Big Business, Mr. Scott Nearing published an open letter accusing him of being on the side of those who oppressed the widow and the orphan and ground the faces of the poor. That was the finish of Mr. Nearing in the university where he was an instructor. If what he said was true—and it was confirmed by an article by John Reed in the Metropolitan Magazine—your question "why the large commercial interests are manifesting such remarkable interest in Billy Sunday's campaign" is answered. The Sunday dope is a quieter of insurgent labor, and the interests can afford to pay him to dispense it.

A. NORELIIUS, Iowa.—The "Firelanders" you read about in your Swedish paper are the Terra del Fuegians. Terra del Fuego means land of fire. But Darwin did not, as the paper affirms, suppose that he had discovered the missing link when he found them. He merely set them down as hopeless savages. Years after his visit to the islands he was informed by agents of the missionary society that a religious individual named Gardener (we believe it was Lieutenant Gardener), settling there as a missionary, had succeeded in civilizing the natives. With these representations the missionary society worked Darwin for a contribution of five pounds. What Gardener did to the Terra del Fuegians was to reduce them to virtual slavery, compelling them to wear the clothing of civilization and to do the work of civilized men, with the result that in a comparatively short time the tribe of 3,000 had dwindled to 300 from exhaustion and the diseases of civilization. In one of the books by Capt. John R. Spears, written about the year 1900, there is a chapter entitled "A Cape Horn Mission" that describes the havoc wrought among the Terra del Fuegians by Gardener and his mission.

PICTURES BY RYAN WALKER.

This is a lecture by a Texas Pagan, which has been illustrated by another. The text is what the title describes, a comparison of the heathen myths with the Hebrew tales told in scripture. The illustrations are exquisite bits of satire and wit, made by a genius with the pencil, and each is a gem. Text and pictures together, the book is certainly one of the wittiest ever produced, while the information it contains is solid and reliable. It will be a source of pleasure to every Liberal, and is at the same time a splendid Freethought lecture. We guarantee its quality from start to finish. 115 large octavo pages, 75 illustrations. DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

A Plea for Rationalism Undefined.

I wish to endorse the sentiments expressed by Mr. Hugh Martin in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 7, and if not too late also those of Dr. Zaring, Jan. 27, and of other writers who have from time to time expressed the same views.

It has been forcibly impressed upon my mind during the short period that I have been a subscriber of THE TRUTH SEEKER that there are two distinct types of contributors who avail themselves of its columns: The genuine and true Rationalists who are sincerely interested in the cause of Rationalism, and another group classed by Mr. Martin as cranks who are interested in using Rationalism and its mouth-pieces only for advancing outside causes, crankisms, thus barring the space from true Rationalist writers in behalf of these outside interests. Among such outside interests have been the most persistent and protracted efforts in behalf of religious dogmatic theorems, based upon scriptural authority and contrary to all secular evidence.

That the prostitution of space of Rationalist periodicals is destructive to the cause, may be gleaned by analogy of the experiences of other publications who have been practically obliterated by too liberal a policy toward heterogeneous contributions.

The disastrous effect upon mouth-pieces of special movements of permitting the prostitution of their columns is well illustrated in the case of the Journal of Religious Psychology, edited by President G. Stanley Hall and published by the librarian of Clark University, of which Mr. Theodore Schroeder and other well-known Rationalists have been contributors.

This periodical was established, not for the promulgation of orthodox Christianity, but rather for the purpose of putting that and other religions to the scientific test of modern critical analysis from the psychological standpoint. It commanded a subscription of $3 per year and rapidly gained in public interest and support. Gradually, however, its space was encroached upon by writers of orthodox Christian articles of commonplace type, such as tract societies are freely distributing broadcast. Its subscribers evidently got tired paying out their money for duplications of otherwise free orthodox literature and dropped away, with the result that this most useful periodical had to discontinue publication with the December number, 1915. Yet there is today the greatest demand for real enlightenment on the subject of religion as a mental disease. It is a subject that THE TRUTH SEEKER could well take up to replace the space of eliminated crankisms.

An illustration of the defeat of a great cause by Crankism is to be observed in Socialism. No cause ever had greater promise than this. What could be a greater cause than such a humanitarian one? If it was today what it started out to be and what it ought to be, no right-minded man could or would reject it. But like many other great causes, it became diseased. It surrendered to crankism, which has now virtually throttled it.

It started out to be an organization of the people, by the people, and for the people, as the immortal Lincoln put it, and to be true to its purpose, to all the people. True Socialism implied universal adoption of true social attitudes between every man and every woman, with special privileges to none and equal opportunity to all. If lived up to it would have established the highest ethical standards. But now, sad to admit, its organs advocate not social but the most unsocial attitudes, not equality of all, but sectionalism, man against man, class against class.

We do not read of abuses to be corrected, of goals of perfection to be attained, of vices to be curbed, and individual dishonesty and malfeasance to be exposed. The columns of Socialist papers are not thought of any more as mouth-pieces of real reformers; only the demagogue and the unsocial seem to use them.

Fundamentally Rationalists are defenders of liberty and rights of men. The same men that rescued France from the domination of venal and political tyrants, finally rescued it from the despotism of the church, but at terrible cost, during the French Revolution, because of the temporary dominance of the crank wing of the patriots. In America, also, our present liberty and rights, as far as they go, are due to the noble work of the Rationalists Paine, Jefferson, Washington, Franklin and others, who managed to accomplish their great achievements without serious hindrance of a crank element. A revolution among the revolutionists would have greatly delayed if not entirely defeated the great cause. Russia is now most seriously hampered in her struggles to attain a permanent democratic government by Socialists who are fools enough to believe their ends would be best served by betrayal of their country to the German kaiser, who would surely restore the pro-German czar.

Most unfortunately for Rationalism, it is regarded as standing for what modern Socialism in America stands for, and that it is correspondingly shunned by many who detest such principles as they associate with this organization there can be no doubt. Present day desertion of Socialism, even by laboring men, in the last Presidential vote, shows its unpopularity, a burden which Rationalists cannot afford to carry. It is a weight of sinking proportions.

Last fall I stopped on a public thoroughfare to see and hear a demagogue contort himself and tear his hair as he preached anarchy, a breakdown of all law and order, treason to our government in the event of war, all in the name and under the auspices of the Socialist propaganda, and associate himself and the cause he was preaching and ranting with his Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, who was the first Socialist and the founder of a religious organization of indigents and mendicants. I was much gratified that at last this anti-social cancer on democracy was finally getting where it belonged—among the irrational in religion. Let us be purely and exclusively Rationalists.

Let us as such seek the cooperation of the best minds in the world and cut loose from all crankisms. We have progressed with great strides in spite of all drawbacks. Our fund of knowledge is being added to daily by the best scholars the world has produced. The greatest of educators are now Rationalists. At least half of our country is without church affiliation, and those that are affiliated are so lukewarm that only great revival stampeding will keep the ball rolling. But the church is united—organized—and Rationalists are not.

In an article (T. S. Dec. 30, 1916) entitled "Idealistic Rationalism," I enumerated several great Rationalist groups in America who are all working independently to the same great goal. I did not, however, mention another one, the Monists, who are very closely allied with us, yet also separate, with the Open Court and Monist periodicals and great book publishing house, which are financed by the Hegeler millions. It is one of the few endowed Rationalist institutions in the world.

The question arises, why don't we have more? Why are not such multi-millionaire Rationalists as Andrew Carnegie, Archer Huntington, Frederic Ayer, and Russell Holt interested in the uplift and liberation of mankind, such only as Rationalistic education of the people can give? It is not because they are not humanitarians or socialists. It is because they associate modern Rationalism with destructive instead of constructive Socialism. They therefore give their millions where they think it will do more good, namely, to science, to education, to libraries, to research, to archeological delving in the remains of antiquity, and to charity, where it all does incalculable good. They are now feeding millions of starving in Belgium, Serbia, German-occupied northern France, etc.

Mr. Mangasarian, and every other Rationalist propagandist, can testify to the inestimable harm that Rationalism experiences everywhere owing to the stain of its association in the general public mind with destructive socialism. The poverty of the cause handicaps it beyond measure in coping with the strong arm of religion, which frightens the wealthy into bribing the church for entry into heaven, from which according to scripture they are otherwise barred.

Wealth is power, poverty is weakness. We did not make it that way, but that way it is. If we as a Rationalist group would do our utmost to further the good cause, we must do our utmost to obtain the withdrawal. General education in our country is no worse off owing to its great appropriations of money, but it is much worse off in those countries where it is withdrawn.

Are we not to congratulate ourselves that we can appropriate seven billions of dollars for a starter for the defeat of the military despot of Prussia when he menaces and denies the ordinary rights of man to Americans? Would we have reason for such congratulation if we were weak and helpless? Let us make the same application to Rationalism and see where we come out. By all means let us strive for material as well as "spiritual" strength for our cause. Its endorsement should be universal.

If there is anywhere lurking a feeling that the uplift and liberation of mankind from religious, social, or political tyranny can be best subserved by maintaining Rationalism as an organization of human derelicts, against everything in the world that is worth while, I feel strongly it is a great mistake, and while it lags behind in the great game of life, all the good it might do, correspondingly lags and its goal remains where it has been.

Every great movement is subject to the same laws of nature and life as that of every individual. It lives or dies according to the intelligence exhibited by those who engineer its operations. The laws of evolution, however unfeeling we may regard them, control the situation and eliminate the unfit. History tells us of innumerable instances of elimination of the weak. Weak men, weak women, weak minds, weak groups of men, weak crowds and mobs that lacked intelligence, weak individuals who could not get along in the world singly have always sought to strengthen their positions by combination; but the stern law of evolution swept them away simply because the lack of brains that characterized them as individuals characterized their federations. Every dog has its day, as the saying is, but as Lincoln said, "you can't fool all the people all the time," and if it lacks intelligence it dies.

In conclusion, I wish to add that whenever a Socialist society or party arises with a true socialism, one which will be both in name and at bottom social, its only dictum being a perfect political equality of rights and advantages to all men and women, and with special advantages to none, giving everyone his full right and every merit full compensation, that I will join and work for with all my heart.

I once called myself a Socialist. I had ideals, and was led to believe an ideal Socialist organization existed. I eagerly read its literature. I could not find the echo to my ideals I had anticipated. It was in many respects the very opposite. I had to lay it aside with sadness, but with hope that some day Socialism may have a giant such as Rationalism had in Colonel Ingersoll, or one who may have the constructive genius of Thomas Paine, the father of American democracy, who will weld it into a great and strong institution that will realize its original ideals.

HOMER WAKEFIELD, M. D.

MENTAL HANDICAP.

The difficulty with all law-making bodies is the ancestral handicap of a conventional mind, being only in exceptional instances, able to break loose from the apron strings of the nurse precedent. Not desiring to make apologies for being original under normal conditions, they must wait for a disaster that will compel the discarding of dignity, and common sense as well.

While in such state of mental emotion, justice cannot be rendered for future generations. Because of this mental lopsidedness a socialistic form of government would be repudiated under the test as is capitalism now being tested. Socialism would create beautiful homes and cities and the claim asserted that because of the intelligence required to maintain organized government to secure the fruits of peace that other nations would emulate us instead of attacking and invading this country. Absolutism dislikes the contrasts with popular government and would welcome the open door policy of the Socialists in order to maintain its form of government. Under present forms of government can be seen Shylock crying for the flesh as well as for the blood of the nation in preparations for war and during periods of war; the mental inefficiency of theology passing judgment instead of throwing away such props and using reason.

This United States government is urged to adopt conscription although even under a voluntary service a man is asked to sacrifice his family, as well as his life in defense of the nation, then upon inquiring why one must see his family suffer at the mercy of sanctimonious charity, he is told because he and other ancestors did likewise; yet in their minds the legislators have the remedy, but lack of moral courage prevents casting off of outworn political and economical concepts which bar the way to a just and proper means of national defense under which one will cheerfully defend his country from invasion, knowing that the government would provide as well for his family as he would himself.

But this is too visionary, so come down to earth where we see the veterans of the civil war preferring to live on the husks the United States provides rather than desert or discard their wives, honorably refusing to be tempted by the comforts of Soldiers' and Sailors' Homes. This is no dream. Instead, our capitalistic legislators build tariff walls and temples, then bow down and worship the golden monsters created, while the various and interested priesthoods and devotees utter anathemas upon the undesirable who will not reverently recite "Monopoly and Insularity, hallowed be thy names, for blessed be the meek that praise ye, as even unto the least of these shall inherit as much and no more of the earth than required for their graves." "Perhaps," says the gatling gun, "Science will be asked to help women to overcome the time limits of nature after the rapid fire gun is laid aside, until the human one can make up for the losses and gain sufficient headway for another war." Religion will discover new revelations in order that the sex will eagerly seek the iron cross of spiritual honors. Our army and navy illustrate the manner in which absolute authority clings to antiquated methods of conducting its affairs. Our corporations and trusts are democratic in management and are always seeking better relations at this late day between its officers and employees, for a common school education and ordinary experiences of life easily line one up to know his or her place and duty without stopping in the performance of such; clicking the heels together and saluting a foreman or superintendent.

Caste lines between officers and men were as necessary as was the autocratic attitude when the source of armies and navies were in the depths of ignorance and superstition, but now in ordinary life the average citizen gives way only to the credit he grants to persons possessing greater experience. Any attempt to impress the absolutism of the army and navy upon him will surely result in repudiation of any adequate means of national defense, hence capitalism is in the same boat with socialism because the fog of antiquity beclouds the military and naval branch of this nation.

Faalty to political platforms does not prove constructive and progressive loyalty to one's country, for even at the present time a small minority is persecuted and placed upon the legal thumbscrews and racks because of their exposing evils and attempting to place reforms in actual practice that the future generations will approve.

GUY SHOEMAKER.

FOR THE REFERENDUM.

To argue that the Referendum is a farce because every voter does not vote at every election would be called a fallacious argument were such reasoning applied to any other question. Suppose, for instance, an enemy of popular education should advocate the abolishment of our public school system because, forsooth, all children do not attend!

To say that the majority shall have no opportunity to secure an education because some neglect their opportunities is the height of absurdity; yet this is the specious argument used in opposition to a government of the people by themselves.

The Initiative gives the common people an opportunity to initiate a law by petition, and any act of the legislature can by the Referendum be referred to the voters for final acceptance or rejection. The Initiative and Referendum lessens the power of the legislators, some of whom may owe their election to some form of special privilege.

If the voters of California, or any state fortunate enough to have the Referendum, object to any law, they can initiate the Referendum and the question goes to the electors and is decided by those interested. The final acceptance or rejection of every law rests with the voters.

It might be possible, in some states, to buy a sufficient number of legislators to enact an unjust law, but the cost of buying a majority of the electorate would daunt the heart of the staunchest advocate of the predatory interests.

Many states already have the Referendum—which is nothing more nor less than the government of the people by themselves instead of the government of the people by a selected few.

Will New York join the procession of states with progressive ideas, or will she wait, and later conclude that she, too, can trust herself to govern herself, and then come tagging along like a small boy in the rear of a triumphal procession?

Go in, New York, self-government is fine!

ELIZABETH QUIGLEY.

HYMN.

When weaker brother calls for aid
He shall not call in vain;
The sacred cause of Liberty
We ever will maintain.
For Righteousness and Honesty
Our flag shall proudly wave;
The traitor's part we ne'er will play,
Nor liar be—nor knave.

For universal brotherhood
We'll wage a holy fight,
That Right shall be for every man
The keystone of his Might;
The good of all shall be our faith
To help the world along;
The proudest aim of one and all
Shall be to right the wrong.

Then haste the day when wars shall cease,
And all mankind be one;
The only Creed be Righteousness,
And race of Life well run.
Let nations now of every clime
With love their works endue
And in accord for evermore
The arts of peace pursue.

SEVENTH EDITION — REDUCED PRICE

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxes of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

Unbalanced Bills.

With a cruelty surprising,
Human hopes go pulverizing,
In the tide of woe that's rising
From the BILLS:
Soldiers set the pace that kills,
Fill the world with sadd'ning thrills,
We're aghast! what hosts of ills
Come through BILLS:

Fighting armies get their motions,
Through a spread of Kultur notions,
Now the boss has staked the oceans—
KAISER BILL.

Also, mourners give ovations
To ribalddest word creations;
Billy salivates the nations—
SUNDAY BILL.

With grape juice and olive branches,
While the world sits on its haunches,
"Other cheeks" peace campaign launches—
BRYAN BILL.

Bill Stein's labored explanation;
From his fat, exalted station,
Sooths the fur of favored nation—
GUMSHOE BILL.

As we fight the cost of staying
On this planet; still the braying
Of "explainers" don't ease paying FORAGE BILLS.

Sure the old world waxes tired;
Hopes all useless BILLS get fired,
And regrets that Nature's sired
FLIGHTY BILLS.

As we swaddle, in thin twaddle;
And mankind can scarcely waddle,
Let's resolve to no more coddle
MISFIT BILLS.

ALLAHASSETT.

A Misunderstood Man.—He: "May I see you a moment before you retire?"
Hostess: "Well, hardly."

Far the Better-Half.—Smith: "How's everything at your house?"
Brown: "Oh, she's all right"—Life.

A Misnomer.—"Why should I be called a consumer?" asked hubbly as he handed out a check to pay for his wife's Christmas gift purchases. "All I do is produce."

Introductory Break.—A conceited young clergyman, walking home from church with one of the ladies of his congregation, remarked: "I preached this morning to a congregation of asses."
"I thought of that," observed the lady, "when you called them 'beloved brethren.'"

Impediment.—Billy: "I would lay the world at your feet but for one thing."
Milly: "And that is?"
Billy: "Some other people are using it."
—Judge.

Drawing the Color Line.—Young Lady (with hopes)—"What do you think is the fashionable color for a bride?"
Male Shop-walker—"Tastes differ, but I should prefer a white one."

Magnificent Opportunity.—"I don't see any sense in referring to the wisdom of Solomon," said the man, smartly. "He had a thousand wives."
"Yes," answered the woman, tartly, "he learned his wisdom from them."

Efficient Anywhere.—"Look here, I bought a bottle of your hair restorer last night and all it's done is to raise these big lumps on my head."

"My gracious," said the beauty doctor, "we must have sold you a bottle of bust developer by mistake."

What He Needed.—Irate Business Man: "You book agents make me so angry with your confounded nerve and impudence that I cannot find words to express my feelings."
Agent: "Then I am the very man you want. I am selling dictionaries."

Fiendishly Funny.—William Ganson Rose, of Cleveland, says an advertisement may be made peculiarly striking in many ways, as witness the following, which he saw in front of a Cleveland moving picture house: "Dante's Inferno—A Poet's Experience in Hell—Two Hours of Solid Fun!"

Phonetic Spelling.—Here is the phraseology of a sign that B. B. Myers, 2117 Amsterdam avenue, New York, put in his window in connection with a corn-cure display:

"Mr. E. Z. Walker says: Use Bogert's Corn and Bunion Remedy and you can run like Helen B. Happie."

Quarantined.—It was a cheap vaudeville house. An Oriental act had just been concluded and incense filled the house.

"Usher," complained a pompous man in an aisle seat, "I smell punk."
"That's all right," whispered the usher, confidentially, "just sit where you are and I won't put anyone near you."

Not in the Running.—The judge stopped to have a word with the colored man-of-all-work, and asked if he went to church.

"Yessuh, Ah goes to church every Sunday," he said.

"Are you a member?"

"Yessuh."

"What church?"

"Prespeteeryn."

"Do you believe in the doctrine of election?"

"Yessuh."

"Do you believe I am elected to the saved?"

"Law, judge, Ah didn't even know you was a candidate."—Argonaut.

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

A very frank book; serious, scholarly, convincing.

Paine's Age of Reason

By THOMAS PAINE, M.A.

This edition of Thomas Paine's masterpiece is the one that is sure to become the standard for all future correct editions. It is reprinted from one of the first copies in English published by Barrois at Paris, January, 1794, and the proofs were probably read by Paine. It enables the world of the twentieth century to read Paine's AGE OF REASON as Paine wrote it in the eighteenth century. It is printed from large new type. 180 pages. 15c. T. S. Co.

THE CHRISTIAN HELL

From the First to the Twentieth Century

By

HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work. Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

ETERNITY

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

Rome sent greetings to America April 21, as a feature of her two thousand six hundred and seventieth anniversary. Prince Prospero Colonna, mayor of Rome, speaking at the inauguration of the Archaeological Park, welcomed as a new ally, in the name of ancient Rome, the young American democracy, which, he said, rivaled the former in genius and civilization.

A huge parade was held in New York April 19, to symbolize a modern "ride of Paul Revere." The 142d anniversary of the Battle of Lexington, was "Wake Up America Day," and the parade in New York and other cities was designed to stimulate enlistments for the war with Germany, as the Revolutionary hero, in 1775, sounded the call through the Middlesex countryside.

Twenty of the largest shoe factories in Lynn, Mass., remained closed April 20, after the holiday, as had been anticipated, and almost 15,000 shoe operatives are thrown out of employment. Fifteen more had closed since, for an indefinite period. The whole number of operatives, men and women, affected will be close to 20,000, or the major part of Lynn's shoemaking army.

The seizure of German ships at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, has been completed without incident. The vessels aggregate 240,779 tons, ranging from the Hamburg-American liner Bleacher, 12,350 tons, to a vessel of 1,103 tons, a portion of Brazil's German population, has revolted. Dispatches from Montevideo, Uruguay, asserted that the Teutons are well armed, even with some artillery, and plentifully supplied.

In a frenzy born of his belief that the Almighty had declared the extermination of all Prussians, and intensified by frequent quarrels in which the women of his family, all of them natives of Germany, persisted in taking the side of the kaiser, the Rev. Robert Berry, an American, pastor of Armour Villa Park chapel, last Sunday, murdered his wife and his mother-in-law, wounded his sister-in-law, and killed himself at the family home, in Yonkers, N. Y.

Recruiting figures made public by the War Department April 21 show that since April 1 the total number of recruits obtained for the regular army has aggregated 25,842, or approximately an army division.

Comte Gilbert de la Fayette, son of the Marquis de La Fayette, has applied to the War Department in Washington for permission to join the American army. He is now at the front with the artillery.

General Maude, commanding the British forces in Mesopotamia, has forced a passage of the Shattel-Adhem, attacked the Turkish main positions and completely routed the Turkish forces.

During the week ended April 15, 454 ships of all nationalities, of a gross tonnage of 401,685, entered Italian ports, while 419 ships of a gross tonnage of 399,580 left. Five of Italian nationality under 3,500 tons and two sailing vessels under 150 tons were sunk.

The Spanish steamship Tom has been torpedoed and sunk without warning. Eighteen lives were lost.

The British War Cabinet has decided that every physician and surgeon and every man with medical training of military age must be called up for service immediately.

The steamship Stadacona, of the Canada Steamship Company, has been torpedoed. Captain C. O. Allen, Halifax, was master. The crew landed in England. Captain Allen was taken prisoner on board the submarine.

The torpedoing of an unnamed Scandinavian steamship with the loss of all on board except Captain Karstein Olsen is reported. The captain says the submarine rose to the surface after the torpedo had been fired and watched twenty-nine persons drown without offering assistance.

Estimates of the Canadian losses around Vimy, place the casualties from the beginning of the Vimy offensive until April 16 between five and six thousand. Three hundred and thirty Canadian officers fell on Vimy Ridge, according to the information.

The Argentine government has sent to Germany an energetic note demanding complete satisfaction for the sinking of the Argentine sailing ship Monte Protégido. The Argentine minister is instructed to break off relations immediately if Germany attempts to evade responsibility for the torpedoing of the vessel.

German casualties are reported in the German official casualty lists during the month of March show that 54,803 men were killed, died of wounds or sickness, were wounded, made prisoner or are missing, bringing the total for the war to 4,180,966.

FREEDOM OF THOUGHT.

Its Early History and Progress Told in Striking Paragraphs from a Notable Book.

BY PROF. J. B. BURY.

IT is a common saying that thought is free. A man can never be hindered from thinking whatever he chooses so long as he conceals what he thinks.

A long time was needed to arrive at the conclusion that coercion of opinion is a mistake, and only a part of the world is yet convinced. That conclusion, so far as I can judge, is the most important ever reached by men. It was the issue of a continuous struggle between authority and reason.

If you ask somebody how he knows something, he may say, "I have it on good authority," or, "I read it in a book," or, "It is a matter of common knowledge," or, "I learned it at school." Any of these replies means that he has accepted information from others, trusting in their knowledge, without verifying their statements or thinking the matter out for himself. And the greater part of most men's knowledge and beliefs is of this kind, taken without verification from their parents, teachers, acquaintances, books, newspapers.

The facts which we can safely accept must be capable of demonstration or verification.

Now people at all times have been commanded or expected or invited to accept on authority alone—the authority, for instance, of public opinion, or a church, or a sacred book—doctrines which are not proved or are not capable of proof. Most beliefs about nature and man, which were not founded on scientific observation, have served directly or indirectly religious and social interests, and hence they have been protected by force against the criticisms of persons who have the inconvenient habit of using their reason. Nobody minds if his neighbour disbelieves a demonstrable fact. But if he denies doctrines which cannot be demonstrated, such as the existence of a personal God or the immortality of the soul, he incurs serious disapprobation and at one time he might have been put to death.

It may be objected that there is a legitimate domain for authority, consisting of doctrines which lie outside human experience and therefore cannot be proved or verified, but at the same time cannot be disproved. Of course, any number of propositions can be invented which cannot be disproved, and it is open to any one who possesses exuberant faith to believe them; but no one will maintain that they all deserve credence so long as their falsehood is not demonstrated. And if only some deserve credence, who, except reason, is to decide which?

It has been said that Homer was the Bible of the Greeks. The remark exactly misses the truth. The Greeks fortunately had no Bible, and this fact was both an expression and an important condition of their freedom.

Morality and religion are matters of latitude. This discovery tends to weaken authority, and to raise disquieting reflections, as in the case of one who, brought up as a Christian, comes to realize that, if he had been born on the Ganges or the Euphrates, he would have firmly believed in entirely different dogmas.

Socrates was the greatest of the educationalists, but unlike the others he taught gratuitously, though he was a poor man. He taught those with whom he conversed—and he conversed indiscriminately with all who would listen to him—to bring all popular beliefs before the bar of reason, to approach every inquiry with an open mind, and not to judge by the opinion of majorities or the dictate of authority. If the Athenians had had a daily press, Socrates would have been denounced by the journalists as a dangerous person. At the age of seventy, he was prosecuted as an Atheist and corrupter of youth and was put to death (399 B. C.). It is strange that if the Athenians really thought him dangerous they should have suffered him so long.

The outcome of the large freedom permitted at Athens was a series of philosophies which had a common source in the conversations of Socrates. Plato, Aristotle, the Stoics, the Epicureans, the Skeptics—it may be maintained that the efforts of thought represented by these names have had a deeper influence on the progress of man than any other continuous intellectual movement, at least until the rise of modern science in a new epoch of liberty.

In the later Roman Republic and the early Empire, no restrictions were imposed on opinion. Most of the leading men were unbelievers in the official religion of the state, but they considered it valuable for the purpose of keeping the uneducated populace in order. This was the attitude of Cicero, and the view that a false religion is indispensable as a social machine was general among ancient unbelievers. It is common, in one form or another, to-day; at least, religions are constantly defended on the ground not of truth but of utility. This defense belongs to the statecraft of Machiavelli, who taught that religion is necessary for government, and that it may be the duty of a ruler to support a religion which he believes to be false.

The general rule of Roman policy was to tolerate throughout the empire all religions and all opinions. Blasphemy was not punished. The principle was expressed in the maxim of the Emperor Tiberius: "If the gods are insulted, let them see to it themselves." An exception to the rule of tolerance was made in the case of the Christian sect, and the treatment of this Oriental religion may be said to have inaugurated religious persecution in Europe. For a long time the Christians were only known to those Romans who happened to hear of them, as a sect of the Jews.

Under Trajan we find that the principle has been laid down that to be a Christian is an offense punishable by death. Henceforward Christianity remained an illegal religion. But in practice the law was not applied rigorously or logically. The emperors desired, if possible, to extirpate Christianity without shedding blood.

Any reader of the Christian literature of the time could not fail to see that in a state where Christians had the power there would be no tolerance of other religious practices. The persecution ended by edicts of toleration (A. D. 311 and 313).

The martyrs died for conscience, but not for liberty.

If we review the history of classical antiquity as a whole, we may almost say that freedom of thought was like the air men breathed. It was taken for granted and nobody thought about it. If seven or eight thinkers at Athens were penalized for heterodoxy, in some and perhaps in most of these cases heterodoxy was only a pretext.

When Christianity confronted the Roman government, no one saw that in the treatment of a small, obscure, and, to pagan thinkers, uninteresting or repugnant sect, a principle of the deepest social importance was involved. A long experience of the theory and practice of persecution was required to base securely the theory of freedom of thought.

About ten years after the Edict of Toleration, Constantine the Great adopted Christianity. This momentous decision inaugurated a millennium in which reason was enchained, thought was enslaved, and knowledge made no progress.

During the two centuries in which they had been a forbidden sect the Christians had claimed toleration on the ground that religious belief is voluntary and not a thing which can be enforced. When their faith became the predominant creed and had the power of the state behind it, they abandoned this view. They embarked on the hopeful enterprise of bringing about a complete uniformity in men's opinions on the mysteries of the universe, and began a more or less definite policy of coercing thought. The profound conviction that those who did not believe in its doctrines would be damned eternally, and that God punishes theological error as if it were the most heinous of crimes, led naturally to persecution. It was a duty to impose on men the only true doctrine, seeing that their own eternal interests were at stake, and to hinder errors from spreading. Heretics were more than ordinary criminals and the pains that man could inflict on them were as nothing to the tortures awaiting them in hell. To rid the earth of men who, however virtuous, were through their religious errors, enemies of the Almighty, was a plain duty. Their virtues were no excuse. We must remember that, according to the humane doctrine of the Christians, pagan, that is, merely human, virtues were vices, and infants who died unbaptized passed the rest of time in creeping on the floor of hell.

Besides the logic of its doctrines, the character of its sacred book must also be held partly accountable for the intolerant principles of the Christian church. The truth is that sacred books are an obstacle to moral and intellectual progress, because they consecrate the ideas of a given epoch, and its customs, as divinely appointed. Christianity, by adopting books of a long past age, placed in the path of human development a particularly nasty stumbling-block.

Paganism was finally shattered by the severe laws of Theodosius I (end of fourth century). It lingered on here and there for more than another century, especially at Rome and Athens, but had little importance.

The popes established a theocratic system in which all other interests were to be subordinated to the grand duty of maintaining the purity of the faith.

When the Inquisition was fully developed it covered Western Christendom with a net from the meshes of which it was difficult for a heretic to escape. Freedom of thought was entirely suppressed. One of the most efficacious means for hunting down heresy was the "Edict of Faith," which enlisted the people in the service of the Inquisition and required every man to be an informer. The prisoner was assumed to be guilty, the burden of proving his innocence rested on him.

The legal processes employed by the church in these persecutions exercised a corrupting influence on the criminal jurisprudence of the Continent. And so in the Middle Ages and afterwards men of kindly temper and the purest zeal for morality were absolutely devoid of mercy where heresy was suspected. Hatred of heresy was a sort of infectious germ, generated by the doctrine of exclusive salvation. It has been observed that this dogma also injured the sense of truth. As man's eternal fate was at stake, it seemed plainly legitimate or rather imperative to use any means to enforce the true belief—even falsehood and imposture.

In every important field of scientific research, the ground was occupied by false views which the Church declared to be true on the infallible authority of the Bible. The Greek physician Hippocrates had based the study of medicine and disease on experience and methodical research. In the Middle Ages men relapsed to the primitive notions of a barbarous age. Bodily ailments were ascribed to occult agencies—the malice of the Devil or the wrath of God. St. Augustine said that the diseases of Christians were caused by demons. Anatomy was forbidden, partly perhaps on account of the doctrine of the resurrection of the body. The opposition of ecclesiastics to inoculation in the eighteenth century was a survival of the mediæval view of disease. Chemistry (alchemy) was considered a diabolical art and in 1317 was condemned by the pope. The long imprisonment of Roger Bacon (thirteenth century) who, while he professed zeal for orthodoxy, had an inconvenient instinct for scientific research, illustrates the mediæval distrust of science.

The firm belief in witchcraft, magic, and demons was inherited by the Middle Ages from antiquity, but it became far more lurid and made the world terrible. The trials for witchcraft multiplied, and for three hundred years the discovery of witchcraft and the destruction of those who were accused of practicing it, chiefly women, was a standing feature of European civilization. Both the theory and the persecution were supported by holy scripture. "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live" was the clear injunction of the highest authority. It was Rationalism which brought the long chapter of horrors to an end.

Among the Mohammedans there was a certain amount of free thought, provoked by their knowledge of ancient Greek speculation. The works of the Freethinker Averroes (twelfth century) which were based on Aristotle's philosophy, propagated a small wave of rationalism in Christian countries. In the University of Paris his teachings produced a school of Freethinkers who held that the creation, the resurrection of the body, and other essential dogmas, might be true from the standpoint of religion but are false from the standpoint of reason. To a plain mind this seems much as if one said that the doctrine of immortality is true on Sundays but not on week-days, or that the Apostles' Creed is false in the drawing-room and true in the kitchen. This dangerous movement was crushed, and the saving principle of double truth condemned, by Pope John XXI.

The blasphemous statement that the world had been deceived by three impostors, Moses, Jesus, and Mohammed, was current in the thirteenth century. It was attributed to the Freethinking Emperor Frederick II (died 1250), who has been described as "the first modern man."

The intellectual and social movement which was to dispel the darkness of the Middle Ages and prepare the way for those who would ultimately deliver reason from her prison, began in Italy in the thirteenth century. The whole transformation, which presently extended from Italy to Northern Europe, is known as the Renaissance, or rebirth of classical antiquity. Its true name is Humanism.

The Humanists were not hostile to theological authority or to the claims of religious dogma; but they had discovered a purely human curiosity about this world and it absorbed their interest. They idolized pagan literature which abounded in poisonous germs; the secular side of education became all-important; religion and theology were kept in a separate compartment.

I may illustrate this double-facedness of the Renaissance by Montaigne (second half of sixteenth century). His "Essays" make for rationalism, but contain frequent professions of orthodox Catholicism, in which he was perfectly sincere.

The logical results of Montaigne's skepticism were made visible by his friend Charron, who published a book On Wisdom in 1601. Here it is taught that true morality is not founded on religion, and the author surveys the history of Christianity to show the evils which it had produced. A contemporary Jesuit placed Charron in the catalogue of the most dangerous and wicked Atheists. He was really a deist; but in those days, and long after, no one scrupled to call a non-Christian Deist an Atheist.

What Humanism did in the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries, at first in Italy, then in other countries, was to create an intellectual atmosphere in which the emancipation of reason could begin and knowledge could resume its progress. The period saw the invention of printing and the discovery of new parts of the globe, and these things were to aid powerfully in the future defeat of authority.

But the triumph of freedom depended on other causes also; it was not to be brought about by the intellect alone. The chief political facts of the period were the decline of the power of the pope in Europe, the decay of the Holy Roman Empire, the growth of strong monarchies, in which worldly interests determined and dictated ecclesiastical policy, and from which the modern state was to develop. The success of the Reformation was made possible by these conditions. Its victory in North Germany was due to the secular interest of the princes, who profited by the confiscation of church lands. The principal cause of the Reformation was the general corruption of the church and the flagrant of its oppression.

It is an elementary error, but one which is still shared by many people who have read history superficially, that the Reformation established religious liberty and the right of private judgment. What it did was to bring about a new set of political and social conditions, under which religious liberty could ultimately be secured, and, by virtue of its inherent inconsistencies, to lead to results at which its leaders would have shuddered. But nothing was further from the minds of the leading Reformers than the toleration of doctrines differing from their own. They replaced one authority by another. They set up the authority of the Bible instead of that of the church, but it was the Bible according to Luther or the Bible according to Calvin. So far as the spirit of intolerance went, there was nothing to choose between the new and the old churches. The religious wars were not for the cause of freedom, but for particular sets of doctrines.

Calvin's fame for intolerance is blackest. He established a theocracy at Geneva. Here liberty was completely crushed; false doctrines were put down by imprisonment, exile, and death. The punishment of Servetus is the most famous exploit of Calvin's warfare against heresy. The Spaniard Servetus, who had written against the dogma of the Trinity, was imprisoned at Lyons (partly through the machinations of Calvin) and having escaped came rashly to Geneva. He was tried for heresy and committed to the flames (1553), though Geneva had no jurisdiction over him.

The Reformation on the Continent was as hostile to enlightenment as it was to liberty; and science, if it seemed to contradict the Bible, has as little chance with Luther as with the pope. Yet the Reformation involuntarily helped the cause of liberty. The result was contrary to the intentions of its leaders, was indirect, and long delayed. In the first place the great rent in Western Christianity, substituting a number of theological authorities instead of one—several gods, we may say, instead of one God—produced a weakening of ecclesiastical authority in general. The religious tradition was broken.

Again, the intellectual justification of the Protestant rebellion against the church had been the right of private judgment, that is, the principle of religious liberty. But the Reformers had asserted it only for themselves, and as soon as they had framed their own articles of faith, they had practically repudiated it. This was the most glaring inconsistency in the Protestant position. If we are to believe on authority, why should we prefer the upstart dictation of the Lutheran Confession of Augsburg or the English Thirty-nine Articles to the venerable authority of the Church of Rome?

The history of modern astronomy begins in 1543, with the publication of the work of Copernicus revealing the truth about the motions of the earth. The appearance of this work is important in the history of Freethought, because it raised a clear and definite issue between science and Scripture.

Rome did not permit the truth about the solar system to be taught till after the middle of the eighteenth century, and Galileo's books remained on the Index till 1835. The prohibition was fatal to the study of natural science in Italy.

The Roman Index reminds us of the significance of the invention of printing in the struggle of freedom of thought, by making it easy to propagate new ideas far and wide. Authority speedily realized the danger, and took measures to place its yoke on the new contrivance, which promised to be such a powerful ally of reason. Pope Alexander VI inaugurated censorship of the press by his Bull against unlicensed printing (1501).

(To be concluded.)

That is just the way in this world; an enemy can partly ruin a man, but it takes a good-natured in-judicious friend to complete the thing and make perfect.—Mark Twain.

And the finest fellow of all would be the one who could be glad to have lived because the world was chiefly miserable, and his life had come to help someone who needed it.—George Eliot.

Fictions of Faith.

THE SECOND COMING.

We read in the tenth chapter of Matthew of the sending out of the disciples, and in verse 23 find, "You will not have covered the towns of Israel before the Son of man arrives." But it seems to me that this statement logically belongs not to an early but to a late period of the supposed ministry of Jesus.

In Matthew xxiv, we find the disciples inquiring, "Tell us when will this happen? What will be the sign of your arrival and of the end of the world?" Then comes a list of signs, some absurd as founded on a false comogony, others such as are always happening. This list seems to have been composed at various times, certain particulars evidently being much later than others.

The time of the arrival is not definitely fixed. But it was to be soon, for verse 34 says, "I tell you truly the present generation will not pass away till all this happens." According to Renan, an expectation of the speedy coming of the end of the world was quite common at the time of the supposed Christ. So people would be easily caught by the doctrine. And it would be better policy to claim that the Day of Wrath was near but not to fix the exact date.

In Matthew xvi, it runs: "I tell you truly, there are some of those standing here who will not taste death till they see the Son of man coming himself to reign."

Before the high priest, Jesus said to his questioner, "In future you will see the Son of man seated at the right hand of power and coming in the clouds of heaven."

"Matthew" gets mixed up in his quotation, chap. xxvii, 9, 10. He attributes the saying to the wrong prophet, besides distorting it to suit his purpose. He says the money was given for the Potter's field, but in Zechariah xi, 12, 13, the prophet casts his wages unto the potter in the house of Jehovah. Matthew, the Jew, seems to have been but poorly versed in the Hebrew scriptures. Inspired men can lie without limit.

When the risen Jesus went soaring up skyward to that beautiful world on top of the firmament, why did he not take his disciples along? We find the answer in John xiv, 2, 3: "In my Father's house there are many abodes; were it not so, would I have told you I was going to prepare a place for you? And when I go and prepare a place for you, I will come back and take you to be with me, as that you may be where I am."

So we see that he had to go on ahead and clean house and maybe build a new dormitory or something. But he's been a long time at it. Heaven must be a small place, if it wouldn't hold eleven folks more without so much preparation.

Ernest Renan says that as time passed and men died and the "arrival" did not come to pass, doubts arose. But the apostle John survived to a great age, and it was thought he was being kept alive to verify the words of Jesus, that Jesus would surely come before the death of John. However, John died and Jesus had not come.

In the last chapter of the fourth Gospel, evidently a late addition to the book, an attempt is made to reconcile away this tradition. This must have been written after the death of John.

In this chapter the latter part of verse 24, unless it is a late interpolation, shows that the book is a forgery, in part at least.

Matthew says that Judas "flung down the silver pieces in the temple and went and hung himself." This is hard on the man who brought about the salvation of Christians. But "Peter" is more vindictive yet. He says, "With the money paid him for his crime, he purchased an estate; but swelling up he burst in two and all his bowels poured out—a fact known to all the residents in Jerusalem, so that the estate got the name, in their language, of Akeldamach or the Ground of Blood."

But Matthew says the priests took the money and bought with it the Potter's Field to serve as a burying place for strangers.

In many places in the various epistles of the New Testament are references to the second advent as an event then about to take place. "And then you know what this crisis means, you know it is high time to waken up; for salvation is nearer to us now than when we first believed. It is far on in the night, the day is almost here" (Rom. xiii, 12). In his advice concerning marrying, Paul says (1 Cor. vii), "The interval has been shortened; so let those who have wives live as though they had none, . . . for the present phase of things is passing away."

In 1 Cor. xii, we find, "It was written down for the purpose of instructing us whose lot has been cast in the closing hours of the world." In Philippians iv, 5, "The Lord is at hand." 1 Thess. iv, "For we tell you as the Lord has told us, that we the living, who survive till the Lord comes, are by no means to take precedence of those who have fallen asleep. The Lord himself will descend from heaven with a loud summons, when the archangel calls and the trumpet of God sounds; the dead in Christ will rise first; then we the living, who survive, will be caught up along with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, and so we will be with the Lord forever. Now, then, encourage one another with these words." And in 2 Thess. i, the writer tells the persecuted what will happen to their persecutors on the Day of Wrath. He also finds it politic to postpone the arrival of that day somewhat. Hebrews i, 1, 2: "Many were the forms and fashions in which God spoke of old to our fathers by the prophets, but in these days at the end he has spoken to us by a Son." Hebr. x, 25: "Let us consider how to stir up one another to love and good deeds, not ceasing to meet together as is the habit of some, but admonishing one another, all the more so as you see the Day coming near." And in verse 37: "For in a little, a very little now, the coming One will arrive without delay." In Hebr. xii, 22: "You have come to mount Zion, the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, to myriads of angels in festal gathering." In 1 John ii, we find, "The world is passing away with its desire," and, "Children, it is the last hour." 1 Peter iv, 1: "Now the end of all is near. Steady then, keep cool and pray!"

The book of Revelation treats also of the speedy coming of the "Lord." In chapter i, 7, we find: "Lo, he is coming on the clouds, to be seen by every eye, even by those who impaled him." At the close of this book Jesus is represented as saying by his angel, "I am coming very soon."

Dr. Moffatt's free, modernized translation of 2 Peter iii, 3-14, is very interesting:

"To begin with you know that mockers will come with their mockeries in the last days, men who go by their own passions, asking, 'Where is His promised advent? Since the day our fathers fell asleep, things remain exactly as they were from the beginning of creation.' They willfully ignore the fact that heavens existed long ago, and an earth which the word of God formed of water and by water. By water the then-existing world was deluged and destroyed, but the present heavens and earth are treasured up by the same word for fire, reserved for the day when the impious are doomed and destroyed. Beloved, you must not ignore this one fact, that with the Lord a single day is like a thousand years, and a thousand years are like a single day. The Lord is not slow with what he promises, according to certain people's idea of slowness; no, he is long-suffering for your sake, he does not wish any to perish but all to betake them to repentance. The day of the Lord will come like a thief, when the heavens will vanish with crackling roar, the stars will be set ablaze and melt, the earth and all its works will disappear. Now as all things are thus to be dissolved, what holy and pious men ought you to be in your behavior, you who expect and hasten the advent of the Day of God, which dissolves the heavens in fire, and makes the stars blaze and melt! It is new heavens and a new earth that we expect as He has promised, and in them dwells righteousness. Then, beloved, as you are expecting this, be eager to be found by him unblemished and unspotted in serene assurance."

Reading in Dr. Moffatt's translation, I chanced upon a suggestive passage in the first chapter of 2 Peter. The writer says, "No prophetic scripture allows a man to interpret it by himself." And farther on, "There will be false teachers who will insinuate destructive heresies, even disowning the Lord who ransomed them."

And I suspect that when this was written "Peter" and his brother propagandists were having trouble with certain ones learned in the Hebrew scriptures who were exposing the frauds that Christian missionaries were working by means of wrongly interpreted prophecies and isolated fragments of Hebrew literature that were not prophecies at all. So the writer of 2 Peter denies the right of individual interpretation of prophecy. One must have the "spirit" in order to understand prophecy. As our little Dr. Sunday said of the unbeliever: "He cannot understand the Bible. He must first get converted and receive the spirit."

Surely our Christian friends must have this "spirit." Something ails them. But it must be the spirit of stupidity or intellectual crookedness that causes them to see in any Bible passage whatever meaning they wish to see no matter what meaning may be clearly expressed.

Discussing Sir Oliver Lodge's recent book, "Raymond; or Life and Death," the London Christian Commonwealth says, "One's first impression of the book can only be expressed in this antithesis; it is either a simple, straightforward record of events that have actually occurred, or it is the story of a great scientist's credulity and self-deception."

And Hermione says: "Dear Sir Oliver Lodge has been proving some more things quite recently, you know. How any one could doubt a man with such a lovely head and face I can't imagine!"

Says the London Evening Standard (as quoted in the Literary Digest): "As the communications [from the spirit of Raymond] proceed, he grows happier. In one passage placed by Sir Oliver Lodge under the heading of 'Unverifiable Matter,' he speaks of going to a 'gorgeous place' which he describes as the Highest Sphere. The full account Sir Oliver omits; 'until the case for survival is fully established, it is thought improper and unwise to relate an experience of the kind which may be imagined.' But something is given. 'I felt exalted,' says the supposititious speaker, 'purified, lifted up. I was kneeling. I couldn't stand. Mother, I thrilled from head to foot. He didn't come near me, and I didn't feel I wanted to go near him. Didn't feel I ought. The Voice was like a bell. I can't tell you what he was dressed or robed in. All seemed a mixture of shining colors.'"

This is about as intelligible as one of the ancient Greek oracles, but will help Sir Oliver's book to sell. As drowning men grasp at straws, supernaturalists of all sorts will take pains to see that the book is put into public libraries, and its author will be claimed as the greatest of all scientists and a fine Christian besides.

Somehow or other the mediums couldn't fool Huxley. He had more than a touch of Goethe's "thätige Skepsis." But some scientists seem to be credulous as old Cotton Mather himself.

However, there may be a method in Sir Oliver's madness. PHILLO.

Recollections and Prophecies.

George Bernard Shaw used to be in the mind of radicals before the war, but soon are the mighty forgotten. H. G. Wells forged to the front as a fearless writer, and then fell back to preaching a Wellsian God. Some scientist—what! Ernst Haeckel, author and solver of the riddle of the universe, found the little riddle of war too much for him and shrank to provincial proportions, becoming as Germanophile as old Doc Carus himself. Two monists, one materialistic, the other idealistic, meeting on the common ground of licking men of a different opinion from their own!

O novelists, dramatists and philosophers, what stupidities are committed by men of that name!

Joseph McCabe, the English radical and Free-thinker, finds that Chicago is the center of Rationalism in America. Yet if we were to name a successor to Ingersoll, we'd be pretty hard put to it, wouldn't we, in Chicago or elsewhere?

Henry George was a great American and commanded an immense following. His land theory is somewhat fantastic, yet the motive behind it was love of humanity. That will excuse a greater error than his.

Ibsen refashioned the drama and helped unshackle the chains binding woman to the old conventions and superstitions. He is another who has had no successor. Tolstoy was a fit fellow artist, not quite so sane as Ibsen, but of almost as great an influence. Tolstoy stood for freedom and justice, the same as George, whose disciple he was.

Let me whisper that the day of giants has gone forever. Christianity is dead; Darwin killed that snake. Patriotism is dead; the kaiser made that ridiculous and even murderous. We are all Atheists, all Anarchists nowadays. In other words, we are free from priest and politician. There is one common enemy left and that is "Capitalism." Marx gave that the death wound; the brute is in the last throes; his death lingers but is nigh.

Capitalism is the system that places meat and drink first in the scheme of things. For that reason it is superior to prior systems, which placed the soul's salvation first, and let the body go hang. What really is first is intellectual freedom. That is always worth a battle. Yet when we look back and forwards, we do not discover multitudes struggling for this jewel. The mob seems to prefer belly comforts to mental ones; it is always willing to sell its birthright for a mess of pottage. Rockefeller is the ideal of the masses as well as of the classes. All would be Rockefellers if they could, save the saving remnant, which really prefers the joys of intellectual converse to the comforts of the flesh. The wants of the animal can be limited to very little; the wants of the imagination are illimitable.

The artist is the one who is courageous enough to live boldly in the stream of the times; he is strong enough to keep his head out of water and to see what is going on around him; he is joyous enough to want to picture what he sees for his own amusement and the amusement of others. There are few of such fellows. They are scarcer than hens' teeth; yet without them the world would be but a humdrum affair. For while men of science would keep on inventing airy trifles that would serve to knit men closer together, they would do nothing towards making them understand each other better. Let the whole world speak the same language, it would still be in darkness, if the small voice of the artist did not make itself heard in the void to explain in creative figures what life was all about. Homer, Dante, Shakespeare, Goethe are still the world's great men with none to challenge their eminence. They were the first of their nations to paint their brothers in the stirring fight to found new dynasties. Greece, Rome, England and Germany owe what they are to these four seers. Greece and Rome were but are not; the same fate hangs over Germany. Shakespeare will finally conquer them all. He was the most universal poet of the lot; he sang of humanity rather than of a state. Homer's gods were warriors; Dante's, devils; Goethe's, women; Shakespeare's, men.

If I were to place a fifth poet beside these four it would be no other than Darwin, whose influence and thought revolutionized the world. Since Darwin, reason has come into her own; and that explains the lightning-like progress of the last fifty or sixty years. Mankind reasoning is more glorious than mankind at war. The present little disturbance is the battle of the dead over the question of which nation will have the largest tombstone. Labor will go on relying on its new-found weapons of direct action, sabotage and solidarity, the general and local strike, balloting on the job and make more advancement in a decade now than in a century formerly.

The task of the scientist is to forge weapons for labor to emancipate itself with; the desire of the artist is to register in striking form the steps of the emancipation. The pleasure we take in old prints is because they enable us to see at a glance how far we have advanced from our ancestors. R. E. D. South Bend, Indiana.

Gods and Heroes—A Summary.

In ancient times people used to have a plurality of gods and goddesses. They also had heroes. If a leader led a band of his people against a band of people who happened to be living on the other side of an imaginary line, and he succeeded in killing or enslaving those people, he became a hero.

Murder was almost as heroic then as it is now. These heroes, being a superior people, intermarried with the gods, and lo! we have a troupe of half-castes, half god and half men. The home of these gods was usually on the top of the highest mountain in the vicinity. In the case of the Greeks, it was Mt. Olympus.

Now in those days, as at the present time, there were foolhardy radicals who wanted to prove everything. So they took a hike up Mt. Olympus and found that there were no gods or god-houses there. So that naturally not only put the gods out of a home but took away their occupation, and their story is handed down to us under the name of mythology.

Now, as we all know, Moses was raised by the Pharaohs and educated at the Egyptian court. Being thus far better educated than the other Jews in Egypt, he became the natural leader of the Jews and was elected to lead them out of that land. Moses knew that he could not lead them far without a god to follow. People in those days were accustomed to have gods to follow, as nowadays they follow flags. Therefore Moses made them a god, whom he called Jehovah and located him on Mt. Sinai. Later, remembering what happened to those Grecian deities by keeping them where people could reach them, he put his away up in the sky, and he became the unknown and unknowable god. He remains there, unknown and unknowable, and it is presumed that he lives still in the self-same spot, unless he has moved down to lower regions to get a better view of the Christian armies murdering each other by the millions. M. W. CONNOR.

Though the seasons of man full of losses
Make empty the years full of youth,
If but one thing be constant in crosses,
Change lays not her hand upon truth;
Hopes die, and their tombs are for token
That the grief as the joy of them ends,
Ere time that breaks all men has broken
The faith between friends.

Heaven could not be heaven eternally with one human life, lived well, left out.

Does not liberty for man mean the death of the hidden monarchy of Roman Catholicism as well as the end of the German empire and other autocracies?

The reason that the world is covered with cheap, ignorant, superstitious humans is because these humans have stuck to the church. You who wish to perpetuate the sorrow, the misery, the poverty, the dirt, that covers the earth, stick to the church. Wherever the church is supreme man isn't worth much.

We say to our fellow-citizens of Roman Catholic faith: If you wish to save everything that will save this nation and make you better men and women and better citizens of this nation, read the books and papers which your priests condemn and forbid you to read. Be something besides Roman Catholics, that is being not much of anything.

Purgatory has made more money for the Roman Catholic church than ever did petroleum for John D. Rockefeller. There is petroleum but there is not a purgatory. Purgatory is in the pocket of Roman Catholicism. It is a word invented to get the money out of the poor, ignorant dupes who believe in it. Purgatory is an idea, nothing more, and a cheap, dirty, contemptible idea. Religion has evolved nothing lower, baser, rottener than the idea of a purgatory.

April 8th was what is called "Easter Sunday," but only the churches observed it. If a man stayed at home and minded his own business he knew nothing of this day, for there were no signs of it being in the sky as displayed by Nature anywhere. "What fools these mortals (Christians) be"! Jesus never came out of his tomb, for he was never put into it. This foolish notion of a resurrection is a lie told by the church; a dramatic incident in a divine tragedy which happened on paper.

Saving souls is nothing more or less than getting men and women, girls and boys, into Christian churches. No minister is trying to show that man has a soul, or that there is anything to save the soul from hereafter. The work of salvation, so-called, is really forcing a lot of superstition upon emotional people who are made to believe that they are "saved" when they accept these superstitions. And this is religion! All we can say is that it is better than burning and hanging and quartering heretics.

What is there in Christianity that is true? Is there anything? Everything that I know of that is Christian is false. To begin with, the word Christ does not fit the head of Jesus nor of anybody who has lived since the time of Jesus. It is, to the mind of Rationalists, a word of no meaning. There never was a Christ, and never any necessity for a Christ since the defeat of the Jews by the Roman soldiers. The word "Christ" was coined out of the Hebrew superstition that God would come to the rescue of his chosen people. He never came, and he never will come. L. K. W.

The Tendency to Good.

There are people forever commenting on the decadence of things—of manners, of customs, of the world in general: as if decay was not essential to all progress, to all renewal. It nurtures the seed and sustains the plant. The decadence of the institution is indeed the main hope of society. One says the apples are not so fine as when he was a boy, Ah, friend, 'tis not the apple that falls short, but you. The apple renews with the spring, but you know no renewal. The zest, the appetite, the optimism of boyhood have long forsaken you. Your barren eye sees a barren earth; your dwindling hope, your waning trust, sees all things dwindle and wane. And so the apples are not so large as once, nor manners so good, nor maids so fair, nor friends so true. Come, renew, and the old world will renew with you—apples shall be as fine as of old and all things good with a new goodness.

Still others lament the decline in the influence of the classic past. What, then, is classic save truth, and for that matter the sun, and the wind, and the rain? These do not decline. Truth is ever new. The ancients had their day; shall we not have ours? What, then, is the desideratum? Not solely to admire the classic, but to create the classic. And if in our deference to the musty past we create no new classic, it is the tendency to good that shall carry us out of the fatal miasma of the past and give us health and vigor to build anew. It is this process that calls forth the lament.

Foremost of lamentations is over the manifest decadence of religion. There is a wailing round about the crumbling walls of a creed that has served its day: much as certain of the Hebrews' wail before those few stones—all that are left of the ancient walls of Jerusalem. A sorry spectacle, these faithful Hebrews, with their antique garb, their drooping curls, beating their venerable breasts and wringing their hands for a day that is gone—waiting and watching for the impossible and the inexpedient, for the day that is gone will never return—neither for Jew nor Gentile. The tendency to good bids us welcome the abandonment of creeds and the "higher criticism"; bids us open our arms to the heretic and the liberal, to the Freethinker and Agnostic, one and all, as the heralds of the dawn of a wiser and a better experience.

This tendency, working throughout every man's life, bids him choose constantly between one and another means or end; bids him often renounce—and thence come the hardships. But if he will not heed—will not renounce—there is friction, disappointment, and what not; and he says life is hard and things are all askew. "The good is one thing, the pleasant another; these two, having different objects, chain a man. It is well with him who clings to the good; he who chooses the pleasant misses his end."

There is so much inharmony, so much friction in our lives that we are oppressed sometimes to the point of suffocation, and say there is not air to breathe—that life is only tolerable for the rich or for royalty. We cannot see that kings die of fright and the rich for something real to do.

But a wise view of our discontent shows here as well the tendency to good working throughout individual and national aims. When we must be driven, friction is often the lash. Out of it came at last a revolt that led to the American commonwealth. Out of it, too, came, the downfall of Russian autocracy, with a prophecy of a like upheaval in other European nations. There is a significance in events; believe in it, and wait. All things show a tendency to good to them who love the truth.

The Religions of India.

India has the reputation of being the cradle of religions, which means that many religions have been born there. A French writer named Jacoliot professed to have found the original of most of the Christian-Jewish Bible there, but not all of his conclusions are accepted and approved nowadays. India has produced its own sacred books, and they resemble the Bible only in those teachings and the relation of myths common to all religions. There are the Vedas, the Puranas, the Tripitaka, Upanishads, Tantras, and so on.

Few countries have produced more than one durable religion. America and the highly civilized countries of Europe have produced none. America has not even a saint. India has produced three religions that are still in working order—Hinduism, Buddhism and Jainism; and it has imported two live ones, Mohammedanism and Parseeism. Add Christianity, which is said to have a million followers, and India has six religions in practice.

Hinduism is the religion of caste, or Brahminism, whose adherents are not converted to Christianity. It is an aristocratic cult, dividing the people into four grades or castes—the priests, the soldiers, including kings; the farmers and the serfs. This religion affirms a supreme being, Brahm, who created the universe, and like other religions, it has had subordinate gods or sons of God to act as mediators.

Jainism, named after Jina, a native reformer, is an ascetic cult much in favor with the middle class, and numbers a million followers. The Jains never purposely nor carelessly kill anything; their conservatism regarding the destruction of living things, even infected rats, has served to perpetuate the bubonic plague.

Buddha, or Siddhartha Gautama, the best known of Hindu reformers has the largest following. His religion has been called the Protestantism of India, while Brahminism represents Catholicism. Buddha, as interpreted, taught the extinction of human desires and ambitions, whereby absorption into a state of unconscious existence called Nirvana was to be attained. The Buddhists, doing away with caste, hold to the brotherhood not only of man but of all life. Celibacy and Monasticism are features of Buddhism. It connects with Brahminism by way of Vishnu, one of the Brahmin Trinity, who is supposed to have been incarnated in Buddha.

Of the imported religions, Parseeism, or Zoroastrianism, is said to be the cleanest both as to body and mind. Parseeism is from Persia. Almost exterminated when the Mohammedans conquered that country, a remnant still survived and found refuge in India. The other alien faith among the Hindus, Mohammedanism, would have overrun the empire and established itself by force had not the English taken possession and protected the adherents of other cults. As it is, sixty-three millions of the three hundred million population acknowledge the Prophet Mohammed, being twenty times more numerous than the Christians.

In the Open Court for March, Mr. William Alanson Borden has an article on the religions of India, which may be recommended to all students of religion. He says that missionary work by both Catholics and Protestants has been carried on in India for more than four centuries, and has converted only one per cent. of the population.

The success of Mohammedanism is not accounted for wholly by its system of making converts by force. It beats Christianity on making promises. As an instance, it guarantees that one of the faithful who dies fighting for his religion shall go unhindered to paradise, while Christianity makes no such agreement; and furthermore the hero is promised the everlasting possession of numerous hours, with retained powers of perpetually enjoying their companionship. As is well known, Mohammedanism is a sort of reformed Judaism, with an admixture of eastern Christianity, and had its rise fourteen hundred years ago while Christians were fighting over the question of the Trinity, one God or three.

We get it from Mr. Borden's article that Islam teaches the one God; that he alone is the object of worship, and that, since he is the all-wise ruler of the universe, there must be no murmuring at his decrees, and one's life must be put unreservedly into his hands. Like other religions, Mohammedanism has its heavenly host of angels, archangels and saints. Like Christianity and Jainism it teaches a personal and conscious future life, to which every soul may attain by its own individual efforts. It repudiates the idea of vicarious atonement, while with Christianity and Parseeism it teaches the resurrection of the dead and a day of judgment. Some trace of old ancestor worship is seen in the Islamic belief that the spirits of the dead remain near their tombs until the general resurrection. Concerning the Moslem system of ethics, they took the ethics of their age, just as all other religions did.

In India the Mohammedans fraternize with their Hindu neighbors so far as the caste prejudices of the latter allow, and they even recognize Moses, Jesus and Buddha as prophets, but they believe, naturally, that Mohammed brought the latest commands. There is no caste system among them nor a regular priesthood. All converts are received into full religious and social fellowship; thus Islam offers large inducements to the depressed castes of the Hindus or to the socially ostracized of other faiths.

Despite the assumed tolerance of Mohammedanism, it is believed that were England to withdraw, India would become a Mohammedan nation.

In considering the causes of India's stagnation and the depressed state of her people it might prove enlightening to inquire whether the various brands of Asiatic mildew with which they are afflicted may not have had an influence in keeping them in the dark.

Free Speech Gone.

We communicated the other day with Theodore Schroeder, Esq., counsel for the Free Speech League, with a view to retaining him to defend Freethought open-air speakers, arrested on one pretext or another and fined and threatened with prison sentences if they are heard from again. Mr. Schroeder regretted to say it was now impossible for him to do anything in such cases. The first reason is that Mr. Schroeder's time and strength are fully employed with the Mockus blasphemy case, on which there is still much work to be done; and the second is that the courts have adopted the subterfuge of trying the defendant on a question of fact—that of obstructing the streets, or causing a "blockade." Thus is entirely obscured any principle of free speech which may be involved. An acquittal would be no vindication of the right of free speech, but would merely allow the speaker to return to his post not a whit less liable to rearrest and continued persecution.

A stand might be taken on the theory laid down by Leonard Abbott that as traffic in ideas is of more importance than traffic in commodities, the expounder of opinion has the first right to our thoroughfares; but would any court listen to the argument? They listen to nothing nowadays in such cases except for the applause of a war-inspired press when they seize the occasion of the prosecution of a pacifist to make a verbal display of their own patriotism.

The courts so far have lacked the courage to announce that freedom of speech will be suspended if persons charged with exercising it are brought before them; but they prove their intent by their acts, and every open-air speaker knows that he faces a six months' sentence to the workhouse if some prejudiced policeman or lying witness accuses him.

It would be impossible for any single attorney, of however great ability, to rescue freedom of speech in New York, for it is gone already. Our speakers are suppressed because to speak is to gather a crowd and invite arrest on the charge, generally false, of obstructing traffic.

The Press Aroused at Last.

Resolutions declaring that the censorship provision of the government's espionage bill "is an assault upon the very foundation of our free institutions, freedom of thought and freedom of speech," have been adopted by the Publishers' Association of New York city. The resolutions assert that "the proposed legislation is drastic and indefinite in its terms and uncertain in its import, and no one can foresee what its consequences might be."

That is a criticism which advocates of freedom of press, speech and mails have been making for the past forty years on existing laws—laws that have put men in jail for "blasphemy," for "incendiary speech," for discussing marriage or sex questions, economics and government, birth control and industrial unrest. These matters affected radical writers and speakers. Now, we conclude, the espionage and censorship are to enter the domain of the conservative publishers and take away their business and liberty by denying their right to report and criticise the acts of the administration. So they tell us in their resolutions:

"Serious results are sure to follow any effort to suspend the constitutional guarantee of a free press and of free speech. The liberty of the press within existing laws governing treason is the nation's greatest asset, and never so much as at a time like this, when it stands as the one great safeguard of the people.

"The American people are entitled to a full, free and frank statement of all that occurs, whether it be good or bad. They must have confidence that they are getting the truth. There can be no justification for a restriction that abridges the liberties of the press."

All this is an old story to radicals, but we are glad to see it getting a circulation that the radicals, who wrote it first, have not been able to give it. Freedom of the press by all means, and as much freedom for matter the Publishers' Association does not handle as for any other!

Music and the Dance.

An amusing reply is made to an indignant lady by the editor of the New York Journal (April 24). The lady, who is Florence Sanford, has been shocked because in a popular restaurant she saw the guests dancing to the tune of the "Star Spangled Banner," the tempo of which had been adapted to the fox trot.

Very soberly Mr. Brisbane, the editor, in his comment, points out to Miss Sanford that although it might be difficult to stand up and look patriotic while our national anthem is being played in fox-trot time, yet, on the other hand, "dancing even to sacred music is not considered disrespectful." Proof: We must not forget that the great King David himself, so well beloved of the Lord, danced before the sacred Ark of the Covenant.

The text (2 Sam. vi, 14) is: "And David danced before the Lord with all his might; and David was girded with a linen ephod."

The tune to which David performed the fox trot of his day is admittedly unknown; "perhaps he simply whistled and hummed, and danced to his own whistling. At the same time he was accompanying the ark, in his eyes the most sacred religious object in the world. The priests with him were perhaps chanting or intoning some very highly respected musical composition—in which case he danced to that."

An ephod is part of the toggery of a high priest, so that David danced in a sacred garment, whether to sacred music or not.

It is noted, as of possible interest to Miss Sanford, that Michal, a daughter of Saul, who had a window seat for the exhibition David was providing, "saw King David leaping and dancing before the Lord; and she despised him in her heart." The "Lord" was some object inside the Ark, the same being a box on wheels, and David probably did his dance at the head of the procession as it entered the city.

The Journal does not venture to tell the whole sacred tale. What Michal said to David when she met him was this: "How glorious was the king of Israel today, who uncovered himself today in the eyes of the handmaids of his servants, as one of the vain fellows shamelessly uncovereth himself!" The ephod consists only of a flap over the chest and another down the back, and perhaps that was all David had on. As for the king, he gloried in the show he had made of himself, and promised to do worse: "I will yet be more vile than thus."

Saul's daughter did not complain of a mere dance, on such an occasion, but of the indecency of the performer's costume. So if fox trotting to the "Star Spangled Banner" is going to be justified by the precedent of David dancing to probably sacred music, the scant apparel of some modern dancers is at the same time approved; and critics of costume should take warning, for Michal did not escape punishment for inveighing against dancing in a state approaching the nude. See the last verse of the chapter relating this inspired narrative (2 Sam. vi, 23): "Therefore Michal, the daughter of Saul, had no child unto the day of her death." The penalty was greater than that inflicted upon Bathsheba, who was unfaithful to her husband, David being the correspondent, yet she bore children and became the ancestress of Jesus Christ—thus being rewarded rather than reproved.

David is a most hazardous and questionable authority on morals, manners and etiquette, for his offenses against all three were numerous; and we doubt that his example will reconcile the patriotic Miss Sanford to seeing cabaret frequenters doing the fox trot to our national anthem in mutilated tempo.

Our TRUTH SEEKER Sunday Special and Revival Extra, which attained a circulation of 17,000 in a few days, is hospitably received where truth is welcome. Mr. Thomas Seltzer of this city, the accomplished translator of Haeckel and Ostwald, writes to the editor, thanking him for his work "in behalf of decency, sanity, and common sense," as follows:

"Let me congratulate you on your Billy Sunday issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is a work that should have been done by somebody, and you have done it well. It will not make as much noise as Sunday, and its appeal, I am afraid, will be only to the decent, intelligent elements. Still it will do good, and those people who succumb to the lure of Billy Sunday and his ilk are, I suppose, beyond the reach of the methods and the arguments that you or I would consent to employ."

Mr. Seltzer has stated the difficulty of reaching "those people who succumb to the lure of Billy Sunday" and his kind. They are not amenable to an appeal to decency, sanity and common sense. They are accessible only by methods allied to those of the evangelist. The person who swears by Billy Sunday could be separated from his allegiance by anyone who should be able to do a more grotesque contortion act while preaching, leap upon a higher pulpit twice as often, invent new familiarities with deity and fresh vulgarities in the interpretation of scripture, manufacture a few surpassing lies, go deeper into the gutter, spend longer hours in acquiring a barroom vocabulary, and come to the surface with terms more offensively malodorous than "dirty," "rotten," and "stinking," which are now commonplace through daily use by the evangelist. The Billy Sunday recruit must have his ignorance flattered at the expense of the "highbrows." He wants to be assured that knowledge and scholarship conflicting with his crude and conceited guesses is of no account. He would quit a lesser faker only for a greater one. He admires the ability of the knock-about soul-saver to get into the money, and, in comparison, would despise an unselfish non-mercenary as a piker. Rationalism knows no approach to this class of mind, and no self-respecting Rationalist would use it if he did. No one would go into a wallow after a hog simply for the sake of enjoying the hog's society or claiming him as a brother.

A few weeks ago we quoted a paragraph from Thomas Paine's introduction to his pamphlet "Common Sense," written in February, 1776. Mr. Robert H. Lanyon, a Chicago reader, passed it along to the Evening Post of his city, and on the second day of April, 1917, it appeared in a panel at the head of the editorial page of that paper. It reminds one of the stone that became "the head of the corner," only in this case the builders did not reject it—that is, the builders of America and the United States. It lay at the foundation of our government, and is still a good support.

The patriotism of Archbishop Ireland of St. Paul and Bishop Golrick of Duluth manifests itself by their calling upon the secretary of war at Washington and pledging their co-operation to furnish the new army with chaplains. We understand that our military men are to take counsel of General Joffre, the great field marshal of France, now in America. Joffre puts the priests in the ranks and makes soldiers of them.

The Y. M. C. A., taking advantage of the war excitement, is calling for three million dollars to equip secretaries for army work. The actor Nat Willis says that to a certain evangelist the initials Y. M. C. A. mean "You Must Come Across." The same interpretation seems to be put upon the symbols by the fellows that wear them.

RELIGION IN THE UNITED STATES

Joseph McCabe of England Reports Upon It to the London "Literary Guide."

The articles which I have contributed to these columns [the Literary Guide] during the last ten years have been written under very varying circumstances. I have written, shirt-sleeved, in the soaking heat of tropical seas; written in American trains while the glass registered without thirty degrees of frost; written on the summit of gum-clad ranges in Australia and amidst tree-fern groves on the New Zealand coast; written in the smoking rooms of liners, the commercial rooms of dingy British hotels, the marble and gilt (too gilt) halls of American hotels, the cottages of miners, and so on. But I never yet found so eerie a perch from which to conduct my study of human natural history, which is the fundamental pursuit of my life, as that in which I now write.

I sit at a window on the eleventh floor of a New York hotel. It is a modest elevation for New York, yet it encourages the philosophic habit. Down there in Broadway, a score of yards away, or even in the vestibule of the hotel, the kaleidoscope of this seething life is bewildering. I walked down Broadway at half-past one this morning, after a long night at the Authors' Club; yet "the Great White Way" was as white as ever, and almost as noisy. Every café, every restaurant, every weird type of eating and drinking house, was busy. The trolley trundled along, and the elevated train thundered like a super-Zeppelin, and the busy workers beneath one's feet blasted the new artery for this teeming, ceaseless traffic. It is as oppressive as it is fascinating. One is, in New York, caught in a whirlpool of energy, enterprise, originality, laughing confidence, and almost juvenile joyousness. You must rise high, until the roar becomes a rumble and the figures on the streets become like the crawling beetles of these superheated rooms, before you can understand. Skyscrapers promote metaphysics, the true metaphysics. You do not look up into the vague forms of the clouds, as the old metaphysicians have ever done, but down upon the world you have quitted. It spreads out far on every side, a sea of brick and roof, soaring here and there into great crests of waves or water-spouts of masonry that seem to defy gravity. And along the thin veins of streets move the black figures, the puny ants, that have built this strangest centre of the human race.

The question of the place of religion in the life of this bustling, progressive, very secular people is not merely one of peculiar relevance to these columns. It is, sociologically or psychologically, one of the most interesting aspects of their life. They have such grip of earth that one wonders if they are even tempted to peer into the heavens. Anxious sky-searching, one feels, may suit the unhappy consumptives who linger among the blackened ruins of Belgium or the pale-faced and dwindling Poles. When earth is desolate man's instinctive thirst for happiness looks elsewhere. An American clergyman once sent me a book of his entitled "One World at a Time." That, you feel, must be the attitude of New York. Down in those gray patches of low buildings, where the poor huddle together as in few other cities of the world, perhaps men dream of God, but one wonders what these other folk care about religion and heaven.

Yet religion is a mighty power, it seems, in America. Mr. Percy Ward, who has taken firm root in Chicago and does good work there, just sends me a list of his lectures. "Will the Catholic Church Conquer America?" is one of his latest subjects. The suggestion is amazing. Further south, in Mexico, which has taken the place of the "wild west" as a symbol of savagery, the church is being restricted. In the more distant south, among the Spanish-American republics, the clergy fight a desperate and losing battle. In no country of Europe has the Church of Rome the least prospect of regaining lost ground. Yet men assure me that here the Catholic clergy have a remarkable confidence that they will some day subdue this vigorous and restless and mighty population, and rumors of "the growth of Romanism" flutter the electric nerves of the cities.

There is no growth of Romanism, when one takes account of the growth of population. To decide such an issue one must, as in England, close one's ears to the man who concernedly assures you that in his district or city, at all events, the Church of Rome is gaining. Movement and growth of population, skillfully misrepresented by a priesthood which has the American genius for advertising, account for these apparent triumphs. Contrary to a crude general opinion, statistics never lie; they leave that to statisticians of the propagandist order. The Church of Rome is as steadily losing ground in America as in Europe. But that it does not lose ground more rapidly, that it continues to hold millions of alert and educated American citizens as well as millions of illiterate Italians and Poles, is certainly amazing. And the comparative success of the Church of Rome is equalled by other denominations. I would not say that New York is less irreligious than London. The precise figures for comparison are wanting. From observation on the Sabbath I should say that a census here would yield the same result as in London: one man in ten and one woman in five go to church on Sundays. But it is to me strange that even one man in ten in such a city can endure the antique and insincere rhetoric of the clergy.

Some of the signs of increasing religious life in the United States which are hailed in the religious press of England are indications of what might be compared to the genial art of "salting" mines. The pious British shareholder who takes a stake in heaven on that security is to be pitied. I refer to such phenomena as the "Billy Sunday" revival services.

Readers of the Guide have more than once been instructed about this clerical portent, and I do not propose to reproduce passages from his lurid sermons. Throughout all his progress—from "Billy" to "Mr.," and now "the Rev. Dr. Sunday"—he retains his baseball dialect and his enormous success. He is probably aware that the latter will last just as long as the former; and, if they eventually create an archbishopric for him in America, the archiepiscopal voice will still thunder at Infidels and sinners in a slightly expurgated version of the language of the Bowery. The audacity piques America, which loves audacity and originality; and, as I gather, for I have never seen him, it is supported by a glow of magnetic energy, a kind of barbaric eloquence, which would ensure him an audience if his theme were bimetalism instead of theology.

There is, however, another aspect of the matter. On the day of my arrival here the preacher ended a ten weeks' series of revival services in Boston. On the following day even the New York Herald, most respectable of journals, reported the issue. It is, in fact, one of the puzzling features of this city that the Monday press serves up the relics of the Sunday's ecclesiastical joints with such liberality. In type which dwarfs the headings of its reports of battles in Europe, the Herald tells its shuddering readers that on the previous day the Rev. Dr. Frank Oliver Hall has assured New York that there is "no flaming hell or golden heaven." In the next column a Rev. Mr. Schermerhorn is reported as replying to "Billy." It appears that the great linguist, inebriated by his success in "cultured" Boston, jumped upon a chair and shouted to his audience (twenty thousand Bostonians): "Where is the Infidel this side of hell that could have packed this tabernacle as I have packed it for nine weeks past?" That is Billy's little way. And the Rev. Schermerhorn, a Unitarian (which Billy calls "Infidel") and a professor of philosophy, descends into the arena and has ten rounds with Billy. "Only one out of septillions saved from hell and taken to heaven forever," the scare headlines tell you.

In the centre of the page, fitly typed and starred, is the record of Billy's final effort at Boston. Sixty thousand people attended his last services, and a hundred thousand failed to get admission. The statistics multiply. At the final service 2,156 persons "hit the trail" or "passed along the sawdust paths." The total attendance during the ten weeks was 1,320,000, and—Billy received a check for $50,828 (£10,000). On succeeding days further figures were given; the total number of "trail-hitters" (repentant sinners and Infidels), the number of men and women recovered for the various sects, and so on. Within a few more days the press was describing the preparations for the next campaign at Buffalo. Reporters described, as if they were house agents, the domicile carefully selected for Billy and "Ma" Sunday. The lady who made his pies was delineated. There was actually "a cheerful fire in the grate." The train containing Billy and the Imperial suite was especially arranged to run into the depot at track No. 1, "in order that Dr. Sunday need not enter the subway." The police, on horse and foot, would control the welcoming crowd. [I happened to be in Buffalo station, starting for New York, at the minute advertised for the august arrival, and there were not a hundred people in the vestibule of the station.] The commissioners of health had gravely requested Billy's officers to dispense with "the Chautauqua salute" (an insinuating waving of ten thousand handkerchiefs) at the inaugural service, and they had refused. And so on. "The press has been mighty kind to me," said

Billy to an interviewer on leaving Boston. "It has given me advertising that I could not have purchased for two million dollars." Exactly. Half the success is due to what is here called "publicity business." Probably the most important member of the imperial suite is not the lady who makes the pies or the gentleman who guards the ten trunks of sermons, but the publicity agent. The man who can tell the press that Billy got 60,509 "trail-hitters" and $50,828.64 (the accuracy of the figures is attested by their minuteness) in a single campaign is the kind of man the American journalist likes; and so the ball is kept rolling. The same journal cheerfully announces that "very few trail-hitters have joined churches" (privately I learn that the real outsiders generally join public-houses within a week or two), and—with a lack of consistency which shows the hollowness of the whole thing—that "two-thirds of the trail-hitters were regular church-members." It is a "spiritual" Barnum and Bailey, helped out by sanguinary rhetoric which makes magnificent scare headlines in the press.

Apart from these ridiculous revivals, the situation seems to be much the same as in the equally educated countries of Europe. In the cities the majority are indifferent to religion, but the more skillful preachers play to the American feeling for originality and expressiveness, and attract large audiences. An Ingersoll would draw larger crowds than ever. Unhappily there is, outside Chicago, little organized Rationalism. Vast and wealthy corporations of clergy continuously harass the unreflecting mass, and there is little explicit counter-action. New York is, from that point of view, amazingly poor. The religious folk can hound almost to death brave women like Mrs. Sanger and Mrs. Byrne, who would teach wisdom to poor mothers, and the great city passes on, laughing. America is not sufficiently interested in great collective issues. Perhaps the change is at hand. As I write, the Stars and Stripes wave languidly above the roofs about me in a sunny, spring-like atmosphere. But down there in the streets and buildings there is a new feverishness. Is it to be peace or war? They still, in large part, ask the question with a laugh, but all know the gravity of the hour. Perhaps these pages will never reach England. Perhaps the writer will never reach England again—Kismet! I have tried to play a man's part in the world. Perhaps there is a part to play here. The precise shaping of the generous sentiment that vaguely fills the heart of America is a great task. But there are men and women enough here at work. For me the magnet lies across the death-strewn waters, in the little land which, for hundreds of thousands of Americans, looms largest to-day in the world of ideals and devotion to right.

JOSEPH MCCABE.

The Unanswered Question?

It has been rightly stated that war is hell, yet, if we are to believe all that the agents of heaven preach from their pulpits about the possibilities of eternal glory, or everlasting damnation, we surely have it coming to us, and, I presume, we ought all to close our eyes and say, "Thy will be done." The clergy are constantly drilling into the undeveloped minds of the superstitious many on this earth that there really are two such places as heaven and hell for us to claim as our residence after we shuffle off this mortal coil, and we have only to make our own selection. I wonder how many of the parsons honestly believe the doctrine they teach. How much of it does the Rev. Sunday believe?

When we admit that the clergy and God and the Bible are right and true, we at once deny ourselves the use of the greatest gift nature has endowed us with, the power of thought—free thought. I admire those brave ones who are not afraid to do their own thinking. I admire especially the ones who are not afraid to tell their thoughts to others. I rejoice in the great and rapid strides Freethought has taken—the wonderful and glorious progress it has made during the forty years that take me back to the days of my youth, when I could not for the life of me reason out how the clergy could make sensible thinking people accept the "bunk" they handed them; and I am still wondering. I admire the orators, writers and editors of the past and present who have done, and are doing, so much for Freethought's continued advancement and for the enlightenment of the world by their untiring efforts to burst the chains of superstition and release from bondage the many slaves of a most unbelievable doctrine.

The one great fear I entertain is that some Freethought comrade may be called upon to say a few words over my clay before the doors of the churches of the belief styled Christian are closed for ever, and the Bible as a sacred and inspired book is relegated to the dust heap.

Christians profess to believe in the power of God to do any and all things whenever he sees fit to perform them, and that all things are done for some good. They say that God causes all things to happen. That may be the truth, but I doubt it. If it is true, then God has caused this most atrocious and destructive war the world has ever experienced.

Since the Christian doctrine teaches that the Christian deity controls all things, even to the thunder, lightning, rain, earthquake, tornado, cyclone, and all similar natural phenomena, and can cause or stop them at will, it appears evident to me that this God might put a stop to the present wholesale murder. If we put to a Christian the question, "Why don't God stop the war?" the answer will most likely be that when the right time comes God will bring the war to an end. In humanity's name, what does God call the right time? Millions have been killed or crippled. Many of the finest specimens of manhood of all ages will be left crippled for the rest of their lives and physically unfit to earn their living. Great numbers will be totally blind and will never again look upon the beauties of nature. What a horror! What an outrage! And the Christian sects gather in their churches and sing praises to this God, professing to believe that he does everything for the best. I can only say God has certainly made a hideous failure of this war, and I refuse to worship or believe in such a deity.

If God could set the sun back ten degrees on the dial of Ahaz, or cause it to stand still for a whole day during Bible times, or if he could cause people to rise from the dead, or could slay and exterminate whole armies with one sweep of the hand, then I claim this same God could stop this awful carnage with at least as little difficulty as was experienced in dividing the waters of the Red sea and holding them apart until the children of Israel got safely over on the other side. I would like to put the question to all of the Christian clergy functioning as the mouth-pieces of this remarkable God: "Why don't he stop the war?" A. P. HOUGHTON, M.D.

Evangelism and Insanity.

From an Address by C. A. Windle, Editor Iconoclast.

People are thinking of Billy Sunday, not Christ. Once his circus gets under way for every time his crowd mentions the name of Jesus, it speaks the name of Billy Sunday a hundred times. Even when praying to God their mind is on Bill.

I do not know of a single place where his revivals have been held that somebody was not driven insane. Following these meetings there is always a great increase in the number of people sent to asylums. I regard any crusade as criminal that makes people insane.

After Billy's meeting at Portsmouth, O., a number of people went crazy. Here is the story of one of these cases as reported in the Portsmouth Times:

"The longer they held the boy the wilder he got, but they held on like grim death until the officers came and took the raving man to headquarters and locked him up. The man carried on at an awful rate for hours and such exclamation as, 'Come into my heart, Billy!' and 'Oh, you Billy Sunday,' issued from his cell."

Immediately following Sunday's meeting at New-castle, Pa., the records show there were 14 people who went raving crazy on religion and were sent to the asylums.

At Wheeling a young man heard one of Bill's wild sermons, believed he had sinned away the day of grace, lost his reason and on the way home cut his throat.

At Canton, O., a woman by the name of Nina Moffett, who attended his meetings constantly and had her room papered with Bill Sunday's pictures and littered with his sermons, went crazy and committed suicide.

A dispatch to the Wheeling Daily News March 3, 1912, from Columbus, O., says:

"Cissy Leota Duke, the young woman of Martin's Ferry, who became insane over the Billy Sunday meetings in Wheeling, was brought to the Columbus State Hospital today. She is exhausted as the result of her ravings and refuses to eat."

Sunday held a great meeting in Philadelphia. People from surrounding cities attended. A number of people lost their minds. One of these was a 17-year-old boy by the name of William Kortun. A dispatch from Mantua, N. J., to the Philadelphia Ledger July 17, 1915, says:

"Outside of an old brick farm house, where William Kortun, 17 years old, used to barricade himself and through the keyhole preach sermons while posing as Billy Sunday, stood a group of South Jersey farmers and their wives. They were listening to Mrs. Henry Kortun, step-mother of the dead youth, relate how he suffered a mental collapse after hearing the evangelist speak. Kortun died last Monday in the Trenton Asylum for the Insane. Physicians declared that Kortun became mentally deranged as a result of religious hysteria. 'My boy, Billy,' said Mrs. Kortun, 'would he alive today if he had not heard Billy Sunday speak. His sermons had such an effect on our boy that he actually began to think that he was Billy Sunday himself. He would go into the barn and there lock himself in. While in the barn he would pose as Sunday and start to deliver his sermons. He spoke so loud that persons passing the barn could hear him. Our boy would shout: 'Down with rum, and down with the devil.' On one occasion we heard our boy shout, 'Hurrah for Billy Sunday.' Many times I pleaded with Billy to forget the sermons that he heard Billy preach, but he refused to listen to me. He frowned at me and other persons who tried to get him to forget Billy Sunday."

Sunday recently held a meeting at Omaha. Here is a story of one of his victims as published in the Omaha Daily News:

"Harry Reinhardt, aged 22, 3226 Maple street, who hit the trail at the tabernacle Sunday, today was behind bars at the county jail as the result of an insanity complaint filed by Denton E. Cleveland, assistant pastor of the First Congregational Church, and one of the tabernacle secretaries. Since Sunday the boy almost constantly has been singing 'Brighten the Corner, Where You Are.'"

"Mrs. Florence Reinhardt, the boy's mother, appealed to the county jail officials to release her son. She said: 'He was never strong mentally, but since hitting the trail Sunday he became worse. My boy, my boy, I want my boy!'"

"The boy in jail kept crying: 'These walls will crumble to dust. I will be released and justice will be done. Billy Sunday will save me.'"

Such glorious work is the fruit of Billy Sundayism once it attacks the mind.

Bill Sunday recently closed a meeting at Syracuse, N. Y. Here he registered a grand success measured by a large number of trail hitters and $23,000 for Bill. One of the first trail hitters was a man by the name of Edward H. Buchenau. This man was sane, went about his daily work a useful citizen prior to the advent of Bill and his circus. After he got converted he lost his reason and on January 2, 1916, he murdered his own mother in cold blood. Speaking of this horrible crime the Syracuse Herald, January 3, says:

"Leaving his victim lying in a river of blood the murderer walked out of the house and went to a police station where he told what he had done and asked to be taken into custody. 'My mother wanted to go to heaven, and I sent her there,' he said."

"Edward Buchenau has been a constant attendant at the Billy Sunday meetings during the whole of the Syracuse campaign. He was one of the first trail hitters and did much personal work at the tabernacle."

"Between the pages of his Bible were mementos and relics of the Billy Sunday campaign. There were pledge cards and prayers, extracts from the published reports of his sermons to men, and the Booze sermon."

Sunday has a special sermon for mothers. I suggest that when he delivers it in Detroit that he recite the story of Mother Buchenau who was murdered in cold blood by her own son. This son was not crazed by drink nor driven mad by the storms and stress of life, but made crazy by the preaching of Billy Sunday. The silent grave of this old mother and the raving maniac now in a lunatic's cell testify to the evil results of a Sunday circus.

Here are a few quotations from the murderer's confession printed in the Syracuse papers:

"When I went to bed last night I was thinking of mother and wondering if it would not be better for me to kill her."

"After breakfast she stood with her back to me and I thought of the heavy day's work before her and the thought came to me that she would be much happier in heaven."

"I suppose I should not have done it, but ever since I hit the trail at the Billy Sunday meetings I have had a different idea of God and life."

It is the Billy Sunday view of God and life that is a menace to this city and this country. His views of God and life are insane. Bill Sunday, himself, talks like a mad man. Here is an excerpt from one of his copyrighted sermons, which seems closely akin to the sentiments expressed in the confession of the boy who killed his mother. Bill says:

"I sometimes think almost that it might be a Godsend to many a community if it could be swept by typhoid fever or pneumonia or scarlet fever just after a good revival and before people have a chance to backslide."

The trail hitter who murdered his mother wanted to make sure that she did not backslide. Was he carrying out the Billy Sunday suggestion? The language of Billy Sunday and his crazy antics frequently border on the very verge of insanity. In one of his copyrighted sermons Sunday says:

"It is a good thing that I am not God for 15 minutes. If I were I would fill your newspapers with obituaries and fill freight cars with the dead."

He has never been able to fill freight cars with the dead, but he is doing fairly well.

At McKeesport, Pa., a former mayor of the city became so excited during one of Sunday's meetings that he fell dead from heart failure.

At Lima, O., a presiding elder of the Methodist church was overcome by excitement and dropped dead on the tabernacle platform.

He is giving the undertaker considerable work and is filling insane asylums wherever he goes. Who will be his next victim?

In Darkest Columbus.

The Ohio State Journal, a daily paper published in Columbus, has an editorial writer who is entering second childhood, and the two editorials attached show what we have to put up with in this community from his pen. I have been writing against such nonsense for quite a while and so have others, but he continues it just the same. We had this old editor out to one of our Rationalist meetings one Sunday afternoon, but it did not seem to do him much good. I wrote him a letter the day the following two crazy editorials were published. The printed a part of it. I am sending you this so outsiders will understand what we have to fight here.

PRAYER MEETINGS TONIGHT.

There will be prayer meetings at nearly all the churches tonight, on which occasion patriotism will be made part of religion. God wants us to love our country and to stand up for it when it is assailed or when the sentiments which give it life are in danger. He doesn't intend that a great cause shall languish for lack of heroism. Sacrifice is the working principle of religion, and the example of sacrifice was set for the world on Mount Calvary 1900 years ago, and on the anniversary of the very day and hour when that great sacrifice was made President Wilson signed the bill committing this nation to another sacrifice, implied in the great war we have entered. It is meet that we should join our duty to God to our duty to mankind. Governor Cox will attend the meeting at Trinity tonight and will make a brief address. It is hoped that the meetings in all churches will be well attended.—Ohio State Journal, April 11.

BILLY SUNDAY'S NEW YORK CAMPAIGN.

At his first meeting in New York City Billy Sunday referred to the talk, so common, that it was a money-making affair with him and after roasting the people who talk that way, said he would give every dollar above actual expenses that he received in New York to the Y. M. C. A. and the Red Cross. But we suppose that won't stop the people who deride Billy and ridicule his methods. We do not think there is a man in the United States who will do more good than Billy Sunday, taking into account his religious work and his generous gifts. This will include all his maligners, who are reposing on fat salaries and who regard religion as only propriety and sweet Genevieve. If we had the gift of prayer, it would go principally to Billy Sunday and his siege of New York city.—Ibid.

Following is my protest: "As a reader of the daily press I wish to express my disgust at the giving of so much flattering space therein to the doings of Billy Sunday, the sensational, intolerant, impolite evangelist who is now performing in New York city. This deference to such an unrefined, unlearned sensationalist, in my opinion, makes the daily papers obnoxious to the intelligent and cultured of the community. Much ado is being made just now about Sunday's declaring he will turn over to the Y. M. C. A. all the proceeds of the New York meeting, excepting 'enough to cover actual expenses.' I venture the assertion that this gift is not made out of the generosity of this ranting religionist's heart, but is made as a matter of self-preservation. Mr Sunday realizes well enough the force and effectiveness of the criticism directed against him and his gigantic commercialization of religion, and in order partly to counteract it, he announces that he will give the Y. M. C. A. the money collected. New York city, he also realizes, is the most conspicuous and most advantageous place in which to execute this 'grandstand play,' but that will not save him from the just criticism that is being applied to him. It will not shield the questionable business of emotional evangelism from the legitimate condemnation that the enlightened of America are bestowing upon it."

O. C. WEATHERBY.

President Columbus Rationalist Society.

It is vulgarly thought that the belief in future punishment is important as a check on the inordinate passions of men; that it is valuable in keeping society in order, men being more readily swayed by fear than by any other motive. This impression is, I am persuaded, quite mistaken. It is not probably true that men are powerfully affected by fear than by love. The experiment has never been tried. The assumption that fear is the only influence to which human beings respond has been acted on from time immemorial and has begotten an absolute skepticism in regard to the efficacy of any other sentiment. That men should be influenced for good by fear seems to be something like an absurdity. Fear can do no more for a moral nature than darkness can do for a plant or lightning for a tree. Sunshine alone quickens. Love alone warms.—O. B. Frothingham.

It is strange how persistently the world clings to the belief that truth, glorious and eternal, is the only thing in the universe that cannot protect itself. It must be kept in a glass case and shielded from every chilling breath. It is time to realize that the law is exactly the reverse of this. Truth is strong enough not only to protect itself, but also to protect its friends.—R. E.

NOTES AT LARGE.

The Roman Catholic paper of San Francisco called the Monitor, in its issue of April 14, reproduces from an East Indian paper an article with the heading, "Outside of the Church, No Salvation." The purpose of the writer of the article seems to be to show that, while this statement is intrinsically correct, it is subject to certain modifications growing out of a state of invincible ignorance on the part of Protestants and other non-Catholics, and the question as to whether or not the unbeliever is leading an upright life.

It is very strange, if God made a revelation to the world, as for instance, in the book called the Bible, and if that revelation is self-evidencing, that a single case of invincible ignorance should appear anywhere in the world! This ecclesiastical ruse of "invincible ignorance" is a way Roman Catholicism has of smoothing over the fact that more than two-thirds of the world has rejected its empty claims. And this large part of the world is suffering no condition of any form of ignorance regarding Rome's claims. It knows that its doctrines are false. And while it may appear very charitable on the part of Catholicism to ascribe the wide-spread rejection of its doctrines to an unconquerable ignorance, that particular religion realizes perfectly well that it is not a question of ignorance on the part of those who refuse to acknowledge Rome's jurisdiction in matters of religion, but, on the contrary, it is a matter of men knowing too much about that age-long deceiver, and its methods for enslaving mankind.

But more than this: note the irrationality as well as immorality of a man's being saved by an institution rather than on his own merits. Institutions by themselves save no one. If a man is not willing to save himself no institution can possibly save him. It is this immoral teaching of a man's being saved through membership in a church that has developed one of the worst phases of human society. On the basis of this teaching some men think that they may live a more or less careless or vicious life through the run of their days provided only that at the last they declare their adherence to the church, and invite the ministrations of the priest. That teaching of Catholicism is in complete contradiction to the mind of the Christian apostle, who told his followers to "work out their own salvation." This is common sense; but as common sense is not the cornerstone of religion, men have been beguiled into putting their confidence in a purely man-made institution, whose history is but the story of innumerable human wrecks, rather than in their own personal endeavors, which times out of mind, have been crowned with an enviable success.

If a man is situated so that he can save himself, save himself he should. To ask the assistance of church or creed under such conditions, is irrational, it is unmanly.

The suggestion made in the following letter, written in good faith, is probably impracticable:

"CLEVELAND, OHIO, April 16, 1917.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER:

"It strikes me we are letting a golden opportunity slip by us. Has it occurred to you that our newly arranged postal law forbids the issuance or circulation of any book, paper or pamphlet of any description whatever which encourages the use, sale or having in possession any vinous, malt or alcoholic liquors in bone-dry territory; and yet the holy Bible is being slung broadcast in those regions?"

"Surely the evidence is strong against the book. They have done their best to throttle your own and other publications of a similar nature, and still they are not fettered in their work of planking down that corrupting book in front of our children and unsuspecting adults."

"We are overlooking the great big opportunity. Can't we get our old stand-bys to start something? It would make some one's name famous. Think it over, and oblige an humble old-time Rationalist."

"FREDERICK H. WILSON."

The plan to get the Bible excluded from bone-dry territory under the new law looks impracticable to us because if the attempt were seriously made it would lead either to an amendment to the law, exempting the Bible from its provisions, or to such decisions by those administering the law as we have when we indict the Bible as obscene and demand that it be excluded, for that reason, from the mails. The Bible is in parts an exceedingly coarse and vulgar composition. Passages abound in it that answer the description of lewd and indecent, and about everything else that the law against the mailing of obscene literature contains. And yet the mails are open to the Bible, although in 1885 a man was sent to jail for quoting it. The discrimination by courts and lawmakers between the Bible and other books as touching decency of expression, and the hypocritical regard for it as holy which they evince, warn us in advance how an attempt to apply the prohibition law to its encouragement of the use of intoxicating liquor would be received. The ministers in bone-dry states are permitted to import their booze. Why not their Bible? The twain are "lovely and pleasant in their lives," and in death they will not be divided.

Three years ago Dr. Howard Kelly, a surgeon and cancer specialist of Baltimore, identified radium for use in cancer treatment as the fulfilment of the scripture (Malachi iv, 2), "Unto you that fear my name shall the sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings." Dr. Kelly affirmed that cancer was sent to man by God as a punishment for his sins, and that God later sent radium as an antidote. But at the Academy of Medicine in this city, April 20, a group of doctors described as "a particularly distinguished array of experts," discussed radium as a cancer cure, and "there was no one among the speakers who would say that a cure of the disease had been achieved." They had not heard of "the sun of righteousness"; as a medicine it has been canned.

On her way to church on a recent Sunday, a Mrs. Lewis, prominent in the affairs of Camarillo, Cal., was struck by a railway locomotive and killed instantly. There must have been in Ventura county, that day, thousands who were going about their ordinary occasions, working, trading, diverting themselves to the disregard of the Sabbath, but Providence picked for a victim and example one of the few who went reverently to church. In the same county, in the city of the same name (Ventura), the Rev. C. H. Lawrence, Methodist, dropped dead at the foot of the mission cross, where he had gone to conduct sunrise services—an act of Providence still more difficult to explain.

Among "Remarkable Remarks" the Independent feels justified in inserting the following credited to Prof. R. M. Wenley: "There is no one jot of evidence to prove that the soul lives after death, but there is also not one jot of evidence to prove that the soul does not." The same regarding wireless telegraphy in the Garden of Eden; no evidence exists that the inhabitants used wires.

THE TRUTH SEEKER has engaged two articles by Joseph McCabe, the brilliant English Rationalist now with us. The first, dealing with "The Church in Russia," will appear next week.

"Into Her Own."

In the prohibition campaign in California in 1914, one of the principal speakers who is now a bishop in his church, said:

"When we get national prohibition, the church will come into her own."

Yes, there have been times when the church was into her own. And every time it was a woeful day for everybody else.

In the time when the greatest church was most deeply into her own and everybody else, all that she ever had and all that she ever wanted was simply that "legislation—state, national, and municipal—should be projected in harmony with the principles of justice and righteousness proclaimed by the church"; and that "the harmonious judgment of the people of God" should be respected and "enacted into laws."

That is all that this same church wants now in the United States.

There is a true civil basis for the annihilation of the saloon with its train of cussedness.

But prohibition on the religious and church basis of the prohibition wave that is now fast submerging the nation, when successful according to program will be far worse than ever was or ever could be the evil against which the prohibitionists profess to be working.

Nearly six thousand years the world has been without prohibition. And it could be sixty thousand years without it, and still not know anything like so much evil or so much misery as it suffered in that dark and doleful time when the church was "into her own."

And when on the same principles and on the same model, again "the church comes into her own" the same mighty evil and misery will again reign.—American Sentinel.

No man who has subscribed to creeds and formulas, either in theology or philosophy, can be an unbiased investigator of the truth, or an unprejudiced judge of the opinions of others. His sworn preconceptions warp his discernment, and adherence to his sect or party engenders intolerance to the honest convictions of other enquirers.—David Page.

The Revival Racket.

Certain criticism of the Rev. William Ashley Sunday, D.D., is tinged with prejudice arising from the fact that he is getting rich saving souls and pinching the tail of the devil in "the crack of the door." One paper places his profits on soul-saving and devil-chasing at $600,000 in the past few years. The financial gain of an evangelist is the bugaboo of small minds. A generous public is quick to reward excellence. Let a man make a better mouse-trap than any other man makes, says Emerson in effect, and though he may live in the wilderness the world will wear a path to his door. Has not the Rev. William Ashley Sunday devised the best trap yet for human moles? It has been inadvertently if ever that we assailed Sunday for taking the money given him voluntarily. The blame is on the giver. No human being in a country where information about religion is accessible to all need be a mole except from choice, and the person who takes that form is an inexcusable fool. The Bible says that a fool and his money are soon parted, but it confines its censure to the fool; it does not blame the persons who separate him from his coin. If a man can make no better use of his money than to give it to a literary thief and self-convicted falsifier who employs for the promotion of ignorance and superstition the natural talents that would enable him to oblige and amuse at a variety show, he is not fit to be trusted with a nickel. Energies should be bent to showing the fool his folly. Part of the responsibility for the successful humbug under discussion must be laid upon a dishonest press that, knowing the untruthfulness and utter falsehood of the stuff dealt out as preaching by the tabernacle trickster, still prints without exposing it. The Publishers' Association, in protesting against censorship, lauds the press as "the one great safeguard of the people." If the press is the safeguard of the people, why does it not stand between the uninformed hearer, lured within hearing of a lying voice, and the unscrupulous owner of that voice who uses it for a most unworthy purpose?

These notes, gathered by a writer for Variety, a dramatic or theatrical magazine published in this city, are from its number for April 20:

"The vaudeville and picture theatres closely adjacent to the tabernacle have reported no loss in business the past week."

"One theatrical manager operating a house but a short distance away from Sunday's meeting-place said he would not have known the evangelist was in the city were it not for the newspapers."

"A saloonkeeper near by said the other day he intended following Sunday around the country, buying up a saloon near his place in each city, as he thought it would be an excellent investment."

"The appearance of Billy Sunday at the Hippodrome Sunday night was the cause of considerable comment during the week, it apparently surprising many people who were familiar with Sunday's ways."

"The opening of Billy Sunday in New York brought a rush of business to the saloons in the vicinity of the Sunday tabernacle at Broadway and 168th Street. A saloon in close proximity to Sunday's headquarters has lately added four bartenders to its force."

It is possible for a man whose words carry no weight to talk much against the saloons without doing them any harm. Nobody ever heard a saloon man say that the evangelist's presence had injured his business. The men who are sure that Sunday is injuring their cause are certain of the more thoughtful ministers of the gospel, whose complaints and denunciations are frequent.

That Billy Sunday has one style of speech for the masses and another for the refined and wealthy was demonstrated in an address which he recently gave to a party of select men and women at the New York residence of John D. Rockefeller, Jr. The daily papers noted particularly the almost complete absence of any slang phrases or obscene allusions in this privately delivered address to a personally invited audience. The reasons for this practice on the part of the evangelist to make use of a varied phraseology in delivering his "divine message" are probably these: he knows that the slangy style will catch the ear of the crowd, and thus add to the interest of the entertainment which he has made it his business to give; he also realizes that if he hopes to squeeze any large sum out of the millionaire rich he must address them in a manner and language more or less agreeable to their supposedly high station in society. This versatility on the part of the evangelist must be highly satisfactory to the heavenly powers, for the Jehovah of the Old Testament exhibited a similar type of genius, and most of the saints followed in his train. We always thought that there were two sides to religion, but we never expected to find it so strikingly illustrated as in the case of the pious-lewdness of the Rev. William Ashley Sunday, D.D.

Mr. E. Edwin Freeburg, a New York law student, has sent to THE TRUTH SEEKER, for publication, a challenge to the knockabout evangelist now showing in a tabernacle uptown, defying the latter to meet him in debate and offering to pay all the expenses of a meeting-place satisfactory to his opponent, if the latter will only consent to appear and defend his religious teachings against Mr. Freeburg's criticism and attack. Mr. Freeburg holds that the whole outcry of the evangelist is a farce, and that the religious dogmas he preaches—Father, Son, Holy Ghost, Jesus, the Virgin Mary, the Devil and all—are lies and delusions, or insanities, not susceptible of demonstration or proof, or even of support by any reasonable argument. Of course the tabernacle baboon could not be drawn into a debate by any known traction power, for the permanency of his vogue depends upon his not being found out.

Last week, we are told, the proffer was made to the secretary of the Rev. W. A. Sunday (D.D.) that the expenses of a suit against THE TRUTH SEEKER for criminal libel would be furnished if Mr. Sunday would consent in advance to come into court and swear that he did not appropriate Ingersoll's Memorial Day Address and deliver it as his own. The secretary replied that Mr. Sunday would decline to have any part in such a prosecution. There is one prosecution, however, in which Mr. Sunday would on certain conditions take part involuntarily as defendant. If he will repeat publicly and directly, naming THE TRUTH SEEKER, that the exposure of his plagiarism and falsehood by this paper is instigated and backed by the "whisky bunch," as he calls the liquor interests, he might get a summons to court he would not care to disregard.

The main head on THE TRUTH SEEKER EXTRA was "Billy Sunday Found Guilty." It attracted the attention of a Broadway policeman. A policeman's notion of guilt is that the accused has been brought before the judge for a court trial and convicted as charged. The Broadway policemen wanted to know of the newsboys what Sunday had been found guilty of. The boys had not been instructed to answer "Plagiarism," and he would not have known what they meant if they had told him. So he ran them off his beat and ordered them to discontinue selling the publication. In a few moments, with the heading changed to "Billy Sunday Shown Up," the paper was back on the street, and there was no further criticism.

The man of the name of Gary, who is head of the United States Steel Corporation, threw a roll of yellow money into the pan when he viewed the performance at the tabernacle one day last week. It is of great advantage to large employers of labor to have workmen assured that all a man needs is a dollar a day and Jesus.

Last year New York had infantile paralysis; this year's visitation takes the form of a revival, involving paralysis of the brain. Poliomyelitis and then Bilysundytis; and the last state is worse than the first.

Twice Over on $1,000.

From the New York Times, April 19.

"Sunday began with a denunciation of persons who have charged him with plagiarism, and his remarks were taken to apply particularly to the charge that he plagiarized extensively from Ingersoll in a Decoration Day address delivered in a Pennsylvania town in 1912.

"I am indebted to a friend of mine," he said, "for some of the thoughts in this sermon. I've skimmed through English literature for illustrations and analogies; I owe something to nearly every editor from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I've had a wagon load of clippings sent me by various people for use in my sermons. Everybody does it. I know a preacher in this town who hires two men to do nothing but read for anecdotes and illustrations and clip them out for him to use. Yet the whiskey gang goes up and down the land saying that I'm a thief.

"Nobody else is a thief but me, because nobody else hits their business like I do. That dirty, stinking bunch of moral assassins hires men to sit in the audience and hear me, to write down what I say and then try too find some author who said something like it, and accuses me of having stolen my ideas.

"I know that $30,000 was offered a man in New York city to write a series of articles attacking me. All right; if you know anything about me that you want to publish, go to it. Everything they say about me is a dirty, stinking, black-hearted lie. The whole thing is a frame-up from A to Izard."

Concerning the assertions and insinuations we have emphasized in the foregoing report from the New York Times, we have this to say:

If the Rev. William Ashley Sunday will prove that what he calls the "whisky gang," or the liquor interests, or the saloons, or anybody representing any of them, have financially aided in the publication of THE TRUTH SEEKER's exposure of his literary piracy, THE TRUTH SEEKER will forfeit a thousand dollars.

And if we cannot prove against him, before any competent jury, our charge that he is guilty of plagiarizing a speech of Ingersoll—not "something like it," but virtually word for word, to the extent of 700 words, more or less—we will forfeit an additional thousand dollars. And we will put up the money. Will he put up an equal sum in support of his assertions, or will he shut up? He will do neither.

What can induce him to produce a scrap of evidence that the liquor men have promoted THE TRUTH SEEKER's exposure of his plagiarism, or that there has been any frame-up by this paper, or that anything we have said about him is not true?

P. S.—The sum of $2,000 has been deposited to the credit of the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER in a New York bank that will pay it to any person or object named by the Rev. W. A. Sunday when he has disproved our charges of plagiarism against him, and has proved his own charges which we have denied above.

Book Notes.

The prime evil of most forms of religion is the priesthood. This fact is shown more or less plainly according to the size and strength of the church, and the influence it has acquired in some particular country. It is well known that Ireland is the most devoted child of the Roman papacy, and that nowhere in the world has the Catholic religion had a freer opportunity for demonstrating its truthfulness and effectiveness for good than in that interesting portion of the British empire. The results, however, have been anything but beneficial to Ireland and its people. Ignorance, superstition and immorality are everywhere to be seen; and the presence of the priest is to be traced in every feature of the country's life, both in the crowded city and in the quiet hamlet of the hillside and of the vale.

A book which tells the story of the modern religious life of Ireland in a most interesting and graphic way has been secured by The Truth Seeker Company from a European publishing house. This remarkable work is called "Political Priests and Irish Ruin," and has a subtitle, "Paraguay on Shannon up to Date." In a note the author explains his use of the word Paraguay by saying that that country "became celebrated in the eighteenth century for the absolutist system of government established by the Jesuit fathers over the Indian tribes. The Jesuits are credited, however, with promoting the material prosperity of their servile subjects. No such extenuation can be urged on behalf of the political priesthood in Ireland. In Ireland material ruin has accompanied clerical despotism. The political priesthood has pauperized as well as demoralized."

We know of no book in the whole range of English literature that exposes more effectively the base and insidious motives underlying the operations of Roman Catholicism than this one written by Frank Hugh O'Donnell. And we know of no country in the world, not excepting Spain, where the people were more responsive to the chicanery of the priests which resulted in their political and social ruin, than the country which forms the subject of this work. The revelations which are therein made of the workings of the papal hierarchy in every department of church and state are so thoroughly base and immoral, that one wonders how it was possible for the decent people of the land to endure so long a condition of things which reflected so seriously upon the moral life of the nation.

The Truth Seeker Company has but twenty copies of this very uncommon book. It is selling them for fifty cents each. All persons interested in the effects of religion upon an isolated people, where that religion had everything its own way, should procure this book at once.

The writer of these notes desires also to call the attention of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to one of the greatest works of Ludwig Feuerbach, called "The Essence of Christianity." This fine work presents a complete analysis of the Christian religion, beginning with the essential nature of man and ending with the Christian heaven, or personal immortality. Feuerbach, in this work, reasons entirely from the standpoint of pure Rationalism, with a keenness of vision and incisiveness of analysis such as has never been surpassed. This invaluable book is one that the thoughtful reader will be glad to have always at ready hand. Its logical arrangement facilitates easy reference, and the accuracy and depth of its reasoning makes it one of the best textbooks for the Freethinker. There are but six copies of this work remaining, which will be sold for $1.50 each.

Owing to the great difficulty of importation due to the war, the stock of these books cannot be renewed; and we have thought it well to inform our readers of their special excellencies, as the works are not listed in the company's catalogue of publications.

A Missionary Effort.

With apologies to Billy Sunday.

If the consensus of scholarship says one thing and the word of God another, the word of God can go plumb to hell, for all I care.

If the undertaker pumps you full of embalming fluid, you are in more danger of a resurrection than if you are cremated.

Come, all you weazel-eyed, peanut-headed, dead-beat, impenitent Freethinkers; buy all our literature or go to hell.

Let us jump on the pulpits and discard the past theology and substitute good will for our fellows, like that damned Ingersoll.

If Billy Sunday must go to hell because he used Ingersoll's language, even heaven might be preferable for us.

I believe that the Bible is untrue, but not that virgins are extinct nor that man has fallen irreparably nor that my vile body will forever roast in hell because I failed to contribute to foreign missions intended to convert men to a falsehood.

O you long-legged, hook-nosed Freethinker, I am surprised God does not kill you, you self-satisfied fraud.

What reform are you working for? Freedom of speech and thought? Good. Prohibition and birth control. Good.

Hit the trail. Loosen your pockets. Start a fund for defense of those who are arrested for no other crime than freedom of speech. Employ Mr. Schroeder, or God, or some other lawyer. I will double all contributions up to $100.

Come on; hit the trail. ATWOOD MANVILLE.

National Censorship Unnecessary.

It seems hardly necessary for Congress to pass censorship bills to limit freedom of speech when that matter is being so well attended to by our leading universities. Following the refusal by President Van Hise of the University of Wisconsin to allow an address in a college building by Max Eastman, although, as one well-known university man said, Mr. Eastman is fully qualified academically to hold any one of several chairs in the university, including the position of President; and after Columbia's denial of her platform to the son of the great Tolstoy, and the University of Toledo's limitation of the freedom of her liberal professor, Scott Nearing, comes word now that President Hibben of Princeton has denied permission to David Starr Jordan, chancellor of Leland Stanford University, to speak on the subject of Peace on the campus of Princeton. The young Tolstoy is reported to have said, when Columbia's decision was told to him, "Russia will be interested to know of this." But that was before the Revolution, and today the papers tell of a great crowd of peasants, workmen and soldiers, marching to the Tolstoy estate and asking to see a portrait of the great pacifist and revolutionist, and when the widowed countess brought the portrait out to them, they knelt in reverence before it. But that was in the free Russian republic.—Unity (Chicago).

Popery has not changed, except in outward appearance. You cannot change the nature of the beast by clipping his ears or docking his tail. So long as that institution deals in confession, repentance, salvation, forgiveness, holy water, relics, idols, indulgences, hell, heaven, and purgatory, this swindling ecclesiastical traffic will be a profitable business; man and woman will be corrupt and improvement almost impossible; and were it not for the fact that civilization had been pushed forward by secular intelligence, by men of wisdom and scientific attainment, who put their secular opinion in opposition to pestiferous ecclesiasticism, we would today be buried in the mire of popery.—J. Hartmann.

When we glance over the results of modern research, now flowing in from all sides, and consider them in their significance for the knowledge of man, it can be no longer a matter of doubt that we have come to the end of established notions, and that we are approaching a different conception of nature.—Schaffhausen.

The virtue of a man ought to be measured, not by his extraordinary exertions, but by his everyday conduct.—Pascal.

OBJECTS.

It is the object of THE TRUTH SEEKER to educate the people out of religious superstition. It denies the inspiration and infallibility of the Bible, and asserts the human origin of that book. It denies the existence of the theological heaven and hell, but as to the existence and immortality of the soul neither affirms nor denies. It waits for evidence.

THE TRUTH SEEKER upholds the theory of Evolution, believing that to be the solution of the question of the origin, growth, and development of the animal kingdom, including man. THE TRUTH SEEKER believes that the answer to the questions Whence? and Whither? can be given only by Science.

THE TRUTH SEEKER holds that morality and ethics—or man's relation to man—are entirely independent of creed or religion, and are founded on rules developed by experience.

In current politics THE TRUTH SEEKER takes no side or part. In general it holds to the principles of freedom enunciated by the Founders of the Republic.

THE TRUTH SEEKER believes in Free Speech, Free Press, and Free Mails; in full discussion of all sides of all subjects, and affords those having new and worthy thoughts, clearly stated, a generous and welcome hearing, each contributor being responsible for his own opinion. We neither indorse an idea by printing it, nor condemn it by exclusion.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is the recognized medium of communication between the Liberals of the country, and is edited each week for their information, instruction, entertainment, and support against religious error and mental slavery and in maintenance of their equal civil and religious rights as citizens of the United States.

The Editor invites communications on the subjects to which these pages are devoted.

POLITICAL PRINCIPLES.

(THE NINE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.)

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in the Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privileges or advantages shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

MR. ESHLEMAN AND DIVORCE. From H. C. Uthoff, Oregon.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

If Mr. C. H. Eshleman of Michigan has not yet joined the Knights of Columbus, let him be elected a member forthwith. His opinions on marriage and divorce, recently expressed in THE TRUTH SEEKER, entitle him to full fourth degree privileges in that organization. Were he not writing in a Freethought publication, one might take him for a Roman Catholic. His views have all the fearsome dogmatism of the orthodox medievalist, being evidently unrelated to external facts or anything else but uncritical tradition. One wonders what youthful influences once played upon the gentleman that his convictions now so much resemble the pope's.

Mr. Eshleman is anxious about the welfare of children where easy divorce is obtainable. He comes to the verge of tears and—I had almost said—curses on the subject. He lays it down flat that the children suffer where parents are allowed to separate for what he says are trivial reasons. Certainly, one can weep copiously over this phase of the divorce question or scold endlessly. With a fountain pen and a string of adjectives at his command, one can play the superior moralist in almost any publication in the country. It is an easy and extremely self-satisfying attitude. But it has nothing to rest on by way of facts. The dogmatizing of the opponents of easy divorce is, like German philosophy, spun at random out of their innermost consciousness. Their windy arguments need to be pricked.

Mr. Eshleman, in other words, consults only himself in delivering his judgments. He says divorce ought to be difficult to get nine times out of ten. Has he gone over all the cases that he knows the exact ratio of justifiable divorces so well? What reasons in detail has he for believing that easy divorce is bad for the children? Isn't it just a sort of notion with Mr. Eshleman that such is the case? Do not, in fact, the courts always take the welfare and provision of children into account when granting divorces? I doubt if there has ever been a single divorce granted in the United States or any other country where the welfare of the children was not carefully considered.

Take two states as far apart as Oregon and South Carolina. In the first divorce is extremely easy. Judges often allow divorce by mutual consent. One of them (Judge Henry McGinn) recently announced from the bench that any couple that could no longer live together amicably, if the children (where there are any) would be decently provided for and property arrangements agreed upon, would immediately be divorced in his court. His motto simply is, "Better be happy apart than 'scrappy' together." In South Carolina, on the other hand, no divorces are granted on any ground, not even infidelity. Here is a fine opportunity for Mr. Eshleman's theory of the juvenile life-saving efficiency of stringent marriage laws to commend itself. In Oregon there ought to be a high rate of infant mortality; in South Carolina a low rate. Is such the case? By no means. If Mr. Eshleman will take the trouble to look up the figures issued by the Children's Bureau of the United States government he will find that Oregon has a very low infant mortality rate, the lowest in the union, whereas South Carolina is extremely high. This fact is embarrassing for Mr. Eshleman's contentions.

Or take countries like Japan, Sweden and Norway. Divorce is easy in all three. Yet the infant death rate is very low—in Norway the lowest in the world, even though divorce is possible by mutual consent and at a private hearing of the court. Persons who seek to achieve cheap reputations as moral mentors have little opportunity for parading their superiority there. The law tells such unctuous self-flatterers shortly, "It's none of your business why this couple separated."

The explanation of the fact of infant welfare and easy divorce, as disclosed not by guess but by reliable statistics, is not far to seek. Mr. Eshleman supplies it himself. He says: "The paramount questions are: Have the children brought into the world by this union a permanent and happy home; and are they receiving the best possible care and training for happiness and usefulness in life?" Surely where the father and mother make it their chief aim to nag and torture each other (as is done in thousands of instances), Mr. Eshleman's specifications for proper environment for children are not met. A home is more than a roof and four walls. It means, if it means anything at all, a community of interests and aims, not mere toleration and endurance. The quicker the quarrelsome and unhappy household is broken up the better for the children. That is the underlying theory of easy divorce. It is a sound theory, as shown by the general healthy, happy condition of children in communities where divorce is easy.

Mr. Eshleman's Catholic argument against divorce—the resultant sad plight of the children—is pure fiction and hasn't a leg to stand on. What is a Rationalist doing in that galley?

"DIE WELTRATHSEL."

From H. J. Wingardner, New York.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

On page 228 (TRUTH SEEKER, April 14) you have this to say: "The pacifist is unpopular these days"; and, "that he might be worse. He might as the result of perverse cerebration be a pro-German," etc.

Now in the same copy (T. S., page 233) you note as follows: "The will of John Ludwig, filed last week in the Surrogate's office of the Bronx, this city, included among its bequests $25,000 to the Thomas Paine Nat. Hist. Assn., etc., and 'It also gives $15,000 to the Rand School . . . $10,000 to blind soldiers.'"

Is it possible that Mr. Ludwig is likewise guilty of "perverse cerebration" when he made that will, or is the editorial just an agreeable way of acknowledging his generosity. I have it from pretty good authority that the above is not the first generous gift offered by Mr. Ludwig to the worthy cause of Freethought.

You will note of course that I protest only against some of the phrases, for instance: "Even a prokaiserling German-American has our sympathy and friendship, but our comprehension does not take him in. He is die (das?) Weltrathsel—the riddle of the universe."

I am reluctantly forced to believe that the article referred to is not the product of our Editor-in-Chief G. M., but that it hails from Beanville. It has all the peculiar "earmarks" of the work of a certain Wash—but no, I'll desist. The hub is indeed afflicted. Having at least two common scolds—"His imminence" the cardinal, and the laundry woman referred to above. The reason for my suspicion, as to the fatherhood of the article, is that its location in the paper is in the identical column which was always assigned to him. The diction, or composition, or whatever you may call it seems to remind one of him. A few months ago I showed a friend a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER with a view to get him interested. He looked it over, and, in the same, identical, column discovered this choice bit of wisdom: "It used to be said go to hell, but now it's go to Germany which is about the same." The initials L. K. W. were of course supplied on that occasion. Is it a wonder that the worm turns sometimes—and protests?

[Our grief over the pro-German in the midst of us arises from the fact that he is such when he might be an American. For our German name for him, "die Welt-räthsel," we are indebted to the title of one of Haeckel's books. Haeckel uses the article die and we hesitated to change the grammar. Mr. Washburn is not guilty. —Ed. T. S.]

SPECIMEN RELIGIOUS LEADERS.

From Louis Berger, New York.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

As I am penning these few lines on "Wake up America Patriotic Day," important enough as that important day may be to us loyal Americans, I have rejoiced also to learn that the Freethinkers of the country are also waking up from their long lethargy and indifference to the dangers surrounding them. I allude to the fact that I was surprised to learn that THE TRUTH SEEKER has issued a special number in the form of a newspaper which it is spreading throughout the city for circulation and propaganda work, a work with which I am in hearty sympathy. The title on the front page, "Billy Sunday Found Guilty," though the wording may sound somewhat sensational, does not, in my opinion go to the root of the matter in exposing the so-called Evangelist. Why your paper singles out this particular Evangelist for attack passes my comprehension when there are so many other equally false, hypocritical, arrogant, ignorant itinerant preachers and so-called Evangelists who infest our highways and by-ways preaching as boldly as ever "Christ and Him Crucified." As for example, we have a Professor Everson, a mouthpiece of the Seventh Day Adventists, who for audacity and hypocrisy surpasses even our friend Billy Sunday. This professor goes so far as to predict future events, and as a student of his predictions for over eight years, they have never yet been fulfilled. His co-laborer, a Mr. Franke, a friend of mine who has known him for a half a life time, informs me was once a bar keeper and associated with gambling, and was convicted in Louisiana in 1895 of having defrauded a working-woman of her earnings in a real estate deal.

Mr. Warschwaia, a converted Jew, who became a Dowieite some years ago after he had been convicted as a gambler and a fraud in the Fifth Avenue Church of which he was a member, succeeded in getting a round lump sum of money of a Christian woman for the purpose of building a "Christ's Synagogue," but the "Synagogue" building never materialized (nor did the Jewish converts to Christianity), and according to the last report, he was enjoying his ill-gotten mazuma in a Switzerland resort under an assumed name. And so the list goes. Sunday is but one of the same crowd and of the same gang of grafters who have preceded him in modern and by-gone days.

I have before me a book entitled "The Protestant Religions and Denominations" by the Rev. James L. Meagher, D.D., from the Holy See. The author contends that Luther lived a wicked vulgar life, was a sodomist, and eventually committed suicide by hanging; that as to Calvin, the founder of the Presbyterian Church, he also was convicted of sodomy and branded with a red hot iron by the Civil Courts. He pretended to work miracles and forged texts from the Fathers to prove his doctrines; led a wicked life, assassinated and murdered. John Knox was a murderer and adulterer. John of Leyden, founder of the Baptists, had 17 wives, evidently in emulation of his predecessor King Solomon. Henry VIII, murderer, had 6 wives. Only an amateur. Joseph Smith, founder of Mormonism, seduced many women and was eventually shot by exasperated citizens. Brigham Young, also of notorious fame, a bigamist, slanderer and religious fraud, became a millionaire. Sandford, the founder of the Holy Ghost and Us Society, is at present a prisoner in the penitentiary. Mrs. Eddy, led a worthless life, practiced deception and died a millionaire.

With such an array of frauds, humbugs, murderers and liars, I have arrived at the conclusion that Sunday is not the prince of them all, but simply an amateur religious fraud who is out for the almighty dollar and has evidently succeeded admirably in his object.

For the benefit of my critics, permit me to say that I am a strict Prohibitionist, have never smoked in my life, have never sowed any wild oats, have never defrauded any one, am not a Socialist, though in sympathy with the aims of the Socialist party, am a good upright loyal citizen, a father of three children and the husband of a good wife, and above all am proud of the title a Freethinker and of being a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

SCIENCE AND SPIRITUALISM.

From Dwight Spencer, Oklahoma.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

R. A. Dague sends me a copy of the Progressive Thinker, containing one of his articles, "Great Men and Scientists Believe in Spiritualism." In this article Mr. Dague seems to try to connect the Bible, spiritism and modern science all up together.

In one place Mr. Dague says "the Old Testament Scriptures are literally filled with accounts of departed spirits communicating with those in the flesh, I have not space in which to make quotations. In the New Testament we read that spirits announced the birth of Jesus; spirits unlocked the prison doors and released Paul and Silas; a spirit warned Joseph to beware of Herod; Moses and Elias appeared to Jesus, Peter, James and John. Both Peter and John were mediums. After the crucifixion, Jesus appeared to Mary, also to two strangers, the disciples and others. Paul was converted by a spirit voice speaking to him. Jesus sometimes cast out of obsessed persons, ignorant or evil spirits."

I wonder why it is we never hear of "the spirits opening prison doors" and releasing their friends today? I wonder why we have no marvelous mediums, such as Mr. Dague says Jesus was, who can cast out, of obsessed persons, ignorant or evil spirits? Have the departed spirits lost these powers they once possessed?

Mr. Dague with his theory of spiritism overturns all law of heredity and environment. Here is Jesus reported to have been born of ordinary parents (or will Mr. Dague say Jesus' father was a Holy Ghost or Spirit) whose birth is announced by angels or spirits, who is protected by a spirit warning the (step) father of Jesus to beware of Herod. Jesus grew to manhood and became a "marvelous medium" who possessed the power to cast out devils or "evil spirits" from obsessed persons. And he "appeared after the crucifixion to his disciples and others." Mr. Dague does not say whether he was wearing his body at this time or a suit of Raymond Lodge's made of the "smells of decaying worsted." The Book says the body was gone, and Mr. Dague leaves us to infer that it was the disembodied spirit of Jesus his disciples saw. What became of the body? Probably Jesus left it with the devil when he descended into hell.

Mr. Dague quotes at great length the names of prominent preachers and "great scientists" who have embraced spiritualism. Among these we find the name of Wm. James. We read on page 165 of "The Belief in God and Immortality," by Prof. James H. Leuba of Bryn Mawr College, two quotations from American Magazine, October, 1909: "For 25 years I (Wm. James) have been in touch with the literature of Psychical Research, and I have been acquainted with numerous researchers. . . . Yet I am theoretically no further than I was at the beginning." This was written but a short time before Mr. James died. Mr. James says in the same article, speaking of Henry Sidgwick, one of the most influential founders of the Society for Psychical Research, that he died "in the same identical state of doubt and of balance in which he started."

Now, no doubt a large number of "the great men and scientists believe in spiritualism"; but spiritualists have never yet brought forward sufficient credible proof to convince the scientific world that disembodied intelligences exist and communicate with people in the flesh. Spiritism, according to Mr. Dague, has been known to some few people ever since and before the days of Moses, more than 3,000 years, yet today only a few "scientists" are convinced beyond a doubt. Mr. Leuba presents to us in his book (for sale by The Truth Seeker Co.) some charts made from a canvass of two groups of names, 500 in each group, taken by a rule of chance from a list of 5,500 men listed in American Men of Science. These charts show that in group No. 1, only 66.5 per cent. of lesser and 38.8 per cent. of the greater men of science believed in the immortality of the soul in any form. Group No. 2, showed that only 52.8 per cent. of the lesser and 35.2 per cent. of the greater believed in immortality. This investigation made by Prof. Leuba would seem to indicate that the greater scientist a man became, the deeper down one delves into reality and the closer we get to the heart of nature, the less true become the claims of the believers in spiritism.

Darwin wrote two books, Origin of Species and Descent of Man, to make known his theory of "Natural Selection," and today Darwin's theory in the main is universally accepted by the scientists of every country. About 27 volumes of the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research have already been issued, besides hundreds of books and tons of literature by individuals, yet we find after 25 years of investigation and research the noted Wm. James says he is no further theoretically than he was at the beginning.

A FEW CRITICISMS.

From J. Herbert Foster, Cuba.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

When I rallied to your support against the assaults of the economic cranks I did not count on the editorial diffidence that modestly imputes to the economic page the homage that I wished to render to your editorials. I did not think of the economic page when I wrote the letter and find no reference to said page when I reread the letter now. Still, as a concession to your point of view I am willing to admit, if you insist upon it, that I cannot give that page the unqualified endorsement that I could a year or two back when I was a frequent contributor to it. At present it seems to lack something of the brilliancy and erudition that characterized it in those days. Nevertheless my mantle as champion of man the lord of creation seems to have fallen upon worthy shoulders in the person of Mary Monico, and she had my unqualified approval until I was shocked to learn this week that she is suffering from the ravages of the economic bug. I can only say to her as the old man did to his wife: "Every one is queer but you and me and you are a little queer."

You do me injustice in intimating that I do not drink in with avidity articles that I disagree with. Quite the contrary. I always read Dr. Robinson on birth control and Theodore Schroeder on the limits of censorship. I peruse without outcry your frequent editorial compliments to the first thief and his pals who have gutted Mexico under the cloak of Democracy—a very transparent cloak, by the way, to all who have first-hand knowledge of the country. I recognize that it is your business always to hit a clerical head at sight, so you naturally uphold the hands of all others who are in the same business and presume that they are O. K. in other respects until you are convinced to the contrary. Unlike me you have not lived in Mexico twelve years and do not now reside in Havana where there is a constant stream of travel passing to and from Mexico.

You say that I "say" that I am a reader (of the paper). I do not find any such statement in my letter but the implied skepticism in your remark seems strange under the circumstances. Could an editor require any stronger evidence than my quotations from his own editorials to prove that I had read them?

You say that there may be Freethinkers who believe in war as a biological necessity, yet that the abolition of that evil has been one of the "advocacies of Freethought in all times." I suppose that the only way to advocate Freethought is to do it and not do something else. While Freethinkers as individuals may hold various views I do not see how Freethought can work for anything except itself without thereby and to that extent becoming something else. As a creed I understand Freethought must agree with itself in every part.

You state that war imperils all guarantees of liberty so that Freethinkers oppose it. I am not aware of any successful society that has been organized except upon the basis of force. War, the appeal to force, is the foundation of society and all that Freethinkers hold most dear—life, liberty, culture, progress. History is crowded with attempts to found communities upon voluntary cooperation; when and where have any of them succeeded? How about the numerous transcendental and communistic societies that abounded in the states and were killed by the Civil war? The survival of the fittest?

You state that you prefer "peace at any price" yet if my memory does not mislead me you recently published a philosophical editorial supporting war when it is called by another name—defense against invasion. So it would seem that while you are for peace up to a certain point there are prices that you are not willing to pay for it.

I particularly object to your statement that birth control is "not catching." On the contrary it is precisely that above all else. The history of race suicide in the old New England families, the falling birth-rate in progressive societies show that it is as catching as smallpox and much more virulent. "Birth control" as it is now euphemistically called, spreads from family to family and from class to class precisely as all psychological epidemics do. It thus progressively destroys the future first of a neighborhood group or club, then a ward, a city, a nation and a race if its ravages are left unchecked.

A GERMAN JESUS.

From Wakeman Rigno, M. S., Michigan.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

The Chamberlain-Reimer conception, which the Letter Box first brings to my notice, "that Jesus Christ is of Teutonic origin, and that JES means GER; and that the word Jesus means German," appears to be an etymic parody on the rules of etymology.

It is so much easier to ridicule or satirize an unknown theorem than to solve it with studied analysis, that many Christian writers, intending to mislead, answer all anti-Christian problems with travesty.

All civilization of this age agrees that the ancient worship of the Gods Osiris, Hercules, Bacchus, Jupiter, etc., was the worship of the Sun under those names; and that the worship of Isis, Ceres, Diana, Juno, etc., was the worship of the personified Moon. "The Romans," says Dupuis, "ridiculed the Deities which were worshipped on the shores of the Nile; they proscribed Anubis, Isis, and Serapis, and yet they worshiped themselves Mercury, Diana, Ceres, and Pluto, in other words, they worshiped absolutely the same Gods under other names." Plato said "that the Greeks had worshiped since the remotest antiquity, the Sun, the Moon, and the Stars, and yet Plato was not aware that they still preserved at his time the same Gods under the names of Hercules, Bacchus, Apollo, Diana, and Esculapius." And now we have the same worship of the Sun, with all of its ancient forms unchanged, under the name of Jesus Christ. But notwithstanding the clearest evidence of this fact, we have all Christians and some so-called Rationalists, ridiculing all who teach that Star Divination was the origin of the church; and that the analysis of words is the surest method of showing the conglomerate collection of juggled names, bogus words, and rotten translation, for the purpose of rendering the origin of the Bible obscurum per obscurius.

"The Mummy Religion" with its Bible or "Book of the Dead"; the oldest and most perfected of all ancient religions, one that had supported in wealth and luxury its pontiffs, priests, or hieroduli, from prehistoric ages; one that had its crosses; its massu or messiah; its anointed and karast, kerst, or christ; and its Iusu or Jesus, already made and at hand; why should it be necessary to hunt for a Teutonic Jesus Christ? It was not from Germany, but "from Egypt have I called my son"; and that this old priestly quotation should be fulfilled, the Roman monks planted themselves in Alexandria, to revamp the story of Osiris, Isis, and Horus, into that of Joseph, Mary and Jesus; and to turn the "Book of the Dead" into the "Book of Life" or Christian Bible.

Knowing this how absurd it appears, and how unlikely it is, that the close ideal religious relations, names, influence, and church paraphernalia, of the ancient Egyptians, should be cast aside and a hunt instituted for a German Jesus Christ.

CANADA AND AMERICA AS ONE.

From John P. Guild, Canada.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

The "United Statesers" in Canada do not any longer have to be ashamed of their nativity or hearing their old country called "the laughing stock of the world." The mayor of Calgary hoisted "Old Glory" on the flagstaff of the city hall and all the star-spangled bunting to be found decorated the town. A great patriotic rally of both Americans and Canadians was held here Saturday, and we were told by the Britishers that the "international line" was nothing but an ink mark on the map of all America. The slurs that we have had to resent are heard no more from the tobacco mouth of any Kanuck. The great idea that has finally got into British heads is that we are all Anglo-Saxons engaged as Democrats in the destruction of autocracy, and now in unison with reformed Russia to eternally stop all wars waged in the name of God for the benefit of kings. The British king is one only in name, and Japan's and Germany's autocrats will soon have to dump their fool crowns in the garbage can. The lesson of "United America" to a disunited world can be read in a sentence, the order of the Irishman when he buttered his skim-milk cheese: "Get together agin, and cussed be he that parried yez." We may also well hope that with the loss of his terrestrial vicereagents, the boss-god of the skies will take a tumble to himself, throw up his job and go shoveling snow along with the cashiered czar.

A GREAT EDITORIAL.

From A. H. Wolf, Iowa.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Your editorial "The Lost Fight for Peace" is great and to the point. Though I belong to the humanitarian family, at the same time I am a cheerful loser. I have no use whatsoever for "crown heads." I detest war for any cause except in case of self defense. May we have peace again by the time these few lines reach you.

WAS CHRIST CRUCIFIED? By Austin Bierbower. Fourth reprint. This is an examination of the story of the Crucifixion as contained in the Gospels. The author, who was a clear thinker, a member of the bar, and a genius with the pen, finds the main facts of the account incredible, and tells why he does not believe them. Price 5 cents.

"Victor Hugo's Oration on Voltaire," by Victor Hugo, translated by James Parton. This is a classic, and gives both the French and English versions. 10 cents.

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

John William Draper, May 5, 1811—
January 4, 1882.

The name of Prof. John William Draper, author of the "Intellectual Development of Europe" and "The Conflict Between Science and Religion," is a household word among Freethinkers. He was born at St. Helen's, near Liverpool, England, May 5, 1811. In England he studied at the University of London. In 1832 he removed to the United States, where he finished his education in the medical school of the University of Pennsylvania. In 1837 he was elected professor of chemistry in the University of the City of New York, where he remained in some capacity—among others president of the institution—for twenty-three years or until a year before his death.

In 1862 he published his "History of the Intellectual Development of Europe." It applies the scientific method to history. From 1867 to 1870 appeared his "History of the American Civil War." But the most read of all his works is "The Conflict Between Science and Religion" published in 1874. This work caused a sensation and gave the church much trouble. Here Professor Draper showed that there is a conflict between the methods of science and the methods of religion. One rests on investigation, observation, reason and experience, and the other on dogma. One remains stationary and the other from its very methods obeys the law of progress. Hence in their very nature there must be a conflict. He gives a history of that conflict from the establishment of Christianity down to the nineteenth century. No one can escape the facts or the conclusions of Professor Draper's great work.

He also published a "Text Book on Chemistry," a "Text Book on Natural Philosophy," a "Text Book on Physiology," and "Scientific Memoirs." In 1839 he made portrait photography possible by improving on Daguerre's method. (See "Losing's History of the City of New York" and "Encyclopedia Britannica," Art. Draper, J. W.) Professor Draper died at Hastings, New York, January 4, 1882.

Other events of which the past week is the anniversary are:

April 29, D. M. Bennett liberated from the Albany penitentiary, 1880. Zoellner, spiritualist, died, 1882. Charles V established Inquisition in Netherlands, issued edicts against Protestants, 1550.
April 30, Hosea Ballou, founder of Universalism in this country, born, 1771; Washington first inaugurated President of the United States, 1789.
May 1, David Livingston, African explorer, died, 1873. Dryden died, 1700.
May 2, Reception to D. M. Bennett at Chickering Hall, New York, 1880. Karl Marx born, 1818. Jamaica discovered, 1494.
May 3, Macchiavelli, Italian statesman and patriot, born, 1469. Hood, poet, died, 1845.
May 4, Huxley born, 1825. Audubon born, 1780. Wm. K. Clifford born 1845.
May 5, Napoleon I., died, 1821.

DO NOT BE DECEIVED.

Answering a correspondent who has heard that the theory of evolution and the origin of species taught by science has been exploded, Prof. Garrett P. Serviss, author of many valuable scientific articles, which THE TRUTH SEEKER has copied, writes in the New York Journal:

Perhaps you have been hearing Billy Sunday. But don't let anybody shake your confidence in scientifically ascertained facts. The object of science is not to sustain theories, which are abandoned as fast as they are found not to fit the facts, but to get at the bottom truth of things.

It is a great pity that the word "evolution" is still as a red flag, provoking many well-meaning persons to lower their horns and plunge into a battle with the wind!

Thousands who ought to know better insist, at this late day, upon applying a religious test to this purely scientific question.

If science can find no relics of a Garden of Eden and no indications of a "fall of man," but instead clear proofs of his continued rise from the beginning, these results are due to its exclusive devotion to a search for verifiable facts.

The leading fact is that the earth, whose rocks are full of monuments and relics of its past history, tells a straightforward story of evolution from lower to higher forms in both the animal and the vegetable kingdoms. It is true that while this story reads always the same way it is incomplete in details because of the loss, destruction, or non-discovery of some of its pages and chapters. Every year, however, gaps are being filled and not one backward step has ever had to be taken.

If some people will insist upon repeating the parrot phrases: "The animals have always been what they now are, because we are told that out of the ground the Lord God formed every beast of the field and every fowl of the air, and brought them unto Adam to see what he would call them," science can only reply:

"There must be some misunderstanding, for the plain facts show that at the beginning the animals were very different from what they are now. New forms have arisen from preceding ones, and man himself branched out from the ancestral line of the apes."

Of the two evolutionary developments that you mention, the first, that of the birds, is, perhaps, the most wonderful; the second, that of the horse, the most completely known, partly because it covers a shorter period of evolution. An entire series of steps leading from the reptile to the bird has not yet been discovered. The earliest known bird is the archeopteryx (a name meaning "first bird"), which lived in the Jurassic period, and which, in addition to wings, possessed feathers, the typical clothing of birds. It was of the size of a small crow, had a long trailing tail, and wore strong, sharp teeth in its jaws.

Professor Schmucker says it was "half reptile, half bird; perhaps one-third reptile and two-thirds bird." Living all around it were the most gigantic reptiles that the earth ever saw, for the Jurassic and Cretaceous periods constituted the "Age of Reptiles," when Adam would have had his hands full finding appropriate names. It was also a time considerably back of his traditional date, for instead of six thousand years ago, it could not have been less than five million, and may have been ten million!

Intermediate between the archeopteryx and the reptile was the pterodactyl, which was a kind of flying dragon, more reptile than bird. It had no feathers, and its wing bones were joined by a membrane like that of a bat. All of these creatures had reptilian teeth. But none of the earliest reptiles had wings. The power of flight was gradually developed in one or more branches of their kind, and the branch which produced the archeopteryx, as we have seen, acquired more bird-like, or avian, characters than reptilian ones. The successive steps that led the birds to an exchange of their toothed jaws for toothless "bills" have not yet come to light. But the chapter headings of the story are there in their proper order, and the missing pages may at any time be found.

The story of the ancestry of the horse can best be studied with the actual specimens before you, in the American Museum of Natural History. Here the pages run right along, turn after turn, and you can read them without scientific spectacles. The first page carries you back several million years, at least two million, and perhaps three or four. The animal of Tertiary times that was destined to develop into the horse was about as big as a fox, and, in external appearance, about as much like a horse as a fox is. How, age after age, his descendants grew taller and larger and slowly turned into a likeness to horses; how, for a particular instance, the four or five toes of the timid little creature at the bottom of this astonishing family tree, were gradually exchanged, first for three toes and then for two toes, and finally for a hoof—all this you can not only read, but see, in the museum.

There Evolution stands before you as if risen from the grave! Myths fade in the light of facts.

She Knew Better.

Micky Flanigan came home one day sniffing. "Ye got licked!" cried his mother with conviction.

"Naw, I didn't neither, maw," Micky retorted. "But the doctor was at our school today, tryin' to find out if there was anything the matter with any of us, an' he says I got ad'noids."

"Ad'noids? What's them?" Mrs. Flanigan demanded.

"They're things in your head, maw, what has to be took out," said Micky in a doleful tone.

"He's a liar," Mrs. Flanigan cried hotly. "I fine-comb your head iv'ry Sattaday night, an' it's niver a ad'noid kin I find!"

Unanswered to Date.

A Sunday school teacher, after conducting a lesson on the story of "Jacob's Ladder," concluded by saying: "Now, is there any little girl or boy who would like to ask a question about the lesson?"

Little Susie looked puzzled for a moment, and then raised her hand.

"A question, Susie?" asked the teacher.

"I would like to know," said Susie, "if the angels had wings, why did they have to climb up the ladder?"

The teacher thought for some moments, and then, looking about the class, asked: "Is there any little boy who would like to answer Susie's question?"

Irrecoverable.

A Westchester county man took his numerous progeny to a county fair. As they moved about the grounds, the father felt his fifth born tugging at his coat-tails. He turned, and the youngster begged him to buy some candy.

"Buy it yourself," said the father. "Where's the dime I give you a little while ago?"

"It's down my neck."

"Well, shake it out!"

"But, dad, I can't. It was in my mouth when it went down."

An Indignant Postmaster.

"Have you got any letters for Mike Howe?" asked the farmer.

"For whom?" snapped the perspiring official.

"Mike Howe, I said!" bawled the farmer, louder than ever. "Don't you know your job, or can't you talk English? Have you any letters for Mike Howe? Now do you understand?"

The postmaster took off his glasses.

"No, I have not," he snorted. "Neither for your cow nor any one else's."

An Alarming Inquiry.

An Irishman coming out of ether in the ward after an operation, exclaimed audibly: "Thank God! That is over!" "Don't be so sure," said the man in the next bed, "they left a sponge in me and had to cut me open again." And the patient on the other side said: "Why they had to open me, too, to find one of their instruments." Just then the surgeon who had operated on the Irishman stuck his head in the door and yelled: "Has anybody seen my hat?" Poor Patrick fainted.

Strange Doings.

The increased demand for woman 'munition-workers, and for woman workers of all kinds, had resulted in the arrival in London, for the purpose of engaging in domestic service, of a girl from the west of Ireland. She was cordially received, and thus she wrote home. "It's a strange place I'm coming to, surely; cabs widout horses and the lady of the house playing the pianer wid her feet, and talkin' to herself perpetual down a candlestick in the hall."—Argonaut.

Preferred an Expert.

Albert, aged three and a half, had failed to respond to verbal reprimand, and at last his mother said, "If you don't behave, you will have to be spanked. You would not like that, would you?"

"I wouldn't like Daddy to spank me," was the quick response.

"Why not?"

"He doesn't know how. He hurts."—Life.

Irrigated and Irritated.

George was hampered by a mother whose great idea was cleanliness. Notwithstanding the frequent baths to which he was condemned, George thrived exceedingly. One day a neighbor remarked on his rapid growth.

"Yes," said George, "that's ma's fault. She waters me too much!"—Tit-Bits.

THE FREETHOUGHT BADGE PIN

Dedicated to all honest men and women—to those who can and are willing to reason—who constitute the grand army of progressive thinkers throughout the world.

An Emblem of Freedom and Progress

Represents no lodge, order or society, but is designed as a token of recognition for progressive minds of every shade of thought.

All claiming to be free from superstition, all who base their belief upon science and reason, should wear this emblem to speed the grand work of emancipating humanity from the thralldom of mental darkness.

This is conceded by artists and the trade to be the most beautiful Badge ever designed. Being a practical jeweler and designer of emblems of every description, as well as an enthusiastic worker in the cause of human progress, Mr. Wettstein has succeeded in combining in this badge the great want of this age and the future. It represents the Burning Torch of Reason, the Rising Sun of Science and Freethought, beautifully enameled in brilliant colors in contrast with the Night and Darkness of Superstition, enameled in black, and symbolizes the evolution of the world from the Night of Superstition to the Day of Freethought, Science and Reason.

"A pin whose torch and golden sheen,
Would grace the breast of Sheba's queen;
And will lend grace in coming time
To queens of beauty more sublime."
(Impromptu by Eliza Wright.)

As a token of recognition among Liberals of every shade of thought, either at home or abroad, it is especially valuable.

Made in two styles and by best workmen in the most artistic and substantial manner.

Considering amount of gold and artistic workmanship in the badge, no other badges in the world are sold so cheap. They will last for generations to come and increase in popularity and value until fear and superstition exist no more.

THE LETTER BOX.

HEBERT E. CARLE, Kansas City, Mo.—Your patriotic poem in the Journal is read with applause. In these times that try men's souls, America expects every poet to do his duty.

H. J. W.—After all, we are more reconciled to the pro-Germans when we observe that an English resident has raised the British flag in our neighborhood and forgotten to fly Old Glory.

H. W. M., Cherry Valley, N. Y.—Your Episcopal minister, the Rev. Mr. Curr, was safe in challenging anyone to prove by the Bible that Christ was a pacifist. Nothing can be proved by the Bible.

C. SEVERANCE, California.—The warmth of your remarks on the foolishness of our species when you see the ministers of Los Angeles raising $60,000 to get the knock-about evangelist there, is justifiable and even praiseworthy. The words "By God, Sir!" which General Washington so eloquently uttered, would be repeated were the General living and asked to contribute to the expense of so ridiculous a proceeding.

CAYUGA, New York.—The sentiment, "Our country . . . may she always be in the right; but our country, right or wrong," was proposed by Stephen Decatur at Norfolk in 1816. You will have to get someone else to point out its ethical difference from "My boy, get money; get it honestly if you can, but get it," which is Pope's paraphrase of Horace's "Rem facias; rem, si possis recte, si non, quocunque modo rem," translated by Conington.

DOMINICK FASULO, The Bronx.—The complete works of Ingersoll, in twelve volumes, now cost $36. His lectures are printed separately, generally at 25 cents each. While agreeing with you that the sale of these lectures, with Paine's "Age of Reason," would do humanity much good, we are not encouraged to believe we could raise money enough to buy the abandoned tabernacle and use it for a book mart. Your offer of a $25 contribution does credit to your head and heart.

W. A. KEYES, Illinois.—True, Paine speaks in his "Age of Reason" of the Book of Creation as the only true and real word of God. You say you do not see the Book of Creation in our Catalogue, but would like to get it if in print and the price is right. But you must remember that Paine believed that deity had revealed itself in Nature, and so he said in another place that "the word of God is the Creation we behold." What he called the Creation we call the Universe, and left it out of our catalogue because we might be unable to deliver the goods were an order to be received. But the Book is free, and you may read it without paying the publisher a profit.

JOHN L. PEPPER, M. D., Maine.—The demand for the abolition of state-paid army and navy chaplains is based upon the principle of the separation of state and church. Your pathetic inquiry who will take the place of father and mother to the soldier boy does not shake us any; and when you say, "If you take away the chaplain, what will you give in his place?" we recur to a question of our own, viz., "If you take away Jonah's whale, what will you give us for the transportation of prophets?" Your argument might have been spared if you had recollected that the churches raise millions of dollars every year to pay for missionaries to the heathen, and that this fund could very well be applied to the support of chaplains in army and navy if the men demand them. All chaplains should be supported by the denominations to which they belong and which are most interested in their using army and navy as missionary fields. As a state-paid office, the chaplaincy is a graft.

Sinai and Olympus

Parallels in Heathen Myth and Hebrew Scripture.

By a Texas Pagan.

PICTURES BY RYAN WALKER.

This is a lecture by a Texas Pagan, which has been illustrated by another. The text is what the title describes, a comparison of the heathen myths with the Hebrew tales told in scripture. The illustrations are exquisite bits of satire and wit, made by a genius with the pencil, and each is a gem. Text and pictures together, the book is certainly one of the wittiest ever produced, while the information it contains is solid and reliable. It will be a source of pleasure to every Liberal, and is at the same time a splendid Freethought lecture. We guarantee its quality from start to finish. 115 large octavo pages, 75 illustrations. Marriage law reform is a subject which is likely to assume greater prominence in the near future. There does not exist in English a complete study of the historical influence of the church on marriage. The lack is supplied by Mr. McCabe's new book, which deals fully with the Roman and medieval systems and the modern humanist development.

DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

Facts and Realities.

Salutation to Mr. Donahue; but no apologies for abuse, as I never resort to it in discussing religion, politics, wedlock, the high cost of living, the inability of some folks to see clearly, think sanely and to express themselves wisely, or on any topic whatsoever. My spirit, which controls reason and common sense, may use forceful and vigorous language at times, but never personal abuse, for when touching any subject, lack of material for argument does not make it necessary. As I have said nothing about my financial condition and have no occasion to, Mr. D. has no means of knowing whether I am worth $1,000, or $40,000; but were I a millionaire I should write and express myself just as I do today, for it is my aim and purpose to deal with facts and realities. I cannot be an optimist where conditions are so bad that 17,000 individuals committed suicide in the United States last year; where we see bread riots in New York and Chicago, and know that millions of people are living from hand to mouth in this great and wealthy country, because unjust and oppressive conditions compel them to; and where millions have not a foot of land to call their own, and can never get enough ahead to buy a home and escape the strangle-hold of the landlord.

I am accused of making false statements, but not one is specified or a direct answer would be made. The Los Angeles papers are accepted as truthful in everything they assert, but possibly my opinion of them, having lived here so long, is more reliable than that of Mr. D., and I make this statement calmly and deliberately: When boosting Southern California they always exaggerate; and to delude by glowing pictures of possibilities that can never be realized, is their business; for they are after a million population in 1920. I have no special desire to be a knocker, but I will not lie for the glory of God or California, and when I have occasion to say anything about either shall confine myself to the truth, for I love it as most mothers love their first-born.

There are certain moral principles that Mr. D. loses sight of when he talks about property and property rights, for the legality of a thing is not always in conformity with justice and equity. When a man defends the right to make $30,000 in land speculation and in unearned increment for which he never rendered society one cent of service, it is a waste of time to discuss principles with him, for he has no interest in them, seeing only the dollar and how to get it. A single tax movement is now on in this state with vigor and earnestness, and 300,000 voters who expressed themselves in favor of it, is evidence that quite a number disagree with Mr. D. We see the necessity out here for relief from land monopolies, and speculation in one of the vital necessities of life, for land, like air, and water, is one of the fundamentals of life itself; so why should any man pay tribute to another man for a place to stand while waiting for the undertaker. As it is possible to present ten reasons for pessimistic views of life to one for optimistic, I refuse to line up with the "whatever is, is best" crowd, and never hesitate to call attention to things and conditions that need changing, though to do so leads Mr. D. to label me a "chronic grumbler."

If I deal with facts and realities they are responsible for my mental attitude; and if my views of life are pessimistic it is because they are produced by no end of things that refuse to depart, though some optimist waves his wand and shutting his eyes says they are gone. But what makes me laugh—and I do at times—is to see Mr. D. refer to Helen Wilman's "Conquest of Poverty" as a matter for serious, philosophical reflection. Such mental productions are taken seriously only by superficial thinkers, among whom I must place Mr. D.; and if it is a "misstatement," evidence will receive due consideration when presented.

Wealth is produced by labor and in no other manner; but Helen Wilman tried to show how it could be acquired by a mental process after some one else had produced it. She was not a wealth producer, but she did manage to get hold of thousands of dollars at one time and flew high for a number of years. If she had not found people simple enough to buy her thoughts on mental science and to pay good money for absent treatments, until Uncle Sam put a stop to her mail-order business, she would no doubt have remained as poor as she was up in Lake County until the end of life. When she was denied the use of the mails to work her graft, her income stopped; and nothing in her book, so much admired by Mr. D., enabled her to obtain any more dollars—another name for wealth. She paid the government quite a sum of money as a fine for her "Conquest of Poverty" through use of the mails; and though she had proclaimed the fact early and late that she was going to live forever here in the body, she died not long after her trouble with Uncle Sam, a much disappointed woman. Copies of that wonderful book can be found to this day, but if any one has ever acquired wealth by reading it or following her plans to get something for nothing, I have never been able to locate such a fortunate individual.

As for Mr. D's statement that Socialism, or the co-operative commonwealth will not work, because it was tried in pre-historic times, and again 900 years B. C., I fear he has drawn on his imagination for his facts; for at no time in the past can he show that the ideas embodied in modern Socialism were ever known or used by the ancients. It took modern brain development stimulated by conditions produced by machinery, such as no ancient ever dreamed of, to construct the theoretical system we are now looking to for future acceptance and use. The possibility of his ever comprehending what Socialism is, and what it aims to do for humanity, is so remote after reading what he says about it, that any effort to discuss it would be futile. But here is one childish remark that must receive a little attention, for a man who can reason thus is a curiosity. "Socialism by guaranteeing to all a living, takes away the most powerful incentive for exertion."

Socialism guarantees no man a living; it offers him the opportunity to work and make his living, and nothing more; so necessity still drives a man to work under Socialism precisely as it does now; but because a man could always have a job when he desired one to feed and clothe his body, instead of having to hunt for one in an over-crowded labor market, he would lose "the most powerful incentive for exertion"! Can you beat it?

Now I am going to present something fresh as a "chronic grumbler." In today's paper, April 16th, is this statement relative to labor conditions in Los Angeles, so Mr. D. does not have to depend on my word which he virtually tells me he doubts when it is unsupported. Thanks! "$52,000 Needed for Relief Work"; and because county funds will not be available until July 1st we read that 1,600 families that are absolutely dependent on these funds must have immediate assistance which social workers are trying to get from private sources. Here is prosperity for you, and Mr. D. can make the most of it. If he can tell these 1,600 families how to get away from here perhaps they would like to go, for he says, "what is the use of staying where there is no work?" Do we need to ask them why they do? Any man who can reflect on these conditions and still be an optimist, has a brain that works different from mine; and all over this country we can find conditions so bad, that a brainy man like Clarence Darrow was heard in a debate last week with this subject: "Is Life Worth Living?" He took the negative side, but what a brilliant opponent he would have had in Mr. D., who sees nothing out of gear in society and no reason for any man to talk or complain about our decadent civilization, which is to be bolstered up awhile longer with a military system that throws into the shade the one the Prussians have staggered under so long.

When I hold an opinion I cannot sustain with facts and realities, I will drop it; but at present there are so many reasons for saying and believing that our civilization and all civilizations are rotten, that my views of poverty and riches are not changed by anything Mr. D. has said.

CHANNING SEVERANCE.

MY CREED.

I believe in GOOD, the Power almighty,
Maker of heaven on earth;
And in Love and Charity and Justice,
Triune virtues of one birth.
I believe GOOD is a spirit
Emanating from within;
Void of form or sex or body,
Helping man to conquer sin.
I believe sin is all evil
Rising from the lust of gain;
Or departure from Dame Nature's Laws controlling health or pain.
I believe that down the ages
Man created gods galore;
White or brown or black or yellow,
Crowding books with sacred lore.
I believe that man's salvation
Can by man alone be worked;
Crying unto "God the Father"
Will not pay for duties shirked.
Whence I came or whither going
Unto me is not revealed;
Why should I the present squander,
Because the future is concealed?
I believe that in the present
We must strive for what is best;
So that future generations
By our labor may be blest.

W. M. PULSFORD.

RAILROADS AND WORKING HOURS.

Mr. Long's sense of humor is such that, he says, if he should ever become editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER he would be tempted to insert my articles in the funny column; but should I ever be favored with that honored position, I would institute a crazy column for absurdities like Mr. Long's.

Mr. Long remarks that we are supposed to be Freethinkers and tolerance our watchword, and then proceeds to upbraid me for characterizing an article of his as "a mixture of facts and falsehoods," oblivious of the fact that he had said in a still earlier article it was presumptuous in me, holding the political and economic opinions that I do, to contribute to Freethought literature, and that my opinions were befitting a standard Republican paper.

The word falsehood used in the connection in which I used it, does not mean a lie, as any lexicon will show.

In an attempt to ridicule and in a sarcastic strain Mr. Long proceeds to say that my remarks about short hours are funny.

Well, if mine were funny, his are too absurd to even possess the saving grace of fun or humor.

If it were true that the employer could secure more work and greater efficiency with short hours than with long ones, every employer in the land, whether corporate or individual, would adopt it at once. The vast majority of employers are practical, hard headed business men and keep an eye to the windward for the best results.

Mr. Long claims he can do more and better work in six hours than in eight or ten, while I find I can do more in twelve than in a less number, while sometimes I work fourteen.

I am both employee and employer; I work for others and have others working for me, and I find I make more money working for others than from those working for me. In fact, I do not consider I make anything from those working for me, and look for my compensation in the way of a modest return from my little investments and for my labor in looking after them.

I have not a single dollar of stock in any railroad or other transportation company and am not in their employ, and my attitude is that of perfect disinterestness in this railroad labor controversy, and while I have a little stock in a number of corporations, the most of them are absolutely profitless and none of them are more than modest, and the great melon slicings of which Mr. Long speaks are either figments of his imagination or rare exceptions.

We have not a single special privilege or such a thing as a monopoly in the country, and I challenge Mr. Long to specify a single one.

There is not a line of business that Mr. Long or myself could not freely enter, and if any avenue was open to investment that assured more than a reasonable return, there are millions of dollars seeking it.

These self-evident, fundamental facts are ignored by Mr. Long, and he proceeds upon assumptions altogether.

He assumes the railroads are paying enormous dividends to stockholders, yet stocks in a majority of them can be bought below par.

He continues to swear by Prof. Ripley's statement that appeared in a muck-raking magazine that railroads increased their earnings from ninety-six thousand to fifteen million dollars in twelve months, unmindful of the fact that even if they did increase to the fifteen millions it would not pay one per centum on the investments in railroads.

In the April, 1917, number of Pearson's Magazine is to be found a eulogy to the great Ingersoll from the pen of Eugene Debs, in which Mr. Ingersoll is extolled as one of nature's noblest and wisest men—a tribune of the people, and a champion of the oppressed.

I firmly believe Ingersoll was all that Debs pictures him to be. He was too great for ordinary men to do him justice.

He was wise enough to see the truth and brave enough to speak it.

He was too great to descend to the low tricks of demagogues and many politicians to whom so many give ear, whose stock in trade is to appeal to the baser passions and prejudices of the masses.

Now let us see what Ingersoll thought and said about the railroads and contrast them with Mr. Long's.

Reflect that Ingersoll was a man of wide and varied experience, saw with a keen insight the motives that actuated men and knew the impulses of their hearts, for he was brought in contact with the great men of action and captains of industry.

We will quote from his speech on Farming, addressed to the farmers of Illinois.

He says: "If all the corn raised in Illinois could be transported to New York absolutely free it would enhance but little the price you would receive."

"The railroads are your friends. They are your partners. They can prosper only when the country through which they run prospers. All intelligent railroad men know this."

"They know that present robbery is future bankruptcy."

Yet Mr. Long says the farmers are leaving their farms because they are getting tired of working for the profit of the railroads; when, as a matter of fact, the farmers are getting twice and thrice as much for their products as they did twenty years ago and railroads run not so much for their services as they did then, although their taxes have been doubled and trebled in that time and cost of up-keep vastly increased.

This senseless pillorying of the railroads is doing no good and a great deal of harm in that they are unable to make necessary enlargements and betterments to meet increasing demands for transportation facilities.

The new railroad mileage has dwindled almost to the vanishing point and their credit has become impaired; and while earnings, owing to the unexampled period of industrial activity through which we are passing, have increased considerably, yet they are wearing out their rolling stock and tracks, which will necessitate its expenditure for replacements.

We need another Ingersoll to counteract the bawlings of the demagogues and to set us straight.

SEVENTH EDITION — REDUCED PRICE

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxies of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

Admonition.

This is not an allegory
Told with old John Bunyan's tact.
'Tis a simple little story
Founded on a simple fact.

Snow had fallen in the night time
And McGuire, the honest man,
Was returning from at tight time
With two cronies, Pat and Dan.

With a world of solemn feeling
He had bid them both good-night,
And along the line went reeling
While the flakes fell soft and white.

Lives of drinking men remind us
That at closing time we go
And departing leave behind us
Footprints in the falling snow.

Footprints that same erring brother,
As our Longfellow might say,
Could retrace and have another
Where McGuire had spent the day.

Dawn came stealing o'er the city
And the little children played
(Follow well this mournful ditty)
In the tracks McGuire had made.

Reeling, twisting, sometimes backing,
On they trudged with laughter loud;
On they trudged, forever tracking
In the course McGuire had plowed.

Came the parson from a distance,
Prim and proper, old and staid,
And the line of least resistance
Was the trail McGuire had made.

From their windows pious ladies
Saw the man whose speech divine
Kept them from the road to Hades
Walking zigzag down the line!

Out of all this sad confusion
Two young morals we can nail;
Never jump at a conclusion!
Never take the beaten trail!

Doubtful Compliment.—First Artist—

tribution-plate this morning?"

Mr. Smith—"Yes; I owe the heathen

Female Efficiency.—"Why do you consider women superior to men in intelligence?"

"A bald-headed man buys his restorer by the bottle, doesn't he?"

"Er—yes."

"Well, a woman doesn't waste time on a hair-restorer; she buys hair."—Tit-Bits.

Nobody Home.—"What would you do if I turned you down?" she asked shyly, as they sat on the parlor sofa.

The young man looked straight ahead, but said nothing. After a few moments of silence she nudged him with her elbow and said: "Didn't you hear my question?"

He looked around, apprehensively.

"I beg your pardon," he replied. "I thought you were addressing the gas."—St.
Louis Republic.

A Knowing Witness.—The prosecuting attorney had encountered a somewhat difficult witness. Finally he asked the man if he was acquainted with any of the men on the jury.

"Yes, sir," announced the witness, "more than half of them."

"Are you willing to swear that you know more than half of them?" demanded the lawyer.

"Why, if it comes to that, I'm willing to swear that I know more than all of them put together."—St. Louis Republic.

On First Looking Into a Subway Excavation.

Much have I traveled, a commuter bold,
And many goodly excavations seen;
Round many miles of planking have I been

Which wops in fealty to contractors hold;
Oft of one wide expanse had I been told Where dynamite had swept the traffic clean

And every passer-by must duck his bean
Or flying rocks would lay him still and cold.

As I was crossing Broadway, with surprise.

I held my breath and improvised a prayer,

I saw the solid street before me rise
And men and trolleys leap into the air.
I gazed into the pit with doubtful eyes,
Silent upon a peak in Herald Square.

The Understudy.—The lawyer had been consulted by a discouraged-looking man who professed to be in need of a divorce.

"I don't see much chance for you," the lawyer said. "I hardly think you can get a separation from your wife on the ground of her throwing things at the dog."

"But," said the haggard-looking man,
"every time she throws at the dog she hits me."

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasement associations."

A very frank book; serious, scholarly, convincing.

Paine's Age of Reason

By THOMAS PAINE, M.A.

This edition of Thomas Paine's masterpiece is the one that is sure to become the standard for all future correct editions.
It is reprinted from one of the first copies in English published by Barrois at Paris, January, 1794, and the proofs were probably read by Paine. It enables the world of the twentieth century to read Paine's AGE OF REASON as Paine wrote it in the eighteenth century. It is printed from large new type. 180 pages. 15c. T. S. Co.

THE CHRISTIAN HELL

From the First to the Twentieth Century

By

HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work.
Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

ETERNITY

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix.
In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

The British are actively consolidating the positions captured from the Bulgarians in the Lake Doiran region of Macedonia, after having promptly repulsed two savage Bulgarian counter attacks.

THE CHURCH IN RUSSIA.

The Effect the Revolution May Have on the Religious Arm of the Autocracy.

BY JOSEPH M'CABE.

THE chief clue to the interpretation of human development is geographical position. Whatever may be the precise value of isolation in biological evolution generally—a point that is still in dispute—it must be clear to any comprehensive student of history that the more isolated a human group is, the more stagnant it remains; the nearer it is to other groups with a different and stimulating culture, the more progressive it will appear. For the American a native illustration suffices. A civilization of no mean order was separately evolved upon this continent, and it was evolved in the middle region where antagonistic tribes clashed as they crossed the narrow neck. In the isolated north and south, in the depths of the forests, lingered the primitive children of the human family.

This natural principle has discredited all the old supernatural legends and mystic theories of historical development. It explains why civilization began in the valley of the Nile and the valleys of Mesopotamia, or in the thickly populated lower hills beside those desirable fertile tracts, which emerged from the water just as man learned to sow corn. It explains how Judea, in the path of armies and merchants from both (and, in the end, other) civilizations, came to learn the elements of polite culture when Europe still lay in the darkness of barbarism. It explains how, barred by the deserts and the ocean on three sides, this swelling river of culture was forced to roll toward Europe and fertilize, first Greece, then Rome. And it explains how, as the older empires sank into bloody graves, and the southern shore of the Mediterranean lay desolate, the pivot of the cultural clash and progress necessarily passed to Europe, and the white man, who happened at the time to have exchanged Odin and Zeus for Christ, became the master of the earth. By contrast it explains also the comparative unprogressiveness of the oriental civilizations, which were proportionately isolated.

This principle of development is no less active today, and is a more illuminating guide to the student than all the pretty theories of mystically-minded writers. The great powers of Europe are not "the eldest son of the church," and "God's Englishman," and "God's Germany," but the group of powers which come most naturally under the law without fatal counter-influences (such as the Papacy in Italy and Austria). The nations that have failed to reach the first rank are generally those on the fringes of the great whirlpool: Russia, the Balkan peoples and Greece, Spain and Portugal, Ireland, Scandinavia. In the central regions Rationalism, which is in the whole of history one expression of advancing culture, has made great progress. In the outlying civilizations the clergy cling successfully to the power with which they have so long prevented, as far as their interest goes, the clash of cultures which spells progress.

But we have entered upon a more dynamic, an almost explosive, stage of progress, and the old sluggishness and limitations of the working of the law seem to be yielding. No spiritual barrier against light can now long avail. The world is too inter-connected, too sensible of its new nervous system. From the clouds which so long overhung Portugal came one day a flash and a report, and almost within a week the age-long clerical tyranny was over. In Spain and Italy the same electricity accumulates. I fancy it has already accumulated in Russia, more than most Europeans and Americans imagine, and that when the great Slav giant, awakened by the fall of the throne, opens his eyes to the true history and position of his church, its power will rapidly sink, if indeed it do not depart with the violence that a disillusioned people is apt to use.

It has long been recognized by historians that the fidelity of Russia to the oriental or Greek branch of Christianity has been of incalculable disservice to the country. One must admire the Greek originators of the "schism." To be sure it was, at the bottom, the usual story of rival clerical ambitions. Constantinople was "new Rome," and therefore equal to Rome, not subject to it. The supremacy of the pope was artfully based upon the natural consideration which the rest of Europe had for Rome. When, in the fifth and sixth centuries, the other cities of the western empire sank into decay in the flood of northern barbarism, when few men learned or able enough to fight remained outside Rome, the Roman bishop easily established himself as "the head of all the churches." But Constantinople had not been weakened by the northern barbarians, and it contemptuously, sometimes with exquisite raillery, sometimes with bloody

JOSEPH McCABE.

He has written and translated more than fifty Rationalist and scientific books in the past twenty years, and is likely to produce as many more, seeing that he is now in the prime of life, with energies and ardor undiminished. The record and promise are good, seeing that, like Bruno, he passed his early manhood as a monk. He has been in America for a few months, writing and lecturing, and at this time is booked to sail for England May 12. He has promised us a parting contribution to THE TRUTH SEEKER, to appear two weeks from now.

fists, cast out the pretensions and representatives of the popes. The ambition of the popes was so naked and naïve that the Constantinopolitan clergy could not avoid imitating it. The Greek world, only differing from Rome on a hair or two of doctrine, remained independent.

At the time when this schism was completed the Slavs overran the central part of Russia from the foot of the Carpathians. From the fragmentary references to them in Greek writers, and from the early Russian chronicles, it is clear that they had no princes and no priests. They had no political or feudal organization, and the sacrifices or incantations which their simple cult of the forces in nature demanded were performed by elders or fathers of families. They were, for a people at their grade of culture, remarkable for the complete democracy of their life and the entire absence of a privileged caste in matters of religion. Both autocracy and sacerdotalism have been imposed upon them, against their primitive genius, in spite of their traditions; and we may trust that their discovery of the costly futility of the one will soon lead to a discovery of the still more costly and still more futile parasitism of the other.

As the Slav tribes were gathered, by agencies which need not be considered here, into a Russian people, intercourse with the nearest civilization was inevitable. The nearest civilization was that of Constantinople, and the rivers of southern Europe soon became veins of commerce, bearing exchangeable produce to the Black Sea and beyond. Greek priests followed Greek merchants up the rivers. The kind of "disinterested" language one hears in missionary circles in modern times would be heard in the palace and the temples of Constantinople. Legend has, as usual, so liberally embroidered the early record of the "conversion" of the Russians that we must go cautiously. But the main fact that stands out is that one of the new princes of the new Russian people, a certain blond beast of Scandinavian origin, wanted a wife (in addition to those he had, and his hundreds of concubines) from the magnificent royal family of Constantinople, and he was told that he could have one if he submitted to Christian baptism; and the genial Vladimir (who from this point onward becomes St. Vladimir) literally kicked his timber gods into the river and drove his people into the river after the idols, and the Greek priests read the magic words over the multitudes. The conversion of Russia was as spiritual as the conversion of the Roman empire had been.

And here began the disadvantage of adopting the Greek form of the superstition. To us historians it is piquant to read the pretty language of the ecclesiastical documents of the time, or of our time, and then glance at the map and picture to ourselves the historical reality. Just as the Adriatic nicely separated the rival sectarians in the south, so the Carpathians made an important barrier further north. Roman Christianity crept up Europe west of the Carpathians; Greek Christianity to the east of it. Along the Danube valley, of course, and in the Balkans the rival priests met, and they argued in the same weighty language which they used there until the other day. Western Christianity passed the latitude of the Carpathians and pushed on to the Baltic. Greek Christianity similarly, but more slowly, crept north. So that when at length a clearly defined frontier emerged, with Hungarians and Poles on one side of it and Russians on the other, they regarded each other as children of hell, pernicious heretics to be stamped out (or converted), deadly enemies. Russia was sternly isolated from the advancing culture of Europe until the time when the northern end of the barrier became "Protestant" and more or less permeable.

At first this isolation was no serious disadvantage. Byzantine civilization was a curious mixture of art and ingenuity and grossness. It had able lawyers and engineers; and it had religious faction-fights which the world can hardly match; it practiced tortures and mutilations that one reads with a shiver, and its intellectual life was strangled by the weight of priestly garments. Yet it was until the thirteenth century quite as good as western or Roman civilization, which had not yet been taught manners by the Mohammedans. The trouble was that the progressive spirit which the Arabs did infuse, and which worked slowly and steadily in medieval Europe, could not spread to Russia across the barrier of mutual religious hatred. Indeed, when the Mongols fell upon the Russians and mercilessly plundered and punished them, and the Russians appealed to their Christian neighbors in Hungary and Poland, the Hungarians and Poles would not lift a finger for people who would not submit to the pope. Russia had to remain for two centuries under the Mongol yoke, which did not improve its character. And when the Mongols could at length be driven out, the Romanist Poles and Lithuanians and Hungarians made excursions on their own account and stole large slices of Russia. Every war was, on both sides, a grand crusade for the truth, and the clergy eagerly blessed the banners and gave prompt absolution to rapers and pillagers—Russia was isolated, enfeebled, robbed, degraded lower and lower. By this time the Russian peasant had become the moujik, or "mannikin." The soldiers who served the princes were "men": the peasants, who had, as pagans, controlled their own affairs, were "mannikins."

The next step in the degradation of the Russian people puts a great deal to the account of the church. The princes of Moscow, the coldest calculators and meanest schemers of the whole petty brood of princes, rose to power on the ruins of the Mongol empire. I have nothing to do here with the artifices of the Muscovites, from whom the Romanoffs issued, but must emphasize that they were supported at every step by the clergy. In this the Russian clergy may at least claim the virtue of gratitude. The princes were much more generous to the priests and monks than the mass of the people were. Handsome churches and snug monasteries began to fill the towns. The higher clergy gathered about the throne and shared its power. The title ("Tsar") which the Slavs had been wont to give to the distant Greek Cæsar, or emperor, was borrowed by Moscow, and the clergy, bred in the sycophantic Greek tradition, found that, since the Tsar of all the Russias was the direct descendant of Constantine and the Roman emperor, his power must equally have a divine origin. The Russian people found themselves saddled by their princes and priests with a sacred autocracy against which no man dare raise his hand. The peasants, who had already become "mannikins," were now commonly called "the Christians;" that is to say, the people who, in true Christian spirit, obeyed their lords and pastors.

That early and interested association of ambitious princes and ambitious priests has lasted until our time. The most disgusting hypocrisy and brutality were tolerated in the early tsars by the clergy, because of the mutual profit of their association; and the clergy have looked on placidly during all the vagaries and excesses of the Romanoff dynasty. They have been no less on the side of the autocrat during the mighty struggle which has filled the last seven decades. A few priests have had sufficient humanity to protest against the horrible means by which the rebirth of the old Slav spirit of democracy was fought, but the great majority, and the church as an official body, have blessed autocrat after autocrat who wet the stones of Russia with Russian blood. The growing democratic spirit of Europe menaced them as much as it menaced the throne, and they sanctioned every method to keep it from the minds of the people. When the liberals of the middle-class would bring their country into line with other civilizations by reducing its appalling illiteracy, it was especially the clergy who fought the new school-movement; and the Holy Synod set up, in order to defeat the real effort at education, a system of schools in which education was reduced to a mockery, and literacy became only another means of subjection.

During the last fifty years, Rationalism has made vast progress in Russia. As happens in every country, the more completely the clergy retained their power the fiercer was the reaction on the part of those whose eyes were opened. The men and women who fell upon the stones of Moscow, or rotted in the overpopulated jails, or took the heavy road to Siberia, were not, as a rule, worshipers of ikons, nor followers of Tolstoy's quixotic effort to restore a primitive Christianity which would be as much out of place in modern times as would a Roman chariot in Fifth avenue. They were mostly Freethinkers; and there is a solid core of Freethinkers in the revolutionary movement which has so easily shaken the nervous and anæmic Nicholas II from his throne. The only book of mine which has had the honor of a Russian translation is a little work, "The War and the Churches," in which I contend that Christianity has proved morally futile.

The enlightenment of Russia in matters of religion is now inevitable, but it is at present impossible to say whether the advance will be as slow as in England and America or as rapid as in the Latin countries. Seventy-five per cent. of the Russian people are still illiterate: scattered children of the soil, upon whose dull minds the sudden reprobation of all that they have been taught to hold sacred might have an unfortunate effect. It may be that, as in Turkey, where the Young Turks who deposed Abd-ul-Hamid were largely Freethinkers, the enlightened few may be intimidated by the unenlightened mass. As in Turkey, the priests, who are eternally on the side of reaction, will be ready to go amongst their followers with the assurance that these men who overthrew the throne have proved to be "Atheists." It may be that progress on the religious side will be slow, and must wait upon the education of the people. But it takes little education to persuade a man that the clergy have been for ages the most effective supporters of the autocracy that fattened upon Russia, and the disestablishment of the church may not be far distant.

Another factor will hasten the spread of enlightenment. After the war Russia will cease to be eighty per cent. agricultural, and its industries will be developed. Large towns, which have hitherto been comparatively very scarce, will multiply. It is in the towns, where there is more education, more reading, more mental alertness, that Rationalism has made its progress. The wider industrial life will mean more clash of individual cultures, more personal thinking, more Rationalism. One more area, and a mighty area, of medievalism lies open to the light.

Cardinal Principles.

The affirmations contained in my "Confession of Faith," appearing below, comprehend what I conceive to be the basic principles and essential requisites of sane and sound, useful and helpful, and, hence, truly happy manhood and womanhood.

Just to the extent that mankind in general—the common rule rather than the uncommon exception—attains the realization of these cardinal principles, just to that extent and only to that extent, is or ever can be the real enlightenment of the human race an actual, practical, living reality.

Whatever there be in our individual lives—in our thoughts, feelings, or actions—that is dissonant to these major chords of Nature's grand symphony of the eternal ages, we may be sure is, in its final analysis, the survival of the brute instincts of our primitive racial ancestors, which Nature, in her own time and in her own way, is surely, however slowly, leaving behind, buried in the graveyard of oblivion.

The attainment of a vital consciousness of being, to some degree at least, in harmony with these eternal verities of natural law and cosmic order, spells the most profound sense of peace, trust and hope known to human experience. Instead of begetting a silly, self-satisfied feeling of contempt or cold indifference towards others, such attainment inspires a profoundly sympathetic interest in all human kind and an intense desire to share freely such fortunate experience with our brothers and sisters in humanity. And the promptings of this desire I most sincerely believe to be the truest and therefore the divinest kind of inspiration that has ever yet been vouchsafed to any human being. Here follows my

"Confession of Faith."

By one (the writer) who, facing the dawn, joyously welcomes and trusts the LIGHT and cherishes the HOPE:

TRUTH is my "God";
LOVE is my religion;
LIBERTY is my creed;
NATURE'S INTEGRITY is my faith;
HUMANITY is my hope.
HUMANISM, immortal—surviving all time—
Stands for all in man's life that's humane and sublime—
For truth, justice, freedom, for love versus fear.
For faith, courage, beauty, light, hope and good cheer.

THOMAS WELLWOOD GATES.

Most ministers imagine that any man who differs with them is a blasphemer. This word seems to leap unconsciously from their lips. They cannot imagine that another man loves liberty as much and with as sincere a devotion as they love God. They cannot imagine that another prizes liberty above all gods, even if gods exist. They cannot imagine that any mind is so that it places Justice above all persons, a mind that cannot conceive even of a God who is not bound to do justice.—Robert G. Ingersoll.

THE CASE OF BART LEGAT.

He Was the Last of the Smithfield Martyrs Burned for Upholding His Opinion.

The word heresy is derived from the Greek word hairesis, meaning a choice or election. Hence in its very primitive sense it meant the independence of the individual mind as against an opinion authorized or established by law, or by influence of the majority. It is now used almost exclusively in a religious sense, as applied to those not in accord with the popular religion of a country. Catholics use it against any who do not accept their particular dogmas. Protestants seldom apply it, but when they do, it is generally used against those who reject Christianity as a system. In the Acts of the Apostles the word heresy is used in references to a sect or a party. Here it carries no implication of moral turpitude. Paul was proud to say, "After the manner you call heresy, worship I the God of my fathers." In the epistles and in the writings of the early Christian fathers, there is attached to it a moral stigma. This idea took root, and grew until heresy was looked upon as a crime.

Under the common law of England, the heretic was tried in the provincial synod by the archbishop and his council, and if convicted was turned over to the king to be punished as his pleasure would dictate. A statute of 2 Henry IV, chapter 15, took the case out of the hands of the king, and turned it over, if the offender was found guilty, to the civil authorities.

Those who say that the rise of Protestantism abolished religious persecution and punishment for heresy speak without knowledge, as we will hereafter show. We read in English history of the Catholic queen "Bloody Mary." But we are seldom referred to the fact that her successor, the Protestant so-called "Virgin" queen, Elizabeth, caused the execution of many more victims as heretics. In the year 1559, the third of her reign, the "Act of Supremacy" was passed. This made the queen supreme in ecclesiastical affairs. The "Act of Conformity," passed about the same time, made the use of any form of worship, except that of the Church of England, punishable, for the first offense by the forfeiture of goods and chattels; for the second, imprisonment for a year; and for the third, imprisonment for life. The only effective brake upon the murderous spirit of the church, Catholic and Protestant, has been the growth of intelligence among the people.

Smithfield is an open space in London consisting of five and three-quarters acres. For centuries it was used as a market for sheep, horses, cattle and hay, and later as a place for tournaments, the execution of criminals and the burning of heretics. Here, Wat Tyler, at the head of thirty thousand peasants, met in battle King Richard II and was stabbed by Walworth, mayor of London. Here were executed the martyrs of unpopular religious opinion from the year 1401 until 1612, when Bartholomew Legat, the last victim was burned at the stake during the reign of the good Protestant king, James I, called the "Defender of the Faith." This man, Legat, was born about the year 1575. His occupation was dealing in cloth. Early in the seventeenth century he became a preacher among a sect called the "Seekers." They appear to have held unorthodox opinions concerning Christ. In the indictment against Legat he is accused of holding and teaching the following thirteen heresies:

- "I. That the creeds called the Nicene Creed and Athanasian Creed, contain not a profession of the true Christian faith, or that he will not profess his faith according to the same creeds.
- "II. That Christ is not God of God, begotten, not made, but begotten and made.
- "III. That there are no persons in the Godhead.
- "IV. That Christ was not God from everlasting, but began to be God when he took flesh of the Virgin Mary.
- "V. That the world was not made by Christ.
- "VI. That the Apostles teach Christ to be man only.
- "VII. That there is no generation in God, but of creatures.
- "VIII. That this assertion, God to be made man, is contrary to the rule of faith and monstrous blasphemy.
- "IX. That Christ was not God otherwise than an anointed God.
- "X. That Christ was not before the fulness of time except by promise.
- "XI. That Christ was not in the form of God equal with God, that is, in the substance of God, but in righteousness and giving salvation.
- "XII. That Christ in his Godhead wrought no miracles.
- "XIII. That Christ is not to be prayed unto."

To teach these doctrines was then among the worst of crimes, although in so doing Legat was merely the precursor of the Unitarians, who even now in the view of ultra-orthodox Christians are considered as deserving of damnation as the Infidel.

In 1611, Bartholomew Legat and his brother Thomas were thrown into prison for heresy.

Thomas died in Newgate jail, but Bartholomew's treatment in prison was not severe. Efforts were made by the Consistory Court of London to induce him to renounce his heretical opinions. On several occasions he was brought before King James, who attempted to argue with him. On one of these the king, on finding that Legat no longer prayed to Christ, "in choler spurned at him with his foot; 'Away, base fellow' (saith he) 'it shall never be said that one stayeth in my presence, that hath never prayed to our saviour for seven years together'."

The Encyclopedia Britannica refers to Legat as a "fanatic." He was certainly more than this, or the king would not have taken so much interest in his case. As his trial was delayed, he threatened to bring a suit for false imprisonment. This hastened his trial and his doom. He was now brought before a full Consistory Court, found guilty of heresy and delivered to the secular powers, as were Bruno, Vanini, Huss and others by the Catholic church, for execution. The writ of execution read as follows:

"The King to the Sheriffs of London, Greeting; Whereas the Reverend Father in Christ John Bishop of London, hath signified unto Us, that when he in a certain business of Heretical Pravity against one Bartholomew Legat our subject of the City of London, of the said Bishop of London's Diocese and Jurisdiction, rightly and lawfully proceeding by Acts enacted, drawn, purposed, and by the Confessions of the said Bartholomew Legat, before the said Bishop judiciously made and acknowledged, hath found in the said Bartholomew Legat very many wicked Errors, false opinions, Heresies, and cursed Blasphemies, and impious doctrines, expressly contrary and repugnant to the Catholic Faith and Religion, and the holy Word of God, Knowingly and maliciously and with a pertinacious and obdurate plainly incorrigible mind, to believe, hold, affirm and publish; the same Reverend Father, the Bishop of London, with the Advice and Consent, as well of the Reverend Bishops and other Divines, as also of men learn'd in the Law, in Judgment sitting and assisting; the same Bartholomew Legat by his definitive Sentence, hath pronounced, decreed, and declared to be obdurate, contumacious and incorrigible Heretick, and upon that occasion as a stubborn Heretick, and rotten contagious Member to be cut off from the Church of Christ, and the Communion of the Faithful; Whereas the Holy Mother Church hath not further to do and prosecute in this part, the same Reverend Father hath lift the aforesaid Bartholomew Legat as a Blasphemous Heretick, to our Secular Power, to be punish'd with condign Punishment, as by the Letters Patent of the said Reverend Father in Christ, the Bishop of London in this behalf, above made hath been certified unto Us in our Chancery. We, therefore, as a Zealot of Justice and a defender of the Catholic Faith, and willing to maintain and defend the holy church, and Rights and Liberties of the same, and the Catholic Faith: And such Heresies and Errors every where, what in us lieth, to root out and extirpate, and to punish with condign Punishment such Hereticks, so convicted, and deeming that such an Heretick in form aforesaid to be convicted and condemned according to the Laws and Customs of this our Kingdom of England in this past accustomed, ought to be burned with Fire; We do command you, that the said Bartholomew Legat, being in your Custody, you do commit publically to the Fire, before the people, in a Publick and open Place in West Smithfield, for the cause aforesaid, and that you Cause the said Bartholomew Legat to be really burned in the same Fire, in detestation of the said Crime, for the manifest Example of other Christians, lest they slide into the same fault, and this that in no wise you omit, under the Peril that shall follow thereon, Witness, etc."

This barbarous indictment was issued on the 14th of March, and the warrant for execution on the sixteenth. The execution took place on the eighteenth of March, 1612. "Legate refused all overtures for his recantation, and about midday on 18 March, 1612, he was burned at West Smithfield amid a vast 'conflux of people.'"

This is what Christianity did to civilize and humanize mankind in Protestant England in the year 1612! How fortunate we are that at the same period were produced the dramas of Shakespeare, the philosophy of Bacon, the poetry of Spenser and the discoveries of Francis Drake and Walter Raleigh—things with which religion had nothing to do! Were it not for these, we would think the England of that day a nation of savages, worse than the Zulus, the American Indian or any other that history records. In the following month, April, 1612, Edward Wightman was burned for heresy in Lichfield, the last execution for that offense in England.

It is dogmatically asserted by the Christian zealot, and mouthed by the Christian hypocrite that to Christianity we owe all the good things we enjoy. Behold them three hundred years ago, and behold them now. The only difference is that then God was great and man was small, while now man is of great proportions, and God insignificant. In recent years, the shooting of Ferrer, the prosecution of Mockus for blasphemy, the occasional mobbing and murder of speakers, arrests for violation of Sunday laws, are but the groans of a dying Christianity, and the death rattle in the throat of Christian priesthood.

In the Trenches in France.

DR. LYMAN ABBOTT: If we had not advertised that we were at war with Germany on February 12, the government might not have discovered it in April.

REV. C. S. EATON: And we should have missed this for which we have been waiting through two mortifying years.

REV. MANNING: Is not the noise appalling?

DR. HIBBEN: Better take off your gold cross; it is a good target.

REV. MANNING: No. I go in the panoply of the Lord, and trust in his protection.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT: In ten minutes we charge. Look out for Bill Bryan. I suspect a yellow streak.

REV. EATON: I'll see that he goes through with it or never lives to make another peace treaty.

REV. MANNING: Let us pray for guidance in the charge.

REV. EATON: And for strength to do the Lord's will.

DR. HIBBEN: No service can be greater than killing Germans.

REV. MANNING (reading his Testament): Ye have heard that it hath been said, "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth," but I say unto you . . .

REV. EATON: Stop there; this is war.

DR. ABBOTT: It seems incongruous that those who preach the sermon on the mount should strive to kill their enemies.

REV. EATON: Not at all. We preached war and should kill Germans ourselves if we urge others to do so.

T. R.: Forward! Follow the barage.

ALL: "Onward, Christian Soldiers."

(In a few minutes they reach the enemy's trench and begin the slaughter. L. A. shoots an anaemic German in the head. The Rev. M. is hit by a bullet that penetrates to a Timothy in one of the fourteen Testaments he has fastened around his bosom.)

W. J. BRYAN (calling into a dug-out): Any one down there? (Goes down to see and is murdered.)

DR. HIBBEN (casting a bomb): Hurl the bombs first and ask afterwards.

T. R.: Take no prisoners. Clean the trenches.

REV. MANNING: Lyman, give me a hand. I can't pull this bayonet out of this German; he is so fat.

L. A. (assisting): How the blood spurts!

REV. MANNING: Christ's blood was shed for us.

ANGELIC VOICE: And for the Germans. (All stand aghast, but only for a second, for there are more to be killed.)

REV. EATON: We must scourge the Boche from the earth as our master did the legally employed from the temple.

DR. HIBBEN: This is the psychological moment. See; there is a Prussian kneeling.

REV. MANNING (to Prussian): Are you addressing the orthodox God?

PRUSSIAN: Kamarad; kamarad.

REV. EATON (stabbing him): It is a trick; the Boches do not pray. Come on, fellers; this is better than running a milk route.

T. R.: We have conquered in the name of Ezekiel and Armageddon.

ALL: We have done the Lord's work to-day.

[Just then a message from the Lord God of Hosts (not the German tribal God) burst among them, a glorious, ennobling, legitimate shell, the emblem of strife for the tender Jesus, intended to convert the wicked. They all fell prone—and I awoke.]

DREAMER.

What Agnosticism Is.

"Agnosticism is the essence of science, whether ancient or modern. It simply means that a man shall not say he knows or believes that which he has no authentic grounds for professing to know or believe."—HUXLEY.

LET me reply to certain correspondents of THE TRUTH SEEKER who seem to be considerably at sea about Agnosticism. First let me state, Huxley is not the father of Agnostics, honest or otherwise, as one writer asserts. Professor Huxley merely invented a word that defines a condition of mind older than civilization.

In the article entitled "Agnosticism vs. Spiritualism," in a recent issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, it is charged, among other things, that Agnosticism is Know nothingism and do nothingism. It is mental stagnation. . . . A negative philosophy. "Agnosticism teaches that it is impossible to know anything of a future life."

If the correspondent making these statements about Agnosticism wishes to tell what Agnosticism is not, he has admirably succeeded. Professor Huxley coined the word Agnosticism and he should be good authority as to its meaning. In his book, "Science and Christian Tradition," he says: "Agnosticism in fact is not a creed but a method, the essence of which lies in the rigorous application of a single principle. That principle is of great antiquity; it is as old as Socrates, as old as the writer who said: 'Try all things; hold fast by that which is good.' It is the foundation of the Reformation, which simply illustrates the axiom that every man should be able to give a reason for the faith that is in him. It is the fundamental axiom of modern science. Positively the principle may be expressed: In matters of the intellect, follow your reason as far as it will take you, without regard to any other consideration. And negatively: In matters of the intellect do not pretend that conclusions are certain which are not demonstrated or demonstrable. That I take to be the Agnostic faith, which if a man keep whole and undefiled, he shall not be ashamed to look the universe in the face, whatever the future may have in store for him. . . . As Agnostics we have not the slightest objection to believe anything you like, if you will only give us good grounds for belief."

If I may add to the definition of so able a man I would say that all Agnostics hail from Missouri—they have to be shown. As a rule they are poor subjects for proselytizers.

In his book Professor Huxley has the following to say about Spiritualists: "It is interesting to note the fact that the arguments of the latest school of Spiritualists present a wonderful family likeness to those which adorn the subtle disquisitions of the advocates of ecclesiastical miracles of forty years ago. It is unfortunate for the Spiritualists that, over and over again, celebrated and trusted media are either proved in courts of law to be fraudulent impostures; or in sheer weariness, it would seem, of the honest dupes who swear by them, spontaneously confess their long continued iniquities, as the Fox woman did the other day in New York. See the New York World for Sunday, October 21, 1888, and the Report of the Seybert Commission, Philadelphia, 1887." E. GROSSER, Denver, Col.

Historical Dates.

It has always been difficult to determine the exact dates of the chief events of Jesus' life, but the discussion attracts many of the best thinkers among the theologians, and the conclusion reached by some of them within the last two years is enlightening.

While the dates of their hero were in doubt, it was difficult for the Christians to refute the mythical interpretation of the gospels, but study of scientific, or historical, data usually ends in a consensus of opinion. Here is the unanimous opinion, tabulated:

Dr. Lyman Abbott, Editor of Outlook	BIRTH. ?	DEATH. April, A.D. 34
Thomas James Thorburn, D.D., LL.D.	8 B.C.	A.D. 29
Professor Husband of Dartmouth	6 or 5 B.C.	Nisan 14, A.D. 33

Now, Dr. Abbott can not be questioned; nor can Dr. Thorburn, for he won the $6,000 prize from the Bross Foundation in 1915 for his book refuting the mythical theory; and Professor Husband's book was examined by several Princeton professors before publication.

Perhaps we must reach Billy Sunday's conclusion about the consensus of scholarship, or perhaps theological scholarship is different from scientific scholarship. These men who are horrified if one questions the credibility of the Bible ignore the facts mentioned therein which serve to set the dates, such as the unusual star in the East, the slaughter of the male babes, and the multitude of angels. Dr. Thorburn is convinced that his date for the birth is correct because "the new moon could have been seen just after sunset on March 4 in that year." He does not state in what month the birth occurred.

Other less conspicuous personages, of more ancient date, who were born in the usual way have been given definite days for birth and death: Virgil, Oct. 15, 70 B.C.—Sept. 21, 19 B.C. Cicero, Jan. 3, 106 B.C.—Dec. 7, 43 B.C. There is some doubt about the exact date of birth of Plato and Socrates, but their deaths are definitely recorded; and they antedated Jesus by about 350 years. A. M.

SATURDAY - - - MAY 12, 1917

Anyone who is seeking the light and living in the darkness of Roman Catholicism should look upon excommunication from the Roman Catholic church as a step in the right direction and a help towards the truth. Anything, no matter what, benefits man that severs his relations with Romanism, the most abominable aggregation of lies and impositions on earth.

The dead words and dead phrases in one language would fill several ash-cans. I make bold to say that every word of religion is a dead word, and should be eliminated from our language. What sense is there in any act of worship? Let men and women sing, but let them sing the truth, not religious lies. Preaching and praying are unnecessary and foolish. A church stands for superstitions that make humanity the prey of an unscrupulous priesthood.

Man needs to get it into his head that Jesus did not pay any debt that he owes to the world. Every living man is obliged to pay his debts to nature, to his race and to himself. The "atonement" did not cancel any of man's physical, mental or moral obligations, for there was no atonement. Jesus died because he could not save himself, not to help you or me. The men who enlist in our army or navy makes a greater sacrifice than ever Jesus made.

If God answers the prayers of men then must one conclude that most men have prayed for poverty, for disease, for suffering, for vice, for these are the things that one finds in the homes of men. Is it true that God answers the prayers of men? Pray and see, and abide by the test. You cannot take a priest's word. Take your own experience. A priest might lie, but experience tells the truth. I am forced to believe that men do not want the truth.

The Roman Catholic church looks upon woman as chiefly a child-bearing animal. In all Roman countries their women are little more than beasts of burden, and the church, which they support so loyally and defend so nobly, does little or nothing to advance their social condition. If you wish to judge the Roman Catholic church in foreign lands look upon the women that come to our shores from those lands and see in their degradation the spirit and purpose of religious Romanism.

And at last man's necessity has surpassed God's importance. It is well! Man can work in his garden on Sundays without being liable to arrest for violating a "holy" command. What, forsooth, is holier than man? Not the Christian God, if you please, neither father nor son nor holy ghost. Man, their creator, is holier than all of them. Humanity is a call that man is to heed above divinity. To raise something to eat is more sacred than keeping the Sabbath holy. L. K. W.

Will Taxation Be Equal?

It is of small use—probably of no use whatever—to protest against the tax the government proposes to put on the country to carry on the war. The tax-eaters are in the saddle; the war gives them their opportunity, and they will not overlook it. Everybody will have to pay, for incomes of a thousand dollars are to be taxed, and few men are getting sufficient food and shelter and doing any good works without that amount of income from some source. The cost of living has gone far beyond the dreams of the food manipulators who get the profit from it. All must live beyond their means, while economy is impossible except through starvation. For this the war is not to blame, although the war aggravates the situation. It has been apparent for the past twenty years that exaggeration of the importance of manufacture at the expense of agriculture would bring us where we are. The consumers have multiplied and the producers diminished. The strength of the land has been drained to the cities, and the product has gone down the sewers to the sea instead of being returned to its source. The big city is an unwholesome gathering and discharge. We have been sending produce abroad for prices smaller than those obtaining at home, and the home consumer pays the loss. Grain has gone to the distilleries and sugar to the candy shop and confectioners. Higher wages in town have depopulated the country, decreasing production, and foolish health laws have added a confiscatory cost to distribution. To keep prices up, commission merchants can have whole cargoes condemned that threaten to lower the market. Suburban peoples who might raise their own fruit and vegetables give up their grounds to shade trees and lawns, and carry home their fruit and vegetables from the city. Vacant lots and tracts grow weeds and brush instead of potatoes and corn, because some towns could be searched without finding a plow or a man who knows how to hold one. The war tax is a misfortune, but the high cost of living is our own fault.

After this diatribe, and as we prepare to pay our tax, we wish to inquire whether this burden is to be equally distributed. We scan the proposed tax and revenue bills without finding in them any mention of those old offenders, the tax-dodging churches. We expect to see the preachers of the gospel, with salaries from $1,000 to $5,000 and upward, exempted from the income tax. Such tax-dodging and such exemption has been an evil from the beginning, but in these times it has the appearance of an outrageous discrimination in favor of a parasitic class.

The church owns in New York city about $300,000,000 worth of property, from which the revenue would be something like $5,000,000 if it were equally taxed with the other ratables. But the assessor passes this property by and descends on a business like that of the Truth Seeker Company, on which, from the nature of the stock in trade, the sheriff would hardly get a bid if he put it up at auction. A man who has raised a family of boys subject to military duty will pay a tax on his home and his savings; the bachelor prelate, with no acknowledged sons and with a fortune in his possession, need not pay anything to support the government or defend the country.

These are facts, and, as Paine says, facts need but little argument when they prove themselves. We are at war for the vindication of democracy. Let us inaugurate at home the democracy of equal and impartial taxation.

The Mockus Brief.

When the case of Michael X. Mockus, indicted in Connecticut for blasphemy, was argued last winter, the trial was continued until the spring term to enable Mr. Schroeder, counsel for the defense, to reduce his lengthy argument to writing. Then came the determination to enlarge the argument and to print it, and thus make it available for all future cases and purposes. Mr. Schroeder has been working at this task from ten to twelve hours a day for over six months, sometimes with paid assistants. He has gathered so much of unique and original material that it would be impossible to use it to good advantage if the case should be called in May, as was contemplated. Now Mr. Schroeder reports that the prosecuting attorney has consented to another extension of time.

About 150 pages of the argument are in type. This is probably less than one-third of it, and yet gives us a clue as to what the whole will be. It does not promise interesting reading for the average man, because it will be encyclopedic on the subject of which it treats. In its preparation nearly a dozen of the largest libraries in the country have been exhausted, including Yale University and the New York Public. Material not otherwise accessible has been forwarded from Harvard University for inspection in New York city. One pamphlet-report of a blasphemy trial which could be found only in the Congressional Library was photographed in its entirety. Another has not been found outside the British Museum, and an effort is being made to have that photographed also, to make its contents available. By such painstaking thoroughness this argument will abstract and report about twice as many English prosecutions for religious crimes between 1600 and 1820 as have ever before been gathered into a single collection. All these will be so marshaled as to shed light upon the constitutional questions involved in the Mockus case. This same material will also have some more remote bearing upon every kind of a free speech controversy in this country.

One unique feature of the argument will be a review of the historic controversy for religious liberty in England and America. Mr. Schroeder's point is that our constitutional provisions for religious liberty are the final judgment for the reversal of a governmental policy. If we wish to interpret our constitutions correctly, so he contends, we can do so only by a thorough study of the historic issues which resulted in the adoption of these constitutional provisions. In its negative aspects one factor of that controversy was the effort to make impossible the future punishment of blasphemy, in any of its phases or under any of its various names. In its positive aspect one can see that the dissenters not only demanded but defined religious liberty. It was their view of religious liberty, and not that of the persecuting English priests or English courts, which must determine the meaning of our constitutional guarantees of free speech. According to this viewpoint it became necessary for the compiler to read a great mass of the controversial literature of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries to discover the stray sentences or paragraphs in which religious liberty might be defined. In this way it was discovered that there was quite a uniform idea of what was meant by free speech in relation to religion. Through the work of Roger Williams, James Madison and Thomas Jefferson that view of religious liberty (first held by the English dissenters) came to be written into our Constitution. This, then, is the historic method of interpreting that instrument. Very few libraries contain such material as is being worked into this argument. In consequence, it is not enough to make a general statement about it and then give a reference in justification. Few could find the book to see if the generalization was justified. Hence very extensive quotations have become necessary. This treatment tends to make rather tedious reading except for the serious student, who now finds the advantage of having been in possession of vast original materials not otherwise accessible.

The method is new in its application to free speech. The result, it is believed, will be conclusive for any open-minded judge. No one has ever before made such an exhaustive study of the subject, and it may be a century or more before another person will be found who will combine Mr. Schroeder's special qualifications for such work with an equally obsessing interest to get it done. It is therefore of the utmost importance that this book be made as complete as possible and circulated as widely as possible. That part of it depends upon the Freethinkers of America. Mr. Schroeder is doing more than his part.

As the scope of the work expands the expense increases accordingly. The cost of making plates is $1.25 per page. If the book should run to 400 pages there would be an expense of $500 without a single copy of the book being yet printed. Thus far we have collected through THE TRUTH SEEKER about $350. Of course, Mr. Schroeder gets nothing for his time and pays his own expenses for type-writing and other clerical assistance. Neither does THE TRUTH SEEKER have any financial interest in the enterprise. At least a thousand copies of the book should be printed for free circulation. That means that we need about $700 more to insure an adequate distribution where it will do the most good, to public libraries and to editors. To all persons contributing a dollar or more a copy of the brief will be sent with the names of all contributors printed therein. If one has the intelligence to see the importance of this work and of getting a most important judicial precedent established, he will send a contribution proportionately large, and see to it also that others contribute. It is hoped that a few of the more affluent friends will send in subscriptions of $50 or $100. Mr. Schroeder is doing his work thoroughly. Our part will not be done thoroughly unless enough money is supplied, not only to pay the printer, but to insure a wide distribution, especially in the public libraries of the country. Such libraries seldom buy books of this character. Even if they did, we have not the facilities for circularizing them economically. Therefore it is up to the interested Freethinker. What will you give—now?

Self and Truth.

No phase of the human mind more thoroughly puzzles the critical thinker than that which gives its approval to the teachings and practices of religion. Many times has the question been asked, Why is it that so many persons of equal intelligence with ourselves cannot see the mythical character of religion, and the futility of its ceremonies and promises? For hundreds of years men have labored to understand this elusive mental phenomenon with a success quite incommensurate with the distinguished importance of the subject. This want of success, it seems to us, has been due in a large measure to the failure to realize the conspicuous part played by the individual unit in certain men's unwillingness to learn the actual truth of things.

Upon the battle-field of life there are two masters, the master known as self, and the master called Truth. The master self is that rebellious one whose weapons are passion, pride, avarice, vanity, and self-will, implements of error and darkness. The master Truth is that quiet, lowly one whose weapons are gentleness, patience and thoughtful investigation, which are the instruments of light. He who is immersed in self regards his own opinions as Truth, and the opinions of other men as error. But the patient Truth-lover who has learned to distinguish between opinion and Truth, does not seek to defend his opinions against theirs because of any peculiar merit of his own, but is ready to sacrifice those opinions, if wisdom requires it, that he may manifest the spirit of Truth which to be best appreciated must be lived.

Men engage in heated controversies and foolishly imagine they are defending the Truth, when in reality they are merely defending their own petty interests and perishable opinions. The follower of self takes up arms against others; the follower of Truth takes up arms against himself. Truth, being unchangeable and eternal, is independent of your opinion and of ours. When men are enslaved by self, are passionate, proud and condemnatory, they believe their particular creed or religion to be the Truth, and all other religions or communities of no religion to be error; and they proselyte with impassioned ardor. If religion is conceivable at all, there can be but one religion, the religion of Truth. It is not a formal belief; it is the reasoned apprehension of the reality of things by the truly unselfish and aspiring nature.

Those who have lost themselves in the devious ways of error and self, and have forgotten the very existence of Truth and its value as an agency for good, set up artificial standards by which to judge other men and their religious or non-religious ideas, and make acceptance of and adherence to their own particular theology, philosophy or science, the test of Truth; and so men are divided one against another, and there is ceaseless enmity and strife, unending sorrow and pain. As one succeeds in overcoming personal opinions he will begin to see things in their right relations. He who is swayed by any passion, prejudice, like or dislike, adjusts everything to that particular bias, and sees only his own delusions. He who is absolutely free from passion, prejudice, preference and partiality, sees himself as he is; sees others as they are; sees all things in their proper proportions and in the just scale of their significance.

Men cannot understand Truth while they make themselves and their inherited opinions the arbiter of Truth. Many believe that self is the only reality, whereas it may be the one great delusion.

"Self is the only prison that can ever bind the soul; Truth is the only warder that can bid the gates unroll; And when it comes to call thee, arise and follow fast; Its way may lie through darkness, but it leads to light at last."

The self-satisfied religionist regards the loss of his mental prestige, his intellectual composure and his standing among his coreligionists as the greatest calamities which can befall him. The man of principle and broad sympathies, set upon knowing the essential character of things, looks upon these conditions as comparatively insignificant, and not to be weighed in the balance with the loss of Truth. To desert Truth for any temporal gain whatever is, to him, the only happening which can be called a calamity. Only when one has broken away from the tyranny of custom, tradition, conventionality, and the opinions of others, will he succeed in walking alone and erect amongst men.

The strongest chains by which men are bound are self-forged. Men are chained to that which causes narrowness of vision, dullness of apprehension, and contentedness with falsehood because they desire to be so, because they love their chains, because they think their little dark prison of self is sweet and beautiful, and they are afraid that if they desert that prison they will lose all that is real and worth having.

"Goodwill gives insight" and only he who has so conquered his personality that the sole attitude of mind is that of sincere goodwill towards every species of Truth, is capable of distinguishing the true from the false. Error is involved in the darkness of unfathomable complexity, and thus not always easy to recognize and eliminate, but the glory of Truth is its simplicity. Love of self shuts men out from Truth, and seeking their own personal happiness they lose the deeper, purer, and more abiding joy. The intolerant and condemnatory, even though they claim to profess the highest religion, have the smallest measure of Truth; while those have Truth in fullest measure who exercise patience, listen calmly and dispassionately to all sides, and both arrive themselves at thoughtful and unbiased conclusions upon questions and issues, and incline others to them. They take no interest in formulating perishable dogmas and calling them eternal Truth. A creed subscribed to as ultimate Truth and sworn to be defended, not only puts a bar to further research, but as a consequence throws the odium of distrust on all that may seem to oppose it. "There is no skepticism so offensive as that which doubts the facts of honest and careful observation—no infidelity so gross as that which disbelieves the deductions of competent and unbiased judgments."

Truth will never be proved by wordy arguments and learned treatises alone, for when men refuse to cultivate an open mind, to study the origin of things, to sacrifice personal feelings and self-exultation for the sake of a more abiding happiness, no words can ever prove it to them. Truth cannot be limited; it can never be the special prerogative of any man, school, or nation; and when personality steps in, Truth is in danger of being lost. The reason, then, that religious believers seem unable to appreciate the unstable character of their position is, so far as we view the matter, the result of the personal self dominating the higher qualities of the mind,—the pride of self fighting against the efficacy of Truth.

The Quick and the Dead.

Much that is written by Dr. Frank Crane, contributor to a syndicate of newspapers, is to be admired because of the writer's progressive and humanitarian sentiments; but Dr. Crane is no natural philosopher, and he has been misled by inspiration. He says:

"Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die."

"There is no life that is not prepared by death. Death is the door of life."

"A grain of wheat may live in one of two ways—it may be planted and grow other grains, or it may be made into bread and nourish men. In both cases it must be destroyed before it is rendered useful. It must rot in the ground to sprout, or it must be ground to flour in order to make a loaf.

"The apple blossom's exquisite existence perishes so that the fruit may come into life."

"All living things emerge from the womb of death."

"In time all sects must die, that religion may live; all nations must die, that humanity may live; all schools must die, that education may live; all people must die, that their children's children may live; all systems of truth, all statements of truth, all creeds must die, that truth may live and be evergreen."

"The universe is deciduous, not everlasting."

"We die—forward."

"Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die."

Noting these statements, a correspondent of THE TRUTH SEEKER comments:

"Is not Dr. Crane's argument built on a fallacy? Was not St. Paul entirely wrong to begin with? If a seed die in the ground it cannot germinate or bring forth new vegetable or grain. Rotten, dead or dried-up seeds are not sown because they will not produce. That 'all living things emerge from the womb of death,' as Dr. Crane says, is just the opposite of scientific truth. The dead do not produce. It is from the womb of life that living things emerge."

The science of the Bible is generally at fault. Paine fell upon this passage (1 Cor. xv, 36), and replying to Paul in his own language said: "Thou fool, Paul; that which thou sowest is not quickened unless it die not; for the grain that dies in the ground never does, nor can, vegetate. It is only the living grains that produce the next crop." Paul was trying to prove the resurrection, but as Paine pointed out, he only showed there was a succession.

Exception might be taken to Dr. Crane's affirmation that all sects must die that religion may live, since here there is the same succession. The living sects seem inclined to multiply as religion dies. We are assured that the age of faith is in the past, but it is unlikely that there were ever so many sects as at the present time, when about 145 exist in the United States alone. The sects produce their successors before they die. A Babylonian sect probably produced Judaism, which produced Christianity, and was mixed up with Egyptian religion and paganism in producing the Catholic sect. That all nations must die is not a necessary conclusion. All people do die, of course, but not at the moment of reproduction, which is not a mortal act; nor do truths die to give way to other truths. It is the falsehood that goes when truth appears; particularly that falsehood of Paul's that "that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die."

We owe our picture of Joseph McCabe to the courtesy of Mr. Wm. M. van der Weyde, who is president of the Thomas Paine Association and an artist of reputation in photography, as his many pictures in high-class publications attest. Mr. McCabe himself says it is the most successful photograph he has ever sat for, though "taken" many times in England and the colonies. Mr. van der Weyde has some of these photographs for sale. They are artistically mounted, 10x15 inches, suitable for framing (being about four times the size of our reproduction). The price is a dollar per copy. The artist may be addressed at his studio, 12 East Fifteenth street, New York. This, by the way, is a low-priced photograph for "Van" to make. His specialty is taking notables, as in this instance, and publishers who buy only the best do not mind paying $5 or $10 for a specimen of his art.

Dr. David Starr Jordan of Stanford University is among the good losers. Having as a pacifist incurred the unmeasured scorn and abuse of the militants, he now, since the President's proclamation and declaration of war, speaks:

"Our country is now in a state of emergency. I would not stand against war, but that is not the way to stand together. The rope may in the end break, and hasten the day."

THE CORRIDORS OF TIME.

How We Came Down Them, What We Are, and Whither We Are Headed.

By SAM ATKINSON.

About sixteen hundred years ago a series of lectures were delivered in Alexandria upon the three questions, "Whence came I? What am I? Whither do I go?" They were addressed to the Neoplatonic school by Hypatia. For her questionings she was attacked by an infuriated mob of Christians led by Cyril, bishop of Alexandria. She was dragged from her chariot, her throat was cut, she was stripped, torn limb from limb, and her dismembered bones were burnt piecemeal.

The first of the great army of martyrs for freedom of thought was a woman.

Since then, many have been persecuted who tried to grapple honestly with these great questions, and even in this enlightened age it means metaphorical crucifixion to give any other answers except those recognized by the teachers of supernaturalism. We will open two books to seek an answer to the first of these questions, Whence came I?

The first book is that of Revelation, where we are told that about five thousand years ago God made man in his own image, presumably a perfect creature. He gathered a large quantity of mud, fashioned it in shape like his own, left it against the fence to dry, then breathed upon it, and Adam was the result. But his first mistake was soon pointed out. While he had created every living thing with a mate, he had overlooked Adam, so he made a few passes and threw him into a hypnotic sleep, took a cutlet from his ribs, cogitated a little while as to "whether he should make a blonde or a brunette," then made the cutlet into a woman. He then placed the pair in a beautiful garden, with no father-in-law or mother-in-law to interfere, and from these happy surroundings came the human family. Unfortunately, God had planted a tree in the same garden the fruit of which would not agree with man, so he cautioned the pair not to eat it, but the fellow was weaker-willed than the woman and gave way to temptation, afterwards blaming the woman for his fall. When I get to this point I feel too disgusted to speak about it any more. That was such a poor kind of a man to start a world with. But we have another account of the same happening, except that this account dates back about four thousand years before the other, only Christian people are able to prove to their own satisfaction that the first account was really borrowed from the second even though it was recorded so long afterwards. In this account it was the Supreme Brahma who made the first pair. Their names were Amond and Heva. He placed them upon the Island of Ceylon for their courtship, and surrounded them with all the luxuries of a tropical clime. Even here, however, they were interrupted by a third person, the devil, who created a mirage over on the mainland more attractive than their surroundings. A narrow strip of land connected Ceylon with the mainland. Amond seized Heva in his arms and carried her across, when a mighty earthquake took place, the strip of land disappeared, and above the tumult was heard the angry voice of the Supreme Brahma cursing them, when Amond spoke up and said: "Curse me if thou wilt, but spare her, for it was not her fault but mine." That's the kind of a man worth while. But the woman got the last word. She said, "If thou wilt not spare him, spare neither me, for I love him." And the Supreme Brahma replied: "I will spare you both and watch over you." That is certainly the better story of the two.

But let us turn over the pages of the second book which deals with this question, the Book of Nature. Let us see what has been written in the rocks by man himself. If we turn back to the page dealing with the Paleolithic, or Stone Age, we find the flint and stone, bone, horn and wood implements man used as he was coming up from his animal estate. The records show that he was then contending with the beasts for supremacy. On the next page we find an account of the Neolithic, or Newer Stone Age, showing that man was improving in the dreds of thousands of years in all probability, leads us to believe that man was not the object of a special creative act, but sprang from the animal kingdom and has worked his way upwards by a long and painful development.

In order to verify this idea, we have been trying to trace man's ancestry. We find that his nearest relatives in the animal kingdom are the four anthropoid apes, and later discoveries have demonstrated that there is a closer relationship between man and the apes than there is between the apes and the monkeys. In his "Last Words on Evolution" Haeckel says: "Candid comparison of the five skeletons shows that they are not only very like each other generally, but are identical in the structure, arrangement and connection of all the parts. The same 200 bones compose the skeleton in man and the four anthropoid apes—the same 300 muscles serve to move the various parts of the skeleton. The same hair covers the skin; the same mammary glands provide food for the young. The same four-chambered heart acts as central pumps of the circulation; the same 32 teeth are found in the jaws; the same reproductive organs maintain the species; the same group of neurona and ganglionic cells compose the wondrous structure of the brain, and accomplish that highest function of the plasm which we call the soul."

The theory of man's animal origin is proven also by the transfusion of blood. If the blood of the dog and the fox or the rabbit and the hare is mixed together, the living blood-cells remain uninfluenced. But if the blood of the dog and the rabbit or the fox and the hare is mixed, a struggle for life immediately takes place between the two kinds of blood cells. After making hundreds of tests it has been found that the blood of the anthropoid apes and man have no injurious effects when mixed, though both have a destructive effect upon lower animals. Embryology testifies to this relationship. The child in the womb begins as a cell and develops through all the stages of its animal ancestry. It becomes in turn a worm, a fish, a quadruped, an ape, and then a human baby. At a certain stage it is covered entirely with hair. As the thumb is widely separated in the hand of the ape, doubtless because of its climbing propensity, at a certain stage in the human embryo this phenomenon appears. Many useless rudimentary organs, of which there are one hundred and seven, are further evidence of his origin. If man is not descended from the animal kingdom, how are the coccyx—the vestige of a tail—the muscles of the ear and the vermiform appendix to be accounted for? The fact that we breed backward (atavism) is another proof. Children have been born with tails and six nipples like a dog. Skeletons have been unearthed that have been preserved for ages in the soil. The discovery of the pithecanthropus erectus by Eugen Dubois almost supplied us with the missing link. The Christians have cried for this demonstration. That too has been discovered. You have only to see Billy Sunday in action to be satisfied with this proof. Our vocabulary shows us how dependent we are upon the animal kingdom to describe each other. We speak of men as wolfish, lionlike, foxy, lamblike, bearish and bullish. Look at your own hand. Observe the equal ease with which each finger touches the thumb. Our civilization depends upon this grasping power. There would be no houses, no vessels upon the deep, no locomotives crossing the continent but for this power, and this power has been developed because an ape-like ancestor discovered that he could raise himself from the ground, seize the limb of a tree and draw himself to safety. I would far rather believe in Man's Romantic History in his upward struggle from the animal kingdom than believe he was made from a lump of mud. The book of Revelation teaches that man has really descended and degenerated from an "angel of light" made in the image of God, to those inhuman monsters waging war in Europe in the name of that God. As my ancestors I prefer those brave animals who struggled upward, to that first man who was unmanly enough to lay the blame of all human mistakes upon a woman.

Then What am I? I am a product of heredity and environment. Environment has the greater influence. I may be nine-tenths environment and but one-tenth heredity, but heredity is simply the environment of my ancestry. In this connection let us still draw a comparison between the explanations given by revelation and by nature. In the life of man we find that all effects are determined by their causes. The Christian says that the Roman empire was overthrown by the hand of God. A close historical scrutiny shows us as a result of the drying up of the rivers, the great migration of barbarians which put an end to the Roman empire followed.

We have all been taught that the crusades to the Holy Land were actuated by spiritual motives. As a matter of fact we know now that the mercenary European soldiers were inspired purely by a desire for plunder.

The discovery of America by Columbus is usually recorded as a wonderfully romantic undertaking. We now know that all the trade routes to India had been closed. The merchants of Europe were impoverished as a consequence, and their poverty meant also the poverty of the nobles and the members of the royal court. For that reason alone Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain encouraged the ambitions of Columbus.

The church boasts about Martin Luther, as the monk who shook the world. There would have been no reformation, however, and Luther would never have been heard of, but for the fact that the German aristocracy and the Papal Court were fighting as to who should reap the fruits of the German laborer's toil. The Civil War in this country was determined more by the value of the slaves and all that was involved in slavery than any righteous conception. The late Marquis of Salisbury told the British Parliament that there would have been no war in the Transvaal had there been no gold there. All the trouble we have had with Mexico has arisen because of the "interests," and not because of any righteous desire on our part to help the Mexican to rise a little higher in the social scale. When the Serbian government had fifteen articles submitted to them and but forty-eight hours to decide, they agreed within twenty-four hours to about fourteen, but asked an extension of time on the fifteenth. This extension was refused and Europe was plunged in war. That fifteenth article was introduced by the Roman Catholic church to further its power. All these things have been accredited to supernatural influence, but the scientific man is discovering in every case that God has nothing to do with these matters, but that the way a people get their living determines how they live.

Consider man in the light of Determinism as opposed to the religious theory. We have been taught that man is a sinner. The Christian says "God made man." It is certain man did not make himself. Whoever created him must be responsible for what he does. If God created man, God must be responsible for man, and God must be responsible for sin. God gave man a will—the power to choose—but only a choice between good and evil. If man chooses evil there is nobody but God to blame. The will is governed by motive, motive is born of the brain; God created man with a brain, therefore God is responsible for man's will. If God made Adam, God was omniscient: he made Adam with a weaker will than Eve, therefore God and not Adam was responsible for the fall of man. Poor old God! I hope I am too charitable to blame him for man's condition. There is no such thing as sin. That which we call sin is merely maladjustment. Man is not a sinner, he is merely the product of his surroundings.

If you begin at the bottom of the life-scale and come upward you will find that as a result of the incessant repetition of the permanent nerve-tracts, the lowest and simplest nerve-actions, known as reflex, take place automatically in plants and animals. In man these actions are performed unconsciously, as breathing, the winking of the eyes and the action of the heart. Instinct is a higher form of reflex action by which every species is compelled naturally to pursue the same way or track without any teaching or example. These tendencies are transmitted in the germ cell. A donkey's foal will always refuse to cross a running stream though it has never seen one before, probably because its ancestors were desert animals that never saw running water.
